‘The law, obviously, I don’t think we could’ve made it otherwise, not this far if we carried a knife with us.’

‘Right, let’s just put this past us, here, here. Just listen to me, trust me, I’m your friend.’

Another man joined in. He presented himself as Twelve Thirty Five Antimeridian.

He smashed someone’s head with a tire-iron but never went to jail for some reason. Rich parents and a single bomb carried around his ankle joint, that’s how they did home arrest nowadays.

‘Think you’re going to make it? Think again, look at both of my ankles. Look at my wrists.’

Four of them and a belt, his chest was strapped as well. He was a plant that followed both of them around.

‘I’m Twelve Thirty Nine AM.’

‘Hey, is it always too late to be chased by a woman?’

So, strange, but I swear that every now and then, I keep being checked.’

‘Checked.’

It was so weird, being in town, going around the pumps, where there was a crowd of so many young people. There was a young woman in particular with a nice pair of eyes.

‘Come on already, you’re missing the fun.’

There was a nice one, blonde, no taller than him. Red-Mark stood there.

‘What do I do?’

‘God, why are you even asking, go and talk with her.’

He started making his way towards her, without asking, without wondering, but smiling.

She was cute, out of this world cut, dark eyed, bottle-blond, though, fair skin. In a dancing crowd where, out of everyone, she was the only standing out. Of course, why not use his dominant charms on her, since Red-Mark was after all such a charmer. While vaguely going through peculiar motion, he suddenly stepped on top of her soles.

‘Hey, sorry.’

Almost ruined it.

‘Wait, I’m not done it.

How did she do that?’

‘Follow her you fool, don’t just stand around there.’

The young woman dusted around the crowd, like some strange flash of color pushed through, not even he could know where she went.

‘There, another flash.’

‘Go through it, come on, don’t let her get away.’

It was too sudden again, it went all too sudden, like the speckle of a star going through a small asteroid-belt, when he didn’t even know her name or what happened then.’

‘I suppose this is the wrong time, isn’t it?’

‘What, who are you?’

‘It’s hard to explain. But, hey, I’m Ayles. I’m actually kind of glad to meet you.

I’m even gladder I got a hold of you all too soon, the girl’s right over there.

Come on, stud, go and talk to her.’

‘What is going on?’

‘Just go and chase her already.’

She laughed before she patted him on the back. It was all too confusing, all the flashes of camera-like tools going on at once, way too fast that he almost slipped and walked on toes.

‘Damn it, where is she? Girl, hey, I mean, I don’t.’

‘Don’t yell, don’t be awkward, come on.’

Tiny sparks of light, in the dark, it was night. As strange as it sounded, the bulbs around the sky only came to stick out at the most inopportune times.

He didn’t mind it as much as he started getting nervous. She was nowhere to be seen, she simply disappeared. Where was she? Too many dancers around him, too much of the motion going on for his own good, it all went too fast.

Ungrateful, all of them, after all that I’ve done for them, thought Red-marker. Of course they wouldn’t understand what it takes a man to make the perfectly rounded precision-pointed cuts needed to bleed a woman in order to get her to be his. The dancers were unable to cull this feeling that had been frothing inside of him ever since the day he had been born. It was all a secret, it was all a dark secret no one was allowed to know. They would not understand, let alone face the shame.

In the Distance

A sad lone armored man, in a desperate suit emerged, as thorn as he was, he waited. Walking in circles with a gait, day after day, unknowingly waiting for it to end, now.

It was Dangerous.

It kicked in sometimes. Only sometimes, Red couldn't think of anything else but skinning that woman alive. First he had to find her. All of the sudden a trail of red could be seen running down his nose, while one of his nostrils was exposed. In the rippled below, deep through the ground he saw it fit, as it dragged on, like a cluster.

'Dreadful man of no stone block, your head was split open ten minutes ago, do you not understand what's going on?

Can you not see what's coming out of it there?'

Large long-legs like structures that were flexible at the joints, worked by a four inched squared, by four by four by four, which was placed upon a larger square that was eight by eight by eight by eight which was pushed even farther, being placed by a twelve by twelve by twelve by twelve smaller human-like head that was being lifted by the man's brain which had become a coiling flaccid rod that pushed out of its cranial box. His teeth started drawing out, and there was enough meat on the other side, deep-through his gut to pull out his entire gums with everything he had stored inside of it, claiming even the tongue as it pulled out. His throat had started unwrapping and postulating itself in the same way a lizard would only to reveal smaller legs put inside of it, which bashed and trashed some of the flies that had come towards him.

And as his throat grew, not upwardly but forwardly, creating a small extension on his chest, as to look like a small stretched sack, the rest of the body fell behind flaccidly as it was drawn by the throat, upon which he started crawling. His left-behind body, although spine in the back bore the head-long antler-skin transparent cartilages seen to have been completely fattened by many of the flies which entered up entering them since the cartilages were made out of some uncanny ooze. Tender bolts appeared to appear and draw out of his face, which resembled normal bolts although they were actually made of the same skin-cartilage which made everything else. He started feeling the pain which was being pushed into him by the little fellow who stood above of him. Of which wing-spread consumed the man's neurons as they melted in the air, completely shattering every memory he may have had.

And at the top of the second head, from the second square, if one were to ignore the patterns on top the box, an opening could be seen, drawing the thinnest and longest of human beings, of whose longer wings had made him look like a fly-hybrid without any distinguishable feature since one would be too thin for them to be knotted at. Gobbled all around him, these thin creatures appeared to have already been set in flight, but not in run, as they only chose to pace around their progenitor.

In total, only eight of them appeared in spot. Which frightened the Professor as well as his Negro servant who was present there and just about all of his ordeals, not to distract too much from the fact that these thin-flying creatures were rubbed against by the tiny long skin flaps that were protruding out of its neck.

Before long, even him, the Dreadful-Man started setting himself into flight, being unable to control himself as the sun was even darker than before, color-inverted and pigmented, surrounded by a transparent pool-like mist that receded inwardly, then pushed out of the sun. And every human reflection from the planet could be seen against it, although that seemed senseless and impossible in some way, it could not be denied.

The Dreadful-Man took the Negro's child away from his arms with nothing more but the help of the bolts which extended from his face, looking like tiny just as flexible as the small legged joints, and began simply tearing him apart, lump from lump, dirtying the bolts, only to reveal that they split around the edges, growing harder, longer hairs, only to enter the child and slowly suck him in until he could not outright eat or breathe no longer.

'There, he's gone?'

Right through the crowd, the creature went, approached the point where he wanted to use the one of the oil-pumping slaves in order to feed itself with the most immaterial substances he could dread slitting a small hole-like opening through so it could enter it.

The Dreadful-Man took comfort into burying himself into the oil-opening. It was way too comfortable, especially since so many of the male dancers carried knives on them, making it far too dangerous.

Danced, another one danced.

There she was again, that woman kept getting away.

Filthy wench, that's what she was. That's what she god damned was.

Disregarding human life aside, they weren't getting much wilder with the parasitical lights. It explained why everything was so dark as to look that way. But eventually one would notice. Various colored lights could be seen protruding out of their bodies.

Vile Projections

Two men were standing around the corner of a street talking, they were shameless in appearance and one of them lighted a cigarette.

'What's the mold, again?'

'A tiny box filled with spare change. It's like a beggar's delight that's long been forgotten.'

'Were there any corpses found inside of it?'

‘None at all, I’d say there was anyone who died in that pile. But it’s always been rubbing me off just thinking about it.

So much change made off the illusion of corpses; quite disturbing in some way, isn’t it?’

‘It’s kind of disgusting, isn’t it? In some way, imagine someone simply making money off your death, even if it had happened, they’ve long profited and defiled their every dead, haven’t they?

They are quite a specific kind of sick, aren’t they?

I suppose it’s only fair to say that the world would’ve been better off if that box had been filled with their bodies instead of the others peoples that hadn’t got a coin over it.’

‘They’re not awfully fond on sharing are they?’

‘I suppose not, it’s not truly in their nature, if it were.’

He paused, thought a bit on it. There was a man in the distance, carrying a heavy box. Both of them suddenly turned and made sure to hide their wallets. It was just the habit by now, as you could never know when one of them could appear and ask for more. And it was already so awfully repellant, just thinking about it made a man wreathe in disgust.

It was the sickly appearance of the thing that showed itself that made them feel rather, as if they were out of place and this dilapidated wet rat-hole of a neighborhood had been its den. The creature that drew forwards was a somewhat hunched kind of figure, although more of a caricature than had even been seen. As within its grasp, there lay nothing but a hunch, a broken back, a curved nose that only drew further down towards its fattened bottom lip, its beadily curved eyes as well as strange, almost fat-encumbering smile that stretched those features past the point of decency.

Of course their most humane, if not the most appropriate reaction, as they eventually turned to look at the figure had been one of sheer disgust and repulsion, which was visible on their faces. But that wasn’t simply to be shared and drawn about only on its general outrageous appearance, as it happened for the creature to have gone through enough generations of inbreeding as to have acquired some features that would’ve normally be associated to one of their own. Yet there was always something off about it. Both physically and mentally, which would have to bring one to the other important detail, that being, the box he was carrying with it.

Although it wasn’t a box in appearance, it being more of a rectangle than anything else, more deformed around the edges, as lies could not be perfectly sharpened and cleaned. No, instead, they would have to be somewhat flawed, ill-defined, even dropping, melted at the bottom out of the weight it had been subjected to. The weight not being promoted by a general presence of corpses, of which, there was no doubt they would claim so, but of the greed that was part of them, that could not be completely removed from their being. It was unnatural, even so and it would be outlandish to claim otherwise, but they did appear to worship their inhumane greediness, even to the very own self-destruction.

The fiend approached upon a limp, a gait, and on unevenly hindered legs.

The closer it got, the more inhumane it looked. It only seemed like that weird deformed box it was wearing, not holding, was a part of its very being. Its hands were attached, molded, mixed with its material. In some way, the creature depended on the parasitical nature of the tool it created and fashioned for its own likings. It was degenerate, if not, what they claimed to be, partially brought, as even more dreadful than the event itself.

As its claim was simple, too many of their men died, yet, such a dark spineless creatures wanted not only to draw in the nutrients from its claim dead but it also desired, if not required the same kind of treatment from the hosts that were present during its claim. Its worship desired it so. Its body contorted even more until its weak legs could not be seen, instead, it bore a single tail that was made upon, what might've been more likely the children it had stolen or kidnapped.

Truly, his appearance was disturbing and degenerate at best, but seeing it for what it was, or what it looked like could rival nothing. It had created a pseudo-body or a tail made out of them, by now, the children would of course be long-before dead as well as closely, visibly touched. As in the worst possible way possible one could defile a child. It also checked out with their desire as well as neurotic nature and hatred towards more fair-skinned folk, towards the tendency to defile only showed itself even more than needed.

There was also this aspect of its head. It looked in three directions. Its giant ears had only grown in fat as if the money-lender, by profession of ease and choice, become two faces of their own. Though eyes swollen and undeveloped, they did managed to replicate and creature two longer noses as well as some canine-like teeth that drew out, which failed to prevent the general yellow liquor of drool that came out of them.

And this begging creature, of whose contortion only drew forth, had little to no self-awareness of its general worship of the conundrum it was in. For it had known, it would've buried itself a long time ago, making sure never to lift a finger or defile even the ground it appeared to walk upon.

It was an outsider, not a man. A creature that had turned society, and the houses surrounding it, from what could be seen, into its own den; to which, frankly, there was no point in trying to deny it. Of course, to every logical fallacy set aside, one would have to consider putting the nastily decayed inbred to its rightful death, out of its misery with the rest of its subhuman kin, only as a way to get rid of the general nuisance they seem to encumber everyone with. For the general population could do without its relatively destructive side.

There was also that, the way it managed to wail why begging for spare.

'Care to share a coin, missar, for a poor old dead. Me' kin has died long before and I suffer ever since.'

'Bugger off, won't you?

And piss off with your shit. We don't need you around.'

'You heard him, crawl back to the filthy cavern you came out off and rot.'

'But what of my kin, good man, have we not suffered enough?'

‘If you sit too long now, I’ll make sure you actually suffer this time around.’

Damned creature nearly burst out its pseudo-leggings as it drew out into the distance and rushed through to the black sea, taking its scrolls with it, as it only managed to look more inhumane than it actually was.

‘For how long are we supposed to put up with them?’

‘I don’t know but I don’t actually like it either.’

Damn that rat.

‘I’m in a dreadful mood, it’s damn awful. You wouldn’t understand it now.

But I just want to grab him and shove that box up his throat and see where the money goes.’

This was different. He didn’t know why, how to explain it or the exact reason for everything pushing towards it.’

Neither of them could make it past the street. The night came fast, just before they even got through the first few hours, both of them appeared dead. Standing right around each corner, wide-spread but cut through; there was a deranged cut on one of them, rabid-looking, looming around.

There was no witness to see it happen. It was bizarre, the entire thing, it failed to occur to either one of them that there was no point in returning to where they started, or making due with they had.

Back to that corner, past the strange dancers and into the house, by now it was pointless. Trying to fight back was arguably, detestable. It was hard to boil it down, with all the hatred and all the tries. And all the while, he Red had stumbled, as he had tried to make it off, to get away, and stand on his feet once again.

‘There, it’s done. It’s finally done.’

Mouse followed, right through the junction, unable to understand.

A few days, at best.

Near one of the taller, twisted buildings inside the village. It stood out of place, like a tall block of dreary grays, twisted with dust, encrusted at last, from which a glowing dark light seemed to be bore. Though it was no perfect building, instead, out of its likes, there seemed to be a worm-like structure that blocked the way in, again, bore out in sight. Placed near the oil-pumping men whose mouths were wrung around the place. From their backs, some strange drafting-table shaped fat lumps started drawing out, extending as they started feeding onto each other, revealing a pattern of their bodies just to be reconstructed after in the same way a configuration would be. And a throat, past the boat, that had flown in the distance, standing, made it towards the blotched sun.

‘I had a dream of evil, nay, one of immorality.

There was a Negro waiting on the balcony for me. He bore an axe in his hand wanted to bury it in my throat in order to lay claim upon my house.

I saw it, I saw it.’

The man went on to describe the room in detail and he did. Pure breeds of plaster, deepening inside the walls and the crude alabaster that was being buried in the carpets, men that had their eyes peeled out, and their half-bodies wreathing through the shrouds. Many children their bore for tails, though unclothed they bore no organs human wore. Instead, below their chests, not cuts, lay there, but only the most unnatural grayish-red, a lobster-like shell and a strange barred barrister's belt made out of carbon, thinned by the bites, the children were brought to life only when they started wriggling out of their small holes, their tiny coves, making it seem as if the Negro awakened them from their slumber's woe.

Despite him being marked for lynching, the Negro had escaped only with a lighter and his torn clothes. The axe was taken from his master's home. And as he made it, glass was broken. No crosses of barring, and no glass lending him in quiet, blending. With the thin-dark walls, as he entered, he lashed and made it towards the man.

‘This is your fault for allowing them to carry through; look at what you’ve done, filthy creatures that they are, they bloodied themselves, they’ve bloodied their hands and that of their children’s dead. ‘

Their existence was indefinable, not in this place.

And most importantly, theirs was not barbarous animosity but animalistic in nature.

Luckily for the man in question, the Negro in its unconceivable prime of mental certitude had merely tripped on top of one of the wreathing tail-spins coming out of the child and fell upon its shambled, unknowingly, tripped, on top the axe handle, ripped apart as he decayed. His body strayed but his split head pulled out of its neck and started flying around the room, like a tiny black butterfly that started swooning around the black pearls that were bubbling the ceiling. Air-filled chocolate-like, it fed on the air with incisors and broken teeth that came from both sides. From deeper inside of him, a longer tongue emerged and pointed.

Distraught by pain from the back of his head a single motion shot some air, in the form of a star-like sphere, which slowly fell out of place like a skin-flake. From there, whichever of his primate-neurons came out off, though subjugated by the disease every Negro-like creature bore; they shot around the room, unending, blasphemous, oh supreme floor. It stood and ate, contorted to the end.

The man named Sand-Louise referred to the incident as nothing but a shameful display, of his lack of compassionless stare, to his master whom to this day remained stuck outside the door waiting, never allowing him the slightest chance to leave his house, never to be bothered, by the phone alas.

Sand-Louise stared at the receiver, his throat only coated its surrounding like a skin-beaver eating at it, as it waited for the water to stop.

He waited a few minutes, until the parson at the other side of the line spoke again.

‘You realize that you cannot meet his master now, can you?’

‘But I thought he killed him on his way here.’

‘Look again.’

Through the visor, through the door, he missed a part of his throat, while his leg contorted in the back, the side of the area being turned around as to face the giant open hallow space, inside the elevator chamber, of which deranged sight turned around into a circling worm-like twist that started receding into the ground. Even if it were for him to make it past the man, this dreadful thing would not allow him any kind of escape. Yet, it had to be said, the balcony lead to no sight, there was no delightful thing to look back at. Only a blocked sky-lit dark monsoon, put with lichen-parasites swarming, yet from the outstretch of an arm, Louise could extend his throat and move around as his body anchored. Since the Negro was docile now, seemingly well behaved, despite the outlandish thing that were his tendencies to misbehave in violence, he reigned in place and spat from the back, little black long-slim spikes that were just needle of its kin. From the heart of the jungle, came the fever of filth he had ignored.

There in the distance, as his head pushed on, his body again anchored against each side of the walls, which drew on as to encase his arms and legs only so he might remain in place. Towards a circular structure of filth made out of robust citadel-like stretched, sided in eight faces, all of which were set in flight. Chained against the main structure in the middle which looked alike to a giant man's arm if it were to be even more corroded and worn out, by age, as skin pushed out and moved along each gaze. Though structurally defiled, many features could not be set aside. For it sang of dark age and worn itself to the dust. Of an uncanny feeling watching, Louise realized that the walls, this encircling formation that had dawned all around him, in the distance and through the outstretch was never to be touched or ending. Fending against breathers whom, in flight, despite all the fat being stores in their giant wings, they could not be used for levitating, yet wore their gritty, malformed spans. Up through fronts where they charged. Long, protruding, barely set. They hanged around as their twin sets of elongated thin as the nature's reed lungs penetrated the main structure and fed it the air it needed to be kept alive.

'Worst possible feeling, is, being locked out of your damned mind, just fucking open the fucking door!

Open the god damn door or I will come around the porch and climb over to the windows sill and If I have to do that I guarantee you that I will split your room with fire and brim.

And I will make sure you cackle on it as soon as you piss yourself, boy.'

The boy opened the door as soon as he could breathe.

'Dad, can we.'

Stopped in low and not in the mood.'

Short Confession

She was nowhere to be found but it was getting worse. Trying to understand why they were after him. They must've found me out, that's too obvious. They've locked me inside, they took out the means of communications. Why yes, whatever lay in my mind must've been too perfidious and evil to be dealt with alone.

It was too obvious that no man could endure leaving him alone for too long.

Dreadful creatures, they were all along the way, way-spread around him, waiting for the attrition to happen. Painting the outside outskirts while making sure that Red would hear everything that happened out there, the dancers, the pumps going and everything that's gone mad, his every turn and everything that crossed his mind, in other words, he was alone. Incapable of discerning what was going on through. Way too obvious, way too wrong, way too obscure, the man was ostracized by his thoughts.

It wasn't just mere paranoia, but a blend of anger and misgivings. Never the better for what came through. He knew, better than anyone that there was no reason to stay. Not while there was still a chance to put a word in.

'You are my seed, my creation, my tool of desperation. I can only go forth knowing that I shall return upon you and pay mind of your growth ten years from now on.

And my dear, I can only fathom the span of wings that might come and spread and strap and remain. What came after your deathless gaze, whatever after, none might say. But, it was enough.

That one thing which was feeling, no one thought of it then. And when it happened, if it happened, we were left with thick lips and empty barrels.

'Met and you, Almond-Peer.'

'All right John, I think I'll listen to the wind for some time. Think the city will fall one day?'

'There's also Steppe, and what of him?'

'Worst fiend of the lot, I'd say.'

'One last time, good friend, one last time.'

He said but spoke too soon. It was plenty of ways he could look into it without knowing when or where.

Far into the end he realized that he was none to be held upon. He could not fathom staying out of it, unquestionably so. There was a deterrence that no man could point at him, yet he knew. Locked, locked, a petty watch, he pushed through and only seemed to piss the poor-like substance, never asking how the door-handle protruded.

Although, one could still look farther in the back, somewhere trapped, and even in the distance unknowing, hard to see or be bothered by it.

Look far beyond from the point of destruction.

Outside the house he had been trapped in, where there lay and whence the thoughts came, and through the tunnel and past the house. And off the verges and the stones, alas, there lay only but the chasm, the hole, the dark drop, also known as the Abyss. From whence one stood and looked down, as opposed to every other drop and grown of deeper touch, this was nothing to be missed.

It was juvenile in some way, but it was the missing years. Childhood in its most unadulterated manner; and although many would look upon it with shame, there was nothing purer in essence but everything that had been accumulated along the way. For he knew there was no way back, as no man could fall upon that road and return to whence he stood abashed.

‘There, I think this key should fit.’

Thought Red, although he was just as repelled by the sight, only even more so than he had been before, as this was hard-dealing with and even worse for the wear. He hadn’t known what to spare or what to look into any more than he could tell. Thence the dangers looked frozen as if on a whim, most of them bastardly trapped by whim. Hardened and put in their places. Never asking for any kind of embrace that might stricken on if more.

‘How long have I stood in this house for?’

‘A few months at the very least.’

Came Mouse from the distance, straying to get a word in. Bothered by the lack of compassion, they only opened way for him to come on and ask for something of his grating. In need for touch, he asked no less.

‘There, he shall be our guide and make it past the say. Follow me through and listen to them be brought there.’

And he was spared no wild thought as he looked upon the figure of the eclipse, his head. Writhed out of long despair.

It could not be seen any longer. Bastardly wrath that it were, they were unaware of their trappings, they could not think on their own. Servants making walls, dancers being part of them, the curtain being set around them, and before long they realized that they were trapped there.

‘Juvenile, puerile hole, from it, there comes something that isn’t out own. Whether intentional or not, this disaster cannot be avoided any longer.

It needs to die; leave it writhe in and out before we come out of our way in the making.

Leave it be I say, along with everything else.’

‘But what ought with to do there on?’

‘Forget everything and don’t mind.’

Twass’ as much as he let on, though never-ending in the quiet throng, they looked for some way, and another, along the way had states.

‘There it seeps.’

Said one of the frozen dancers, though he could not concur ever-before, of which fealty he seethed, before long.

There’s always, but always something wrong going on at times.

Dead Memory from the Chasm

Death changed it. In light of day, filth could not convey what lay beneath the chasm. It was too dreadful to be looked down upon from that point through.

There in space, the body of the lamb. All its limbs were gone. And from its insides sprouted many such chains of skin, as the bold contorted worm that entered it, he lay, though in time little was said, he had devoured. All life had been destroyed and lichens of skin started corroding man's creation in every form. For what was worth and everything torn, dread had swollen, death had eaten. Death had become him, undefeated.

For in evil he decay, and waste came along the way. None survived, and stone shattered, ever after, on its morbidly stolid platter, they fell. Encompassing their filthily encumbered remained, his brain shattered as every image of Agamemnon faltered. With every piece and every startling delight, and every worn-out mold and every single time reality fashioned Earth. Every man and every creation and every god and those who set forth after, with their kin and with their makers, even the Suppressors in their dead realms; even farther than the ones that calmed themselves. Many died and many fell, many would not get up again.

Every land and every woe tainted, and every death counted and never-ended. Even through nuclear realm, even the vessels that were supposed to run their plains, their worlds and many of those that remained, in death. He shattered and killed, and broke and peeled. His every bridge upon which they broke and fell, as that was only but eternal and none could, eventually avoid or return. No joy in the making, no reflection reality, it all had to die with them. Leaving behind a dead-world, one of such a putrid sight, of elation in its mad light, wormed out and eaten by a disease, by the likes of whom no longer would anyone be please.

Of such sight no angels would sign. No animals lay, no humans remain. Only death, for death was pleasure, that was the end of thoughts. That was the inevitability which swallowed all. And there was no stopping to that disease and none might know how to please themselves by flight. No delight might lay, none might stray their hands, or, even rather, just as much convey but the thought.

And everything that brought them there. Death had endlessly swoon and ended them, piercing every sun there lay. Every child and infantine world filled with them, and every king and every maker. Every patron, killer, master, world, every piece of life, and tendril-like delight, they died. Messed with as their hopes had faded, in an instant, their lives ended. No shield would do and not a hue. And not a single one would rather get through. Such death worlds as they lay, compassion being spilled along the way. It was blasphemous thinking of it all, and even facing them as they lay through all.

The memories that had been taken, all of them destroyed and for their own sake, be mistaken for their deaths. Could not mean anything, past their lepers who encompassed girth, every savage of their own, none might do and never cull their makers as they stare. And never again would they happen to live through quiet, impaled through chest.

One could think of Glaucoma, of his child and every sight. And even before he stepped outside and even after he had his boy alive. He had died many a times. For every reality and darting sight had to be completely extinguished. Those who might've made it, there was not a chance, for one to know about them, petty, chronicles were mad. For them, none might say of hue. For Hern had died and everyone's sinew had only seemed to spare him of the junction, that terrible action and never ending distraction which was disease.

The fallen pit, broken apart, as through it lay, as well as through the encrusted sight, a giant tail which had impaled and broke the planet, killing everyone that lay in sight. A delight for everything stored, for death had claimed everyone as well as more and more had tried to fight. Some set in flight, but unable to face any of it, as well as they would face the fright that was eternal.

The compound broken, as the gods, all of their read deathless mass resting as the mist spread. Yet none of it could corrode him either, as he lain in all, he broke through swollen and through gaze. Every spreading as if to devour through the maze of bodies that were floating in space; the thorn, the hideout, the bunker and each realm, even the Violator who could not be seen through sight. Even through the unaffected realms of time where even he had yet to tear a sight, and be met with any other as their delights. Even the ones that had ascended, even the ones whom attempted to search for the lamb, and every Laplander, servant or criminal in turn.

Those that mattered especially the Elegant and the Proto-being, his species and his promised land, the kingdom of sparrows and those who lay in sight. Through the plains of Sicily and through each rendition of Earth, destruction followed the serf of evil. All lay dead. Encompassed through a never-ending deathless connection which poured into every reality that was there as well.

Souls would not deserve, but caught as they were as well, none lay saved and none the living. All laid claim upon and never allowed a rebirth through skimming and through pain. Even those that fell, Oliver and Oliver dying, through a spear, always trying; no resolve for any man, as fate has yearned for all to be dead before life even began to spare.

While Charles as well as Blue, inside the house, and through, they fell, as many roots shot everywhere around as well; as Allan could never have met, not a single sight, none as well. For every man and every living being, even such a force that would abolish and disrupt their breathing, the pattern would only shatter and spread, ending them all before life could flee or have a chance to be spared. Bloated birds, the knights and creatures, the gangs, of Bottle, Pox, and rocks, were heaved. Argus and the like, the agents and the benign, the uniforms and their masters, foaming, heaving as they could not stop, nothing made it through, not even the slightest delight.

Could stop one knowing, from the cities, ever-growing, he had put an end to all.

And through the most bastardly sight.

A voice unlike any other stood, as brightly as ever, one to be.

'You killed my child.'

It spoke to me. A dead man listening with no hope, across the back, hooked upon a root of meat that only stood, as worthlessly forlorn.

Has she been spared? Nay, only time remained, not as an anchor but a cruel joke, trying to give her as little hope as she had before Agamemnon claimed their lives.

‘You’ve killed my child.’

She spoke again, but this time around, there was none to say it. None to approach, none to lay forth, arms climbing and never asking for more hope, worthless as she was, for every piece of life, there was nothing stopping it from being taken, rightly so. Her claim fell, she died again.

And then another voice came asking.

‘I don’t have much time.’

Thought but one of many, maybe less, of fealty as it were, the bleakness had barely a chance to corrode his legs.

‘Long time has this been desired of and I shall not stand your existence no more.’

Cried Argus, as he finally arrived in front of the mansion; for he had known of pain and he endured, time and time again, only to have settled the deal with the man. He knocked on the door, was greeted by a servant of hope and finally enticed he asked for him.

‘Bring your master to me, I don’t know why but I can feel it.’

And there was pain, for he had known. Be it as a hunch of the swoon which would take them all, but he finally realized, just like something every man would have to eventually accept. That every great thing and every sight, everything had to come to an end before they could set everything right.

‘I may not be a righteous man, but I have to see Glaucoma and face him.’

‘I shall bring my master forth.’

Thence the old servant left and lay claim over a closed door. Everything was worn out and broken, much too largely filled with a disobedience that would not due. Out there, he waited, standing on a rounded flight of marble, with a single sight to the sea.

The morose feeling, the bleakness only served as a reminder, something that was calculated, stronger than that. But now, no living man and no being could ignore its strong might.

‘Why is this happening?’

Argus asked but so far no answer had come. There was no reason to endure it no more. For what was worth, for every mile he had taken to arrive here, he had finally come to meet the man he sought after all this time.

But there was no strength left in his arms, and no pettiness and no hatred in his heart. And it wasn’t the fleeting force of youth that caused it, as the man who had appeared in front of him refused.

‘I will not raise my arms again you.’

He spoke, and although his voice had almost cracked as well, he only spoke.

‘I don’t think there’s going to be another time or yet another chance, but I wish I could set everything right, just for once.’

The man only shook and wasted, no wares and nothing, yonder, rested.

A nod on both ends as they just happened to approach and shake hands. In mourning of his son, for the likes of whom he had missed and lay abandoned, yet against a sun unkind. Farther than their world.

The old man turned around, with little hope.

Just as he came back to his house, he understood little and could do nothing but applaud all the waste and every word, and every scramble and every wreck he had caused. But more so, he had missed her more, more than anything he’s ever wanted.

For all the times he had been blinded, and for the least of all, departed from soul and work. He finally came to her room, upheld, and worthless as a man whose daughter died. As one whose soul had wasted itself, somewhere beyond his hopeless cry; of all the things that he forgotten, of all the things that did not matter, she had been the one there. Lain upon a grave, unfairly tainted, his obsession finally satiated.

Although as the winds of destruction pushed and threw everything away, one swoop in particular threw a bunch of card out of their way.

It seemed way too clear that to the right side of the broken world from which they parted, the two of clubs, ten of clubs, three of diamonds, nine of hearts, five of hearts, Jack of clubs and the ace of diamonds flew on the right side of some long destroyed flown through abyss.

The king of spades, Jack of hearts, five of spades, five of clubs, eight of clubs, seven of hearts, queen of spades, two of spades, six of spades, eight of diamonds, queen of hearts and Jack of spades got annihilated in one fell swoop. The four of clubs, king of clubs, ten of spades, six of diamonds, nine of diamonds, seven of spades, four of hearts, ace of spades, queen of diamonds, eight of spades and nine of clubs lay in a fire, swooning.

Jack of diamonds, six of clubs, queen of clubs, three of hearts, seven of diamonds bloomed in a tumor sphere before being destroyed. The King of hearts died the first, as every heart of the ten of hearts that was missing imploded. Leaving only the four of diamonds, six of hearts, three of spades, five of diamonds, four of spades, ace of hearts, three of clubs, seven of clubs, two of diamonds, ten of diamonds, king of diamonds, two of hearts, eight of hearts, nine of spades and ace of clubs became an eye which burst into a guttural explosion from which tiny infants died, whose faces were marked with the imprint of the cards, as their limbs only grabbed like wreathing tentacles before they were shoved in the ground and splattered.

Their infantile nature, as that of the women showed as it started spreading and eating what it could from around the place.

And in the Eternal Bloc of Wood and Sand

‘We need to discuss something, incredibly fast. There’s something you should know about, there, right there, can you see it?’

‘I don’t know what you’re talking about Woodpains, I don’t see it.’

‘It’s right over there, the trembling man with no head.

He has a machine underneath him distorting the world, he will destroy and bend everything, mixing us with the most uncannily detestable objects and no amount of piety and evil shall change it, regardless of our eyes.

We have to stab them.’

‘I shall bring on the blades, Woodpains. May we forget he’s changing us.’

And in the distance, he saw no legs, it only appeared to travel over long distances on top of metal wheels, though the rust looked out of place, since it bore the general look of strangled criminals, the dead only drawing forth. They were useless, too useless to be forgiven.

But the machine underneath it had eight-half retractor claw-like extending mandible choppers that were used to destroy and collect pieces of the building in came into contact with. And with every piece it took away from it, there were a few fallen cradle-like substances which poured out like water springs only to harden and become trunks. Well enough the trunks opened and half-men came out, like freaks they couldn’t help themselves, afflicted by a strange-kind of deformed encephalic tumour leisure, their heads opened only to push out their real forms which dragged their hidden skin away upon wings made out of strange block-like structures that were intertwined and pushed out of them some strange defiling consumption eaters. Grains, and bolts that dragged along their long-legs that were pushing over their large bodies that were spreading like substances around them.

And before they knew it they had revealed their giant one-eyed shape inner beak which, despite being almost flat, unlike the roundness of an eye, they had become ever-throwing and devouring. Begging to be put down as the irises only protruded in the same manner only the most uncanny beaks would, trying to eat and starve at the same time. They had to die, they had to die for no reason, there was no hope for them, they had to be drowned because once they made it past a point in the sky, the sky would turn upside down. It was an illusion that only affected the ones with an ability to set themselves in flight.

There were two types of ground but one could not make it there, on top the sky-ceiling whole. He would be ripped to shreds and erected in the most unfashionable state possible, as a disease of distress would, uncannily forlorn, unable to be worn as the gore only spread this new flat idol. At first, men thought that the strange, yet peculiar, uncannily deformed, unnaturally tainted, unfathomably ugly, nigh-near the desire of begging for a loathsome extermination mad idols were nothing but some deformed stars or some broken satellites. Yet they could not be more wrong. Defiled, defiled, they danced around, even though some of them had been completely splattered before being raised upon pillars, they could not fathom living any more in their current forms.

Since their extensions only drew on forth until they could not help themselves any longer, they suffered for eternities that were calculated.

Once it was settled that it was time, the blood splattered creatures were pushed onto the ground, making that giant leap over until they were completely re-crushed and reformed, even in their deformed, egg-shell-like body state, where their ribs and one giant split eye and inner organ, and the little freak-like used skin body shrine was half-formed, they had made it towards the machine which started pushing its mechanical limbs in order to completely reshape them as it planned to create smaller cradle-like formations that had to be completely terminated before it could eat again.

For only the man without a head which was impaled upon the metal hook-like accessing point which pushed through him and came out of his chest like the tip of a giant spear which could replace the top of the peak French architecture, started speaking. In drones, its words were unnatural and had only grown out of their master as they started forming small objects out of the atoms of air that were flying around.

Using the molar-state of skin junction out of the nearest body of the man who observed this strange mechanical fiend in action, it could do nothing short of an attempt to eat everything that was alive in a fraction of a second. This small digestive-tract that floated, out-deformedly trying to grasp as many things in the air as it could, drawing and drawing more power from the dreadful crest and the peak upon which filth started pushing on, there in the distance, the stopped suddenly appeared.

It was another plain man who hold a torch that was put out by the wind and only kept being put out as the fire pushed on and started eating everything around the world. Though to a normal person all of this would only appear as strange flashes of hell-fire which could be interpreted as vision of hell. Caused by him, as he would be known as an evil man and for his countenance he was rewarded.

He grew immediately, unable to constrain himself to the unnatural need that were hunger, for hunger was there. And Hunger was something akin to some mad creature which solemnly looked like a giant sacrificial doll that had its heads and plain descending arms drawing into its back, contorting until all this fire bursts, as slim as they were finally drew back the small organ which needed it to look at him before he could finally emerged from the inner-air hole it had turned its den into. Since it could not be helped any longer, as a straw-monkey would, it opened itself, allowing for its every child to come out and spread into the air.

And they looked like straw-simians of which heads were like that of some unnatural looking weirdly pushed out, then drawn in boxes that had hills drawn inside of them if the boxes were empty chambers. Yet inside of the empty chamber that bore that weirdly deformed hill, their brain matter and organs had drawn inside since their chests were filled with a foamy-sponge like fat that had been evolved in order to deal with the attackers.

Of whom had come from the distance. Wriggling eighteen blade-like arms, there flying grotesquely fattened creatures that were made out of what appeared to be a large plaster-like fattened oblongs that pushed in like a flaccid button that was being slowly roasted on the stove, while the fire only started with its edges that started receding back, allowing for a quick view of a clearly protruding face to be seen in them. And while their middle was red-pus, the hooks around the edges were only pushing out and only dreading to come and eat as much as they could in order to survive having their insides be emptied by the strange guts-like creatures that constantly tried to appear everywhere at once and eat everything.

And they fought and charged and they pierced their bellies and some of them managed to extend their tendril-like mouth rounded spears as fast as possible until they couldn't move.

They stopped wondering about poison while strapping themselves in.

For there in the distance lay but a man, made king-domain, the Dominator on a whim.

He? Him? He was different, much more different, or would've been so.

There, in the distant past, he may have had a chance, now wasted.

For his mind and eyes came to be long bent, upon his inability to concentrate.

'A nosebleed master, nonsense, gibberish, it's all working. It's working.

All that we're left with is to split them open.'

'Slaughter them, master, we must slaughter them like pigs and dogs, like cattle, like the moisture of a butcher. Please, I beg of thee, allow us to do so.'

'I'm sorry you think that way still.'

A few more steps forward, it was just about as much as he needed. Walking didn't mean much, but it was all he had.

'Come to think of it, I don't know either.

We can't go on like this, you know?

Voice of Evil, Voice of Sense, Voice of Immorality, whatever you want to call yourself, we tried and failed. We're incapable of hurting anyone.

We can't do anything properly.

Just let it die off while you can.'

'We can't allow the hatred to die off, it's in our being. It's what defined both of us for most of our live. It might be blinding but it's who we are.

It's what we are, and neither of might be able to escape it. Swallow your pride and keep it alive, it's who you are and no one can change who they are, regardless of how hard they try.

And if I will it so, master, I shall force you, I shall force you to accept me. There's only us against the world and it's what's kept us going so far. It's our own driving force that shapes our sight. We can only keep it so. You shall not be the one who chooses.

You're not going to let our memories die with it. We both know there's no compassion in your mind, we both know that we cannot never move on. So, why stop now? When we're so close, it's so much easier. We can harm, enslave, hurt, steal and punish whichever we want as long as we're here.'

He simply listened and didn't speak. He knew he was right. It had to be that way.

'No more being looked at, no more being an outsider, everyone stays the same, as they ought to be.

And when we finally get to the point of achieving power, we can make everyone suffer, with no exception. They shall be forced to cower and none shall escape our.'

There was still time. He had to stall, there was still enough time. It was the only righteous way, taking them all along the way, bringing ruin, destruction and carrying everything over.

'We cannot forget, we missed so much.

It's your fault, you missed it, you dumb fool, you missed it. We could've read, we could've made something of ourselves. We could've been scholars, makers, creators. But in blindness you ruined it all.

You strived for nothing, like a petty dumb troglodyte.

And worst of all, you waste time. Our precious time, ruined, destroyed. Your realization came too late now, dumb, paranoid lot.

This is our only thing left, our hatred and degenerate behavior, master. It shall make us and it shall be the ruin of us as well, just as it ought to be. I hope it was worth it, striving for nothing.'

On a pile of trash, that's everything they've been trying so far. A pile of useless trash, nothing more.

'Worst of all is that you've brought that on yourself. It's all your fault, there's no one else to blame for your arrogance but you.

You brought this upon us.

And look, a pile of trash will never make a world. Nothing gets preserved. Everything dies with us, do you understand?

Most likely it will die even sooner than that.'

'We cannot punish everyone.'

'And how have you even reached that conclusion, your majesty? In your moment of clarity, it's almost as if you've come to believe any of the things you've said.

There's no excuse for you acting this way.'

'Am I to be judged by you now?'

'Is there anyone else left around?

There's no return, it's too late. A man is already carved in a way, you're not a mold, you're not marble either, you're something worse. You can mask every name, you may lie to everyone, you might even show some semblance of shame, but you chose to go along with everything and for that there's no escape. There's no excuse, that's not something a man let alone a human would do.

We'll live with that now. We carry on; there's no excuse for no man in this world. You've made your bed and now you shall sleep in it. As cruel and vile as you've been, we shall never be devoured by them.

Show no remorse, if I tell you. Show nothing. We've gone far enough for everyone to see who are. There's no point in hiding.

You shall never apologize, never fake compassion, shame, guilt or anything of the kind, there's no point in lying.'

'Can we go already?'

'Not yet, stay until the curtain's fading. It's important. For either of us, so why rush it?

It's what shall define us for the rest of our existence, whether or not it shall be short-lived or not.

We won't have much time otherwise, you know that. Time waits for no man and you've already defined who you are instead. It's a one way street from this point on and your anger is the only thing that makes you human from this point on. It's what keeps your mind and memory working, and how can we forget it?'

And the hatred shaped everything, as it ought to be used. From their bodies, wrought and painted not, for every bridge that came outlandish, for every form, abstractedly worn-out.

'I wish I wasn't alone.'

'You damn idiot, we can't. Never, we can never be with anyone, we can't leave the memories behind. It's the only thing we have, it's the only thing we'll ever have. You may not have done it on purpose, but it's too late to change anything, scum doesn't change, nor shall we attempt it.

As long as we remain alone, we've won. We'll have preserved everything. Think of the power and time, we could shape everything if we wanted to.

Hide if you have to, block every sight, but never give up now, we're still at it. That's the only thing we need. And the day whence all shall suffer would one day come, just bid my command and we'll make it through, somehow. Let everything else perish, it's the essence that matters.

The essence of whatever you may want to call it, evil, immortal, degenerate, it's irrelevant. As long as we have this, we shall be.'

Another break in one of the walls, they weren't touched, they hadn't been touched over ages.'

'Stop it already, it's over before it's even begun. You're as petty as I am now.

I think you're right at least about one thing, we're both useless, powerless to do a thing. I suppose it was nice dreaming for a while, wasn't it?

'I'll find a way. I may not be smart. I may not be creative, but I'm not going to give up now. Not after everything I've been through.

I don't need either of those things, I'll find a way.

And you know what? I don't need to belong, I never needed to do. I.

I simply don't want to end up hurting anyone.'

'You wanted to punish them.'

'I didn't. I didn't mean it, it was.'

'No shame, remember?'

'I know, I know, I'm not showing shame. There's no such thing as shame, guilty, remorse, regret, pointless things. Once something done, it's done. And there's nothing you could do about it.

Rationality is a leisure.

And we can only feel a slither of anything when we listen to the songs the wind's producing. Once they're done, you won't feel a thing, for anyone. Enjoy it while it lasts.'

They moved on.

Both Red and Mouse, leaving behind whatever that creature was, seeing the strange highly-concealed conical-vortex make do. It sutured itself and most likely devoured most of the frozen dancers alive.

'In some way, I think you're pitifully limp-wristed.

You just haven't tried thinking about it hard enough. Go on now, we'll see it through.

Look, I think there's a stationary lost ship.'

It was mostly a brokenly deformed, largely drawn out hut that almost look like a clay-formed pile that had been abused by a bunch of cow-prodders. From above, it would seem like it was filled with hickeys. Most of which, torn apart, and almost fully eaten and bumped. Hardened, metallic, bearing a single light-producing thermometer-melted shaped form on top of it, which lend onto it an almost futuristic feeling.

'I don't want to go inside.

I can't explain it, but I have a bad feeling about it.'

'We'll be fine.'

Looked Mouse, as he could only assure him that there was nothing to it, it was just another melting structure. There were a few of those around the place. Although there wasn't much to build upon.

‘It’s all too natural’

What an awful creature he was. Already back out of its track.

‘You realize this, don’t you?’

We only feel that way upon hearing music. Otherwise, we’re unstoppable. It’s our own weakness, to an otherwise, unstoppable malignant mind.’

‘Our strength.’

‘Our filth, I suppose. In our nest of illness we can still be.’

‘You’re a neurotic little mental-invalid.’

‘So be it, better than a liar.’

They entered and didn’t speak for a while. It was dark, under the very light coming from one of the embed lamps trapped in the ceiling. Despite the amount of power that was being produced, nothing could be seen.

‘I still think you’re projecting too much. You’re poisoning the dark now.’

‘I cannot help it. Mouse, you’re supposed to be on my side, are you not?’

‘Not this time around. You need to learn how to tone your pettiness down. Learn how to behave, you’re not an animal and neither am I.’

A few more steps in the dark.

‘We have enough time to catch up.’

‘Ask for a light.’

Then Red-Marker asked so.

What a petty fiend he was.

‘Distracted enough?’

The light suddenly flew in and all of the sudden, long-revealed the chamber almost burst into view.

A madman with a rake started charging from the other side of the room.

All those hours of grinding turned his body into a killing machine. He wore a chest strapped upon his chest with tiny long spears penetrating both of them. Bleeding.

‘He’s going to kill us both, run.’

The back of his head protruded out of another head and his mouth was on the wall, munching on a carpet made out of poached Negro-faces.

He was foaming blood anchors out of his growing leg-lungs. And he wanted to eat us.

‘Run, into that room, now!’

‘God damned dancers.’

Two dancers were blocking the door, standing like barricades. It was all too pitiful, both of them were much deformed. Although they both took part in it as they ran away and pushed it out, although some cries were heard and let alone one would abide no less, both Mouse and Red were split ahead, they couldn’t wonder at the stronger, headless, pushing forth.

‘I will kill you if I lay my hands on your faces, I shall have your throats.’

And as they rose, it was plentiful and little more, worn out hands filled the halls as change around. Many of the surfaces praying, shaved something off themselves. Although no wonder and little after, the headless had only come no stronger. They asked of little woe and crept. And all around the place they wept in flight, of no delight and tried ever after, leaving in sight.

‘Close the door and lock it forth.’

Said one of them men, unable to see themselves, as much as they were, sworn to it and ever-calling. Dreadfully stopping themselves from slashing around. It was dreadful, crying, swept in places.

They hid and ended up there, in the forest of the land, in their only shaken soundproof torn-up hand which had been wrapped around the rooms they each began prying through. Of brazen-bulls and orcas bronze, of manifold men who were carved in the den of bronze Mouse entered. He knew of lack and brought to naught, he knew as little more than he did before he’s been brought back. In quiet standing, answering from the wall, as his hand only battered it, he asked for something, only to be gone.

‘I wish I could hear, and near you through this. What I lack in pride, not to mention through ill and miss and bitter hiss. I wish I could come yonder and make through. But I think there’s no way to melt through it and miss amongst the bitter due.’

‘Wait, due wait in time, Red-Marker.’

And in the room, although the quiet, though they neared ever-dire, there was but a single bust, standing atop a blanket of molded air, whence they would not enter its area, better as dead otherwise, man would be, there was something missing from its face. Broken and disgraced, pushed through the waiting. They waited for a moment, eye to eye, as if from the stand whence it had shattered there lay still a light benign.

Thoroughly wasted, as if bloodied by anger, it shone upon Mouse with a light of strife, which dwelled upon him narrowly. Encasing him as if in place, rotting every fiber of his face as he revealed, glory in pain and something he had taken yet again, as if for granted. Strangled out of his bloodless coil, whence he lay below and asked for none. There he stood alone in a half a stone, a shroud amassing, pushing around him ever-shrinking never passing.

And encased, ever-so much as he had been, there around him, thin of skin, lay Red-Market, encased in bronze. Of no fealty and no worth, he stood, breathlessly as a whore.

Note Reminder for the God of Filth

‘Need you be reminded to read from your vile notes, although silent in thought you need be forced to read the key-units, the key-patterns out loud, else your mind ought to decay and melt through your nostrils, head, ears and other containers that are in your body.’

His body, after all held many such wildly deformed containers which had been flushed inside his guts and replaced every organ and every ounce of blood that lay in him. He was a man, deformed and uncannily stricken like a pitiful worm, tearing himself over only to open the valve-like handles from which his memories poured out like vented chills of air.

‘Call upon the Man-of-Filth.’

And the Man-of-Filth, who was his servant came along. His mind was stricken, filth was gone, in doubt and made, filth remained. He walked on four-legs, a cradle of mankind inside his gut remained. As his skin-deformed robust-pushing girth came out and started dragging itself and coming out, as their ancient temples made of gut, almost to their likings came to dread the shroud of blood water pouring out of his gut-holes.

‘That man is a stooping hive. He ought to be punished and forced to abide our doings.’

‘One man at a time now, one man at a time, there’s no need to push yourselves out of the way.

And naught that may be done.’

‘Don’t eat the bread, it’s infested.’

‘Good point, I shall only force myself to eat no legs.’

‘Eat the fish, they’re filled with scum-green and growths of moss-like lichen probes.’

Which were hard and spherical and appeared to have their tops nearing the likeness of spears used to impale it from above. Though those spears were soft and flaccid, and ought to be put down. Fealty to no shroud, they wanted to eat and eat, around, leaping in death, the fish could not be even more forlorn now as those spear-like green drone-extensions made it to the floor as they would start moving the fish on their own.

‘Grab them and show your mouth full.’

But what was that about? And whence would all the scum be?’

From day to day the Tronder-man appeared from the distance, bearing news of laceration and the creation of a legless man.

‘We carried him through upon a trough and managed to throwing him into the pit of scum from which his body gums had eaten him.’

But lo' the deformation was only spreading, as it spared none, wrought and gone, fealty had only shown itself to have begun.

'I see a man, and he is broke, we need to steal from him, past the hope that he might rise. We have to act immorally inclined.'

'Man of Filth, return and do as I say.'

He called upon him, on the way and through the contorted moving cattle-bulked building, of which texture was only shaped like them but appeared to push out as it floated along the way.

'We walk on crystalline cranes of steel and appeal to dead-rats.

They shall walk upon us.'

A bridge was set and on it they walked.

'God of filth, I see that you've approached me.'

For the bridge extended into the back side of the strange hut and entered it, as well as the Man of Filth could not, for the likes of him wonder, who was he and why was he stronger than he?'

From both rooms a single hole appeared and from both direction, the bodies of both Mouse and Red came to the Man of Filth, the servant and the God himself whom, on a whim chose to elate himself with their presence. No satisfaction could be direr, it could not be tainted even more.

'I have dreamed of it, you know? '

'What of it? What have you dreamt off?'

'I have dreamt of it, I said.'

'Of what?'

Mouse asked again, now even more irritated than before.

'There, in the distance, a platform on a giant flat rendition of the moon, standing on giant worm-like hounds and hyenas that are eating from below it.

And that platform it kept by giant long-tunnel pipes of which piles are contorting and bending as if to melt inside it and bear through. Filthily-made and contorted, as well, my servants are there and all of them are so-much alike.

For they bear the lower trunks of men on tubes and the top of it, to bear, the upper body of Guenon as well. They are my servants, for they know of culprit sounds and those creatures in the outer-worlds who want to enter my world in doubt.'

For even Filth knew and feared him, the maker of all the creatures whose deformed faced enacted a square-like foundation. Of which creating, from this window came a single element of filth, the girth within it being vile, defiled by degeneracy of change.

‘And from the rounded-hills inside of it, I know, I shall bother myself naught with what went on, but eat it. But the child of space, the infant-mage shall cast a dark curse upon him and mixed with my servants as if to produce.

Out of the belly of its spawn the large deflector, a girth of manifold beasts, tied together in the ark-of-gist. It would force my servants to repent and after that, of evil tent, in which they spare none but see.’

Man in Strange Black Room-Box, Inside a Deformed Airplane-Cage

A small storage-like room filled with stuffed asylum-like plates, darker in shade than in color with the man standing at the table facing the lady investigator.

‘What’s your name, kid?’

‘They call me Cones, partner, but you wouldn’t understand the meaning.’

‘Shoot me.’

‘SO be it.’

Cones pulled a gun from his pocket, a small hand-held portable revolver and shot her between the eyes. The investigator fell on the floor. Another one came and took her place.

‘Are you ready to talk now?’

‘Of course I am, so, what are waiting for?’

‘Weeding out the dumb-ones, the bimbos, you know? You should know, so, right? I’ve read your manifesto. It’s trash.’

‘You’re unintelligent.’

‘And you’re the one caught in a cage Cones.’

Click, click, no bullet left in the barrel.’

‘What did you expect would happen?’

Name tag on her chest, this one bore one, Wilmot Rose, her name was Wilmot Rose.

The other one, who was bleeding on the floor didn’t have a thing on her.

‘Come to think of it, yes, I think you have.’

He smiled, he understood.

Done for, done for.

‘What made you do it, kid?’

‘Blow me.’

‘I’m being serious, I’m your friend here. You didn’t really killed that woman, you know?’

‘I can see her bleeding on the floor.’

‘Look again.’

‘How did you do that?’

‘I don’t know, look again.’

‘Stop it already.’

‘Ready to confess?’

‘Women can’t be men of cloth, unless I’m wrong about something.’

‘Don’t get cute with me. We’re keeping a professional relationship here, remember?’

‘So what did you want to know now?’

‘Why did you do it?’

‘It’s none of your business.’

‘And you need to eat.’

Four hours pass, nothing but water given, from above him. A trap door opens, from which a small man that looked like a small deformed starved other-prisoner whose back-body is held by another one that’s held by another leading to a block of black that’s being seen and surrounded and pushed around into a tiny speck of tiny eyes remained there.

Though once they reached the light, one could see no eyes but long iris-shaped glowing hands, where the upper eye-lids were but the nails covering them. Most fingers were put together into one. He didn’t know how to react or why they were doing this. As a matter of fact, this was all wrong, not even in his head. He was beaten to it, thinking. What to do?

The woman came back.

‘Rose, was it? I had to think for a while. Why are they still there?’

‘I called them in, do you like their hands?’

‘You can see them?’

‘These ones are real, I can assure you. As deformed as they are, they are my children. They moved in my work-station because it’s much easier for me to take care of them. I suppose. I’m afraid that one day they’ll find out that I’m not their real mother but a scorpion-infested leper brood from the dead-fetus of which they spawned out of upon my failure to bring them to this world.’

‘All right.’

‘I’m glad you’re my friend. Tell me why you did it.’

‘I was inspired by two main things.’

‘Go on, I’m listening.’

‘Come to think of it, this wouldn’t be safe for me to talk about, they could hear.’

‘Who?’

‘Your children could.’

Rose took a few moments to snap him back to reality. After snapping her fingers a few time, he finally flung himself over.

‘What’s that?’

‘Music coming from the velvet-room, care to see it?’

‘Certainly, come on. Will you tell me why am I trapped in here?’

‘You’ve done something terrible, remember?’

You didn’t shoot anyone, you’ve smashed their fingers in, triggering the destruction of the complex. Down there, you shot them after.

Eighteen generals, all dead, stepped in, with their inbred-fingers melted on top of the balloon-buttons.

But that’s irrelevant, don’t you get it yet?

You’ve stricken yourself down, haven’t you?

‘What do you mean?’

‘You still don’t get it, do you kid?’

Look around you, it’s already done, you’re done. There’s no return to how things had been, there’s no cage that could hold you either.

You’re, it’s hard to stay, you’re not in a limbo, you’re not in some hellish landscape, you’re caught, struck in place, you can’t think rightly, do you understand?

It's all nonsensical really. But I'd like to think of it as a waiting zone before another emotion kicks in and blinds you. Otherwise, seriously, life would and ought to be taken away from you. It's simple, it's delusional.

You're not anchored to a place and that's the worst thing ever, that's the worst possible thing a man could admit. You could leave all this behind and feel no guilt whatsoever. What of your family? Can't think of them either, and next thing you know they're lost.'

'You're messing with me on purpose, Rose. I know what's happening around me, I am in control. I am, don't look at me this way.'

Long stretch of a hallway, leading not a velvet room, but an abstractedly deformed velvet pattern all around his reach, made to look like some checkboard pattern, not squared, but in the shape of cut-gems.

'Running out of time now, don't stand there.

Don't be distracted by the dead-dogs now. There will still be time for that later. Don't look behind, it's the Moor, his blade is sharpened.'

And the Moor grinned, as his hand, from inside his chest only threw itself forward and grew, now bearing a spine, as if a thing of its own. Unable to feel itself any longer, numbed by pain and elated, too grown. Outwardly thrown and seemingly pushing on with long curved fly-trap like fingers that planted themselves inwardly into the back of their palm. As deranged as he had been, the Moor was taller, darker, even his desert garbs were colored-tawny, bronze-rust, or copper. And the mouth which rotated-attached to the hilt of the blade, from which each tooth bore his face had a worse, more malignant look to them as they extended out of their gums.

Strangler over, incapable of singing as they starved, never to be satiated; worst of all was that strange arm-thing which drove itself into him.

As the blade lost its sharpness, for the worst of wear, it had been defiled, grown in fat although metal could not grow. It felt as if, strangely as it's been, someone coated the blade, or it had been fattened by the insides of the Moor's arm.

'He is definitely going to kill you this time around.'

'He's dead, he's not supposed to be here, Rose.

Help me you dumb whore.'

'That's not a nice way of talking to someone you're supposed to be asking the help off.

How about you try again before he reaches us?'

It was all so broken, the hallway, in the back. It started growing, expanding, as if the mere defilement of the Moor's size pushed every wall out of the way, out of the socket, drearily pushing in and out behind him, as it only expanded to fit his stature. And the mere deformation looked like a bizarre off-shot of waves which pushed everywhere around.

‘Think again, kid.

Ask me nicely, there’s still time to escape him, or you may as well get what you deserve. You realize that, right?

They’ll catch you.’

Door, he entered the room, trying to search for a lock. It was too plain inside. Large blue-domed carpet, and a strange lamp shaped like a crab without its pincers, bearing its every leg around, even an extra set from the front and the back. And they fell down in the same way spaghetti fell. Someone also came in the room and painted the walls with a large -foam high-density paint roller bough from one of the Dep stores, from Milwaukee, Delaware.

‘Fuck up place, isn’t it?’

‘I haven’t seen you enter the room, where’d you come from?’

‘You held the door for me, remember?’

As much as I’ve come to appreciate what you’ve done for me, unfortunately, I’m afraid that, you know, you still haven’t apologized to me. And from the looks of it.’

Front wall, door in the front, near the edge of the room where the corner met the main hallway. The farthest corner to the right started curving at the edge, upwardly, as if it were the bell-curve, the top of it, leading to the highest peak, but not to the other end of the spectrum. He stopped there for a moment, most likely planning.

He remembered what that “blade” looked like now. As thick and deformed as a stunt-gun. Within a whiff, he could crush the wall, if only he wanted to do so.

‘Stop stalling kid, if you know what’s better for you.’

‘Why did you ask me if you knew?’

‘Are you seriously going to do this here? Do you have the time for it?’

‘I don’t.

Fine, I apologize.’

Rose quickly pushed him out of the way, then quickly locked the door. Blasted thing, dreadful thing, unworking, all too convenient.

‘Great, I’m glad you’ve taken yourself by the heel, now do it again.’

They started going in circles.

Part of the floor opened, half of it missing. Of course that by now, he couldn’t care less, it was all too lost on him. He didn’t know what to say.

‘Rose, are you certain that it’s safe going down there?’

‘No. I don’t think it is.

What’s even down there?’

Looking down the hole, one could see but the staircase leading to the carpet-room. But as one would go down there, he could see, something else. As if from the flash of a mind, room, like that of an opera, leading to a giant window that’s seated between two more stairways leading to a much higher place. That entryway was peculiar at most, as it only resonated to another strange location to the right side of the entry. Which in itself almost lead to a tower-side, as if it was part of castle, a room where experiments would be made as well by a strange woman.

A flying malformation setting off a ledge, but that was far away and incontestably meaningless at this point, as the staircase only lead even deeper than before, set in line, perhaps another time.

‘We leave when?’

‘Whenever we can, it’s important that we find a way to make it in time. Just to be sure, I’ll have made. I.’

She couldn’t think of it right now, but Rose was almost a lip off the street.’

‘I think we escaped the Moor.’

‘Are you sure about that, Cones? He could still be out there. Care to turn around and check out?’

Mid-way down the stairs, both of them caught that way. Frozen as they looked above, seemingly unable to understand what was going on or why. Why was there a light, uncanny, broken and defiled, piled underneath the caved-in boiler-sound, and from the highest peaks, and whence they would’ve been. Where surroundings bent, and everything wronged-upon, looked as if it had been swollen, there he lay, looking down on them with the likes of which only a beast of a kind would seem to bear. Dreadful in a piece, to smolder, unable to spare them in wonder as if he were to approach, there was only the shaking force caused by its total weight, that bounced around and heavily brought to pain.

‘We shall not remain here, alas, unless you want to fear it come.’

Farther than the Enclave

‘I seem to think we’ve been here before, haven’t we?’

Quexxltl’Less, of whose knife brandished started pushing out and pouring in, rightly through his side-lance.

‘I think we’ve been walking for long enough.

Down with them, empty your pockets, now, before I slit your fingers off.’

Near the bridge, past the tavern, where lay the single mushroom patched of colors blue, red and dots of empty, moss polka-dot thing on top of it.

‘Dreadfully far, isn’t it?’

Lekkl asked the petty men. Eight of them put down around a single wrap of woolen-bed wrap, of brown tawny skin of leper.

‘I see that there’s something better coming down the way.’

‘And what of us?’

‘Wriggle harder, perhaps your pockets will fall down.’

Another eight or so approached. From the distance, whence and so.

They noticed that something was wrong, even from the distance, whence there was no carriage but a giant open horse that was put on the side. He would have to be opened, near a pelt of skin displayed on sticks, revealing as much as its open ribs and empty seats on which the disgusting men had been on.

The horse was still pouting and could only wonder so. When would my master come, and why must I wait for them to be done with me before I may go?

Yet his mouth, despite the way in which it was jerking and fumigating, like the weird peculiar thing it was, it could only draw and push as much as it could on the side. It was peculiar, truly in every sense. But this oil maker between the teeth could only draw sustenance from the food it ate around itself. Flies had come and fed it their young. But no bot-fly would be planted, out of the fear such a malignant horse would enact upon them.

‘Dreadful, dreadful, dreadful manner, I see no shower abound, the glory.

But a few peculiar men stranded and wrapped.’

Came the Gallant-Peril Mude, of which peril could not be understood. It was all too fallen, all too out of place. Disgraceful as it had been, rummaging along the face of the planet, where they had been, as quieting as their songs would carry. Not to many yet to ask, akin, a few and better lass.

‘Should we not free them, my lord?’

‘I see no reason to do it, just look at them for a moment.

Tawny clothed, like peasants in robes that are encased in dirt. Is it not fantastically worn out for either of us right now?

Should we truly look in another direction now that this had been brought to our attention?

I see foul marks of foul play. Such as the likes of which I may never be able to convey, what do songs unruly tell of it?’

And thence he asked his servant so, while he might render of no quiet woe. There had to be something to deny, of a while, the kind of which he tried.

Of homes, of which his master bore, of tiny speckles of disastrous whores he had used before and other picks a many he had carried with him.

‘But what of it? There in distance, yonder, whereas wind is stronger than the clouds, and the nettling of winds, the strongest. Whence might they hear of the songs of Alabaster?’

‘I do not know master, but should we not leave?’

For peril lay ahead, they knew that, or else, deathless of kind. The horse bore a single cut from which eight heads came out, without a throat, just floating them, one by one they started floating outside, skull-like, transparent-skin, bearing skin chairs which dragging the horse on a chain.

‘We set in flight then, and let it be known. We shall come here no more and seek no compassion for we were cheated yet in fight.’

And a dance of atrocities in the air, for fear might not even do for what was fair. Of deathless song, you’re broken. Destroyed and petty, petty, and petty, entrance.

Thence the two assassins were done contorting the poison of the sewers, made from a single man’s head whose wings were spread but shot down, he split his head and died away. And he was one of them, those who revealed, that their bodies were hidden in a circle of meat inside their throat.

‘Defeat, defeat and much defeat, is there no greater peril to look after?’

‘But what is that yonder you feel, in fright? Has something happened?’

‘Nigh, my heart would not subside, I feel. In the same way a despot would heel to step.’

For every step he went on. Of no better worthlessness had found him so. He left trails of steps made out in numbers of the dead, but there in distance, another one brought so. It could only be accounted, as distraught and petty, never to be looked upon, slightly in the making, hence.

Had he been called and looked upon the evil plains, he would’ve known what had remained of lands in times like this.

For that was nothing short but a pocket that was being brought, even wider and more deformed. Even darker as if it had been forged out of the replica of a hill, much reflected in dark colors, even melting upon a short of fallen stars that had been eaten by it, for smoke would leave no trail by far. Instead, for what was going there, on distance and in fairness of despair, one could come with only but to strangle and ever after know of what was plain. Of destruction it brought plenty, for once the evil inside would descent, nothing shall be left of the land.

And in sight, in the making, in the dark, skin was flaking, for that dark-hill rock-like metal of evil of which upper sides seemed to be like steps that would be stacked upon each other, the marks of words and plenty scraping. Of each side the hands were plenty, yet there were no bodies carrying them at all. Way too broken and forlorn, not to abide, the fiends were not plain of air nor unseen.

That pocket was merely carrying itself within a patch of ground upon which it dragged itself around, leaving but a trail of despair behind it.

Whoever were the knights of plenty, and whomever had tried lifting those up, they had died a long time ago, the kinder of their light had gone there, inside of it, whence none remained. But their hands, their hands, or moreover gloves, of which kind and betterment had been set aside and put to shame. In place and in the making, in den of vileness and peace that went to shreds, for it was coming along their way.

‘Shall we leave, or scourge each call? Have we fallen that far that we would allow such creatures to die off?’

‘Let them be so, and who shall be so plain as to care about them when one was wrong of hand?’

They haven’t wriggled yet and I see no coin and waste for naught.’

‘Better yet, drop dead, to the sound and to the making of a fading thing. I see that it bear only tiny specks that die within the air, the smoke of evil be contained. In the ground and everywhere around, in the shrouds of a fire, I see it now.’

But there was no scorched land in no vision taken by no one near the pocket, instead, the ones that cried only saw this instead. Hardened, a vision boiled, of replicas of uncanny torn to shreds, and many beds and worn-out homes stranded, somewhere in the air, upstanding. Nowhere near to be seen, no pillars within but the most out of this world remotely standing flight of crowns and wrapped around shrouds that were wrapped around. Filthy hands had touched them before, leaving marks of finger-shores.

In the distance he had bled. For whoever was enacting this pact of vileness, better he be dead.

‘Aye, I think we better leave them be.’

And two assassins on their way, never to be seen.

While there, as it came, no longer deranged, the pocket of evil trampled the men in a mere matter of seconds, of which weight could not be deterred. Lost to thought, they lost themselves, unfairly to be gone as well.

Of Dark Warlock, Sorcerer and Whichever Title that may be

‘I am your apprentice.’

But he wore the head atop the heel of his forehead, drawing too far away from his head, almost ripping out his head along the way. It was petty, he did know. But he could not do it, as to lick out of his eyes and wonder. Where the stronger man had gone, the ones that would fight for them upon an age that ran through, but he?

Peght'Eye, who was one who served the skin-computing thing on top his head, upon the display would wonder as to starve off the ones that pushed him away.

He bore too many commuters that were being attached, from which, upon a flash, they started wriggling all of those cables attached to his head. No wonder of the straying, no pettiness would tell. Of wonder which the yonder heavy torturing device which infested his skin, along the way, there came a spike-disease he had taken a kindly pleasure into rubbing over his open throated gush. Only to feel the pain from time to time, it would just do, it would just do.

‘I wish I knew why I’m doing this so.’

But never wonder, why the flying beasts of which wings encompassed bodies as sea rays, with the heaviness of a weighted down sack carrying and inverted giant tower of fat that twitched as it grew even slimmer below its pride.

From the top a different carpet of skin, from the top of which long legs pulled out, then curved around every joint as they connected to the same top, forming ninety degree clockwise turned rotated C’s that were pumping blood within themselves and appeared to be drawing even father in the air, twice as far as the entire size of the worn-out turned around towers.

For at times the fat became sweat and it had to be dissipated everywhere around instead, just so it might drip from where it stood and wet the sand since there was no rain or fauna to come around.

And both the apprentice and the other ignored the creatures since they feared the shower might turn from water to fat-acids which would destroy their home, upon which they sworn each other to be there, forlorn and placed upon as they came to be. There were dead hours, dead hours at bay, especially in the distance where they lay.

Rose and Cones

‘Yes, I’m thinking, care you explain to me, Rose, if you were so kindly endowed, why are in a carpet room?’

Although, to be more precise about it, the carpet room was indeed different than anything else, or to be more precise about it, the carpet was. Every fiber and every hair from which the carpet had been made was wrought out of the texture of a morbidly dead mammal-creature, merged with the likes of pure hatred for humanity. For its own sake, it was boiling in front of them now, and even deeper into the carpet, as a giant drop, such as the likes of a nuclear warhead, there was a dead-stretch waiting.

It was there that John-Trunk had once been lost and wandering about, trying to find a way out of the molochain moss upon which he walked.

‘Tell me, Rose, again, I’m going to ask you this, why are we here?’

‘You wanted to get away from the Moor, have you not?’

‘I suppose I have, but here? This looks worse.’

‘Beggars can’t be choosers.’

‘I already apologized. Or think I have.’

‘Well, why don’t you step on the carpet, kid? Go on, step on the carpet.’

‘I don’t trust you.’

‘I got you this far, haven’t I?’

It looked all too normal, especially with the faces being imprinted, now there being in hundreds, grown like a disease. And as a matter of fact they weren’t even flat, as they were raised up, a few centimeters at a time until their features could be seen and touched. Some noses, lips and eyes were thrown out and appeared to have a visible disjointedness from the area from which they sprouted, from where one could see another flatness, like that of a block. Underneath those faces, of the main facia that was being projected from below, there was a flatter copy of all the faces, supporting them. Fakes stood on top the real ones which were guarded, none may touch and abuse them.

For they feared abuse the most, and wore the other faces like masks; it was only that way it could guard itself. As the carpet’s very nature was that of a human. It was humane, although it could not speak properly, nor would it be heard as the voices were mainly inconsistent, to the rows and the worst approach. No mindedness of the kind could shelter it from evil. As much as it behaved itself, berated in place, this was it.

‘You’re seeing as much as I think we’ll see.’

‘Can we at least, Rose? I think he’s still up there.’

Cones turned around and began approaching. He had seen the empty up-way leading to the highest peak, towards the door from which they came.

It was all too tainted.

‘Why, I could not fathom thinking of something else, I can see it, there in the distance, upon dances of stones and the mourning of his own, can you not see it either?’

‘What is it?’

‘It’s that dream that fiend, that creature-despot Ogoth had. For his likes had dreams of his urn, the vase, upon which he had become forlorn and broken, pierced and thrown away. All too broken to be left, too deformed, and better yet.

I see him still and can still hear him yapping. From within and without, from the depths and the shroud might over cover his dreadful-paned look. He of a Pan-species of old, shall break and dissolve what’s left of his world, he left it so. Everything’s being encompassed.’

‘And yet, you hear them come?’

‘Indeed, I do, I can envision them as well.’

‘Who are they?’

‘Servants, tribes, peoples, deformed creatures standing upon a giant plant-like growth which had encompassed the entire planet with everyone trapped inside of it, dreading to be so. I know it, I can see it even now.’

‘Please tell me it’s but a farce, for it could not be so otherwise.’

‘Yet, it’s plain to see that there’s some kind of agony that’s being shared. By them in a giant land of despair, as they know they’re trapped as the bulk of the being is that vase-like urn that’s wrapped in his image, from which the roots malformed legs carry them around the transparent sphere. Mechanisms set in a pseudo-space floating and for what reason?’

‘I couldn’t tell of it.’

‘His claims must’ve been true, he must’ve been some lamentable figure like that of a god, it must’ve been so. His own shrine-like figure carrying a globe, like Atlas, as to doubt the bloodying of the globe he carried. His fealty could only drag away, I say we leave the sight before he comes along the way.’

‘I see that.’

And though he had been spaced out, he feared.

‘What is that? There in the distance.’

Distraught they looked out of their way, unable to comprehend what was happening, or whence it lay. A queer yet bizarre sight, one that would enact, something to be caught.

It was a tall broad-chested man. His eyes bore tiny razors shaped in them. His arms were thinner, his pats were that of a ballet-dancer. Red normal shoes and gauntlets that were like those of a bleakly colored standing fencer; but belt though tilted, bore a cross, a skull, an eye-deformed, which only distracted from the fact that he owned. But a strangled noose, of metal shook, wiry around his throat, and melted, part of his throat, defected as his head was both there and around him. Or even more so, he was inside a giant projection of his giant head. And every time he spoke, one could see the head open its mouth as well.

But there was still hope to see a neck, and think of it as a giant projection, instead of just that of his head. For one could see below his feet, an even darker-ring of pins, made to look like they were eating, his mind was sleeping, his brain had been shattered, for behind his head one could see a crack that went after and entered him. Finally he was at peace, having stopped worrying, for what little was left of his cortex in that open box-he-named-a-skull was brought to nothing but a dryness like that of a woman whose menstruation cycle had gone to pass.

He was Rowalt, spelled like Dolt with an R instead of the D.

Day one, ever since their meeting.

They’ve been staring at him for years.

He was a strange person who didn't understand how to begin conversations, so they waited, thinking.

‘What is he going to do?’

Correction, thinking out loud, what a peculiar sight, indeed, seeing that strange giant thing that approached them from the distance, trying to cut their fingers, despite being a giant whose face was Ogoth.

The sky was green-blue with a magenta aurora on top of it, as if layered through. Falling objects could be seen from the distance, like the falling parts of an abandoned sinking ship.

And the ground was tainted and ugly-looking, perilously touched by war.

Both of them were think.

One was Rink and the other was Rette-Verdi, like the composer.

‘Bones, I think, we have to use them to draw a map.’

‘Do it on the ground.’

Said Rink, but he didn't follow.

‘Think he's listening on our private conversation?’

‘He's only a few feet away from us, isn't he?’

‘Indeed he is, I think it so. I think we should, you know.’

‘What?’

‘Exactly, wait for a while and see whether or not he can hear us.’

‘What if he can see us?’

They were just close enough to see the spectral image that was in reality his house. He was trapped in it. That was confirmed by the fact that it had become stationary and he resided in it. Like a mime living in an invisible home.

‘We should calculate the trajectory of which he might decide to approach us towards.’

‘No, I think, yes, indeed, it would be, frankly simple, to calculate the trajectory of the entire solar system just by looking at it with one of our great lenses.’

‘I think you're wrong there, buddy.’

‘Greater lenses, special lenses attached to the greatest of satellites that would convert the complete trajectory of the long trail of light that's being carried over by dead stars in order to.

You know what I'm trying to say, right? We could convert the light-wave, as fat and solid of a wall as it must be into a reflective material, which would mirror as many stars, planets and galaxies as there are.’

‘A lens would not be enough for that.’

‘Whatever, but something ought to be used to bounce the refraction from the light upon the planets and way back, it must be so.’

‘I shall eat your throat.’

So spoke Rink.

Weird City of Decay

Couldn’t recall the name of the city, something Port’s UAC, military field, plants of metal, army men around, no citizens living, guns plowed down.

‘Grinding the fields, it’s as much as I can tell you Pagan-Beggar.’

‘What does that even mean?’

And why did you call me that.’

‘Wait a minute.’

One of the recluse-cars drove through. Hollow on the inside, no drive, no automaton-drive making it go.

‘You don’t understand.’

‘Come again?’

‘It’s kicked back again, it’s in my system, I think.’

‘Hold him down.’

The man waves for four others to come. They pin down the Pagan-Beggar, or attempt to make him sit. One eye discolored, as are his teeth.

‘He’s been touched again, hasn’t he?’

‘He was, I think we need to give him another sedative.

It should calm him down.’

Twenty minutes or so pass.

The Pagan-Beggar wakes up on another side of the town, wondering what happened. Many soldiers had already been done grinding bone-girdles and guts, making various coats placed around the cartilage of the nearest building. Not cartilage, coat-wax-like, a mixed substance, green-ocher-red, too had to detect by eye, not from the distance.

‘I need some help here.’

Pagan-Beggar said. First time in a long time he questioned just why.

‘I’m not going to let you ignore me.’

‘We’re not, but you need to leave the place.’

‘Or else what?’

‘How about your head being grinded in?’

‘I’m serious.’

‘As am I.’

‘Then piss off.’

He walked away, next two set of streets, always walking, through the same roads, the same blocks, traffic hours, with the exception of the block across the road, where most of the cars were being placed in.

‘Warning.’

Said one of the soldier, with an almost mechanically elated word, lost to him.

‘The doors are closing.’

And just then, right as he looked, every building around the city swooped in, without a single one leaving a fraction of a space to look in. Too many of them, too fast, not enough space to leave by, while the only man in front of him was surrounded by cars.

‘I wish I remembered why I’m here.’

‘It’s going to get a lot worse than this, do you understand? You’ve been warned once. You’ve been checked again.

Show me your ID.’

‘I don’t have one on me.’

‘You’re getting another sedative.’

Pagan-Beggar stopped, waited, received it, then waited. No sleep this time, no different location. His blood coagulated a bit, but he expected just as much. What a terrible thing.

‘We keep finding each other here, don’t we?’

‘I’ve never left the spot.’

‘But I have and I’ve been walking around for the past twenty minutes or so. Can you see it?’

Look at my fingers.’

An old trick, but it’s never gone rightfully so. He’s missed a finger, two, then the time was go. Before a blink, he raised all five of his fingers.

‘How many fingers am I keeping up?’

‘I don’t know. You keep switching between them.’

‘I’m not. Get into that car inside the barricade and wait inside. I’ll call someone to sit with you for a while.’

‘Why are you doing this?’

‘I’m going to help you.’

Two more soldiers came after an hour. The hood was off but the door hadn’t been locked for long. It was tiresome, knowing it. So many buildings looking at him, it fed into the same obsession.

‘Here, he’s here, you know?’

Watch him for a few hours, sorry, Pass, but this is as much as I can do for you. No regrets here, but I think.’

Sight, he needed it. At the very least he was in a secure location. He didn’t ask for more.

‘When are we leaving?’

‘Don’t talk.’

‘But I’ve been reminded, haven’t I?’

I feel the urge coming back again, after all, it’s just a small incision, isn’t it?’

People decay left and right around the world. It’s not something moral but physical, after enough abuse of chemicals, of the foundation of which men become, not like plants but the embodiment of a layered abstraction on top of the body of a man. For example, the image of some senseless patches of naturally grown, forced colors, defiled and put on top of man, then forced to boil and become him as he would decay and be spoiled with acid as if to melt. Thrown around as he could not force himself out of the way. And some of them were brought here, by force, living in co-habitation with the soldiers, of whose senseless charades could only dread so much along the way.

Still it was hard felt, in the distance, that blasted image, in that manor-like room. Not the window but the door to the side, which lead down the stairs to the room where experiments were being made. Why would one be forced to stare? And why the one set in flight as well as the others? Blasted creature that it was, desperation had caught it as if it had been speared down. Although too foggy, who was she? What was she doing there and what was the point of the experiments she was doing?

Could that be but a child? There were others she had made, which were set in flight, seen as giant deformed creatures, too had to be pinpointed down.

A servant would have to take care of her in old age, but of it, what of it?

‘What happened, woman?’

‘I’ve overextended myself, that much I know now. I should’ve never done this to begin with, but now, they’re all gone.

My creations left me now and I may never be able to find them, whence spared.’

Her laboratory remained in shambles and looked as if someone had broken it concretely so. Phials, filled with reddened blood, tables of wood, a cabinet, on the wall. But most importantly, that stairway leading above, as if they were inside the top of a tower attached to a castle instead of a manor; queerly so, one could not get away from the sight, of the flight she might do, in doubt, set in flight as if to return and then mourn herself as she went on, back into her place.

‘They left the laboratory during my absence.’

‘Think there’s something you could dread to be?’

‘I missed it already.’

Filthy vision, distracting from a point of vileness, that dreaded sight generated from above the room, from that filthy spot. Peculiar angle, it was so. Seeing it from there was only the wretched thing that gone through it, never to know and search for it.

‘Angle, remember the angles which connect memories, oh filthy mind.’

Seen from above, the city was broken, half of it in any case.

Port’s UAC, some spots were seemingly contaminated, but not my something which would infest a man, instead only the Decayed could be, of which growth would deform their worthless bodies into the lanes upon which they’d place themselves.

‘For how long have I been sleeping?’

‘Pagan, I think you’ve been out for twenty minutes or so.

Everyone’s been wondering where you’ve been.’

Still inside the car.

‘What do you mean by that?’

‘Take a look outside and you’ll understand, perhaps you will. But do not blame me if you don’t like what you see.’

So many of them waiting, them, leading to the formation of a most unsatisfactorily set-sight, dreadful to the eye and to the observation which was distress; for starters, there was no reason to look past the pressed ones, into the ground, or the long-headed circulatory systems they spread around one another. Right from behind, their bags or pouches, from inside their heels, some of them being worn awkwardly and pushed out through their lower sides, managed to still worn out the fields of grounds. The governmental patched area, where their filth pushed through, below where they formed the centipedal-unity of a star. Though it was not normal by any means as they were bent and almost came to creep and abandon every leg behind. As a cult would form tails instead, paralyzingly at first, incline to create tails out of the symbiosis of their legs, bones protruding as well, as to explain it.

‘But why would they abandon leggings?’

‘They’re too worn out, you see, dear experiment.’

‘You’re not the same man I’ve spoke to before.’

‘Oh, right, I almost forgot.’

The other Gov took out a note and started fashioning something out of his sleeve.

‘I’m supposed to read this to you. Ehm; oh, wait.’

He put the note down as fast as possible before he could be caught in action. Instead of saying a thing, he’s lifted three fingers, two keeping the syringe on between the thumb and the pinkie. To his supposal, this sick bastard might’ve rubbed one out while he was asleep. It was that disgusting thing, the general feeling that was being shared between them, between the homos. They had that incredibly wrong thing that made them stand out, one couldn’t put it past them.

‘I’m leaving in.’

Not of anything but the fear that he might do something to him if he was so inclined to find him sitting where he was. Not to be alone with him for too long now.

But now, poor Beggar, poor Pagan walked between them.

‘Where you think you’re going? I was given direct orders that I ought not to let you fly past he radar, like you always do.’

‘Stand back.’

‘Don’t get mixed with this, I don’t want any trouble now, but I won’t, I won’t shy away from using force.’

He backed away, a wise choice which stuffed the candles around the top of every building that had formed a crown, with teddy-bear-like stuffing which pushed the flames around as the bear-like forms arose. From their open mouths strident green-sharp stings came out, harpoon-edges from four directions, all cut through, but made of skin instead of metal, as was the “wax” as well as the creatures that were wriggling out o the pain of being constantly burnt while being choked by the stings.

‘I see that we’re given a signal. It’s sleeping time.’

The lights were slowly to be elated and pushed out of their way. It was all done and for a while, there was no emotion, or at least no other emotion than that of empathy being wasted. Dragged on and dribbling around. There was something in the air.

‘Did you hear that?’

It’s napping time and I’m about to follow through with what I promised.’

Must’ve been when he was asleep, not that he could test it by any means, that’s why he ran and left the sleeping decayed out in the open, hibernating for the following hours. But doors were struck down and locked from inside, not normally so, but from the other side, as if they were gapped. Brought to their attention there, he had to go before being caught between his snout, he almost made it.

Right around the first street, where he turned upon the curved-side of a lane’

An opening, it had to be the missing corner, belonging to one of the buildings, missing for some reason. There he leaped inside of it, or was pulled by force, drawn in.

He had fallen, less obscure, protruding as not to ask, if the Moor had made, let it be just as well known.

‘Leeway, I ask for leeway then.’

‘And who is speaking?’

‘I am, for I feel no fealty and might not come onto it already.’

They spoke no less than it was required and those who were silent would admire the fashioning of death-strides, of which no doubt, had yet inclined. There was filth all around them. There, in the distance, spacing but the clouds of dust, the shrine about the world, uncanny.

‘Long so, as it had been, I see no reason but to thin the waiting.’

‘What do you wish of us then?’

Asked Rose, thought she could think of nothing more.’

‘You cannot wake up from it yet.’

‘I’ve been wanting to do it for a while now, Rose.’

Cones still looked unsure.

‘Slit your wrist then and bleed into the carpet, you ought to, you need to, it’s what’s needed.’

And there was not even the slightest chance that he might do it.

‘Why?’

‘Because we need to reach the castle and it can only be done that way.’

And Rose of Pox said it so, for she had known of it, from the body of which the castle was wrung in its bearings.

For the carpet lead to it, in the distance, right before it could disappear again, for the body spoke to her again in dreams.

There was a Beautiful Pink Moon

A gift, perhaps, for Elegant, and the strange creature that was the Proto-being, near which, what had been brought with them, lay a single grave buried on it, underneath two willows, where a man named Last rested in.

It took her a while to think about it, but Rose thought of something.

‘I think we should ethnically cleanse some of the inferior races as well.

Why, I hold the general belief that most of the races are way too bothersome to keep around and ought to be completely removed by any means possible.

I think that some of them should have their throats slit, skin peeled off and be lynched for no other reason other than the fact that I loathe them and I loathe their existence.

I would definitely ethnically cleanse all of them, without any piece of remorse whatsoever and I think I will. One day, I, Rose Fitzgerald shall run a campaign, run for presidency and ethnically cleanse the inferior specimens of our country. What do you think about it, kid?’

Cones was utterly shocked, more so than how she pointed out that he ought to have cut vertically rather than horizontally, straight up the road, not across, or a gun curved beneath his Adam’s apple instead of pushing his chin forward as he’s aiming.

‘Great, I think we’re making progress here.’

Scourging essence of black-filth

‘There’s but one thing left to do now, isn’t it?’

‘What?’

‘Since your memory is broken, we have to kill them, all of them, one by one.

They can only be saved by being killed, one by one, do you understand?

Make sure no one is spared.’

‘How will that fix our problems then?’

‘It’s simple, actually, it’s incredibly simple, just find them when you can and put an end to them. Stop them if you could, poison everything, make sure you kill the starving beast.’

Dressed in velvet checkerboard patterns, large coat.

‘Right but what after?’

‘Then you’ll stop being confused, I think.

Come on, grab a knife and start cutting, make sure that no one survives in here.

We can definitely make up for our losses afterwards. Just make sure you cut deep and don’t allow for anything to make it through.’

‘I don’t know about that, friend, but this sound incredibly paranoid.’

‘Indeed it sounds, but make sure you won’t choke on your blood too soon now. We don’t want you to fantasize again until they’re put to rest.’

‘Rightly so.’

‘Who said that?’

Cones:

‘As I was saying.’

Shall we go down the carpet, then?’

‘After you, only after you, you know what to do.’

Said Rose, her mouth being filled with pus, had taken Cones by the hand, and made to noticed that the Moor had left, made it so only he would follow.

‘Who are you then?’

‘I am Pagan-Beggar.’

Damn it, the name stuck, like the door. It was hard to count on it, now, but he leaped inside the carpet and made do with them as they went up throng.

And whom, of which wurn-car, great Jormungdur-shaped piston could deal with, for the machine was boasting with having killed, of plenty and within its rights, many-about.

‘I am the God of Delusional-Paraphernalia, Perdue.

And as your lord and as I have shaken the world with my grown pores, I am to claim you all as my own.’

Came a voice.

‘They’re going to kill me.’

‘Run kid, run as fast as you can, they have knives, they have pitchforks and hammers on them. They’ll rape you if they catch you, they’re vile, run child and never look back.’

And the child was afraid, for he looked back and realized that he was afraid of them, of their filth and deformed looks. Vile things, breeding as they walked, part of one another, molded in part and legs, spread between one another as they shared their filth and became, of ill. Spread amongst them teeth, rabidly deformed, worn out and eaten as they pushed on.

Some strangled and filled with rust, dirt in their eyes and bloodily fornicated upon.

But he was not to be called upon, now that he thought, with them in the back laying.

‘You’re but a plume of a boy, olive and you need to leave.’

‘You want to break a tooth or something, mister?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘That jolly ol’ there fellow will backstab you if you will it.’

I still remember, yet she thought.

‘I am but a man, out of twenty.’

It started with a piece of the land, where they walked around and it felt, as likely as it were that there was no way to return not mourn for the complete destruction of the whale-shaped anchor which drove them out of the grounds. From everywhere around them missing, blue and strips of whitish-pink whereas one could drive the colors out and wink there was but one death-angler standing. And he had fished men and put them, strung by his pole as well, peculiar as it seemed to be unlikely, delights of sugar blocks floating in the clouds.

Blood was precious but not as precious as the lower intestines went missing from everyone, although they could not confirm nor deny it, as they feared the mighty comb, of words and fingers that were being driven in their covers.

‘I see a disaster coming and I’m afraid. There’s something wrong with me.’

‘What is it then?’

‘I fear that there’s something disturbing living inside of my brain and he.’

‘Who?’

‘I don’t know. I feel bad. You reminded me of something I have an ill intention thinking about.

I don’t like being here.’

‘Do you want me to call someone?’

‘No, please don’t make me leave. I just want to stay. I just want to be liked.’

‘I. I don’t hate you.’

‘You do, you must, I’ve seen you around, I know you. And I know what you’d do to me if I told you what I have in my pockets.’

‘What are you holding in your pocket?’

‘I don’t know. I don’t want to know. I don’t want to think about it.

Why would they search me? I’ve done nothing wrong, I don’t deserve that, it makes me feel bad.

Just tell me, before it’s fleeing, I only want to know. Am I bad person?’

‘I don’t know what you’re on about, but I’m going to get someone, I will.’

The man left but never returned.

In the middle of a crowd, twenty minutes later, it was all too bothersome, staying there, sitting around the face. People were staring all the way up on the escalators. Everyone was staring for the same reason. They must’ve seen them as well, thin men of stars, surrounding me.

‘I don’t know why you’re all staring, they won’t leave just because you do. You’re making them stay, and worst of all, you’re making me feel bad because I’m keeping them behind.’

Ah, bothersome thing. They were bleeding on the floors, making everything nastily encased, too much, worn-out walls, it was a maze this place, not a real one, but the architecture made it look like the inverted insides of a Gothic-castle, with all the spires in a bunch, studied by students during their formative years. They at least had the decency not to stare.

A man also lay near one of the four pillars of a long stretch. He was working on weird-looking trump which rose the nearby sleeping pups from their slumber. It was strange. It was done, finite, the men-of-stars almost took me away.

‘Listen kid, I came back. Do you want to know something?’

‘What’s going on? Who are they?’

Eight men approached, everyone was so weird and this was not their dance, for some reason, ahead, in place, all beaten away. It was gone, they were gone, just as fast as they had been.

Everyone usually leaves for strange timers, all clocked, until lights are off. Everything is strange, until the next day.

A few more people come around, everyone staying for some reason painting the walls. First, it’s a couple with a child. They’re dressed in the same way sax-player businessmen dress like, even the woman. And their child wears a strange red-dark shirt striped with words, but they’re hard to make out. Hippy-thing, he was a cap with a weird pellet on top of it.

The kid is painting a giraffe everywhere.

Then the kid watching them is left by the people of stars, whom are reminded of Freud's fear of Mars. It's strange, thinking of the Oedipus complex all of the sudden, he hadn't considered just how strange yet peculiar it was. In comparison with everything else, it appeared mundane yet out of place. Perhaps because no one could actually relate with it unless one actually came to the conclusion that their mother had some certain aesthetic look-a-like features that would make him ever more certain of being attracted to her; which can only come as quickly as that. Done in a snap before it had even begun, since it was a dangerous talk, after some point, no one wants to feel those certain things for her.

'Where's my mother?'

A little girl a few feet away from the pillar, musician on the left side, the girl on the right and the walls, both sides; leaving business-couple, the giraffe on either side. Hard to envision them being on both sides at the same time but, there was also another musician and another girl.

'What happened?'

'Lost her, she's somewhere, down into the hole, she's down there, I fear. She's calling onto me, Malice.'

'Down there?'

'Where else, if not in the hellhole where the half-bodies are?'

'I miss going there.'

Neither of us will.

'What's your name?'

And thence her name was Innocence, or Naïveté.

'Why?'

'I don't know. I just want to. Remember, you need to remember the world, don't let it slip through your fingers yet.'

I think I know how.'

'How? Tell me.'

'They'll help you remember everything. That way, we'll still exist, clever thing you are.'

We'll always exist in the vacuum somehow.'

'I shall protect you, my Innocence, I shall adopt you then. I will adopt you.'

And I shall never allow any harm to come upon you, never, no one shall harm you, never.

I shall protect you by doing evil, yes. By doing evil I say. With a pair of scissors I shall kill animals in your name and protect you.

And once you're old enough I shall give you straws only so you might blow air into a frog's mouth and blow its guts out, I shall protect you until then.'

'All right.'

The girl smiled.

'You know.'

The girl said.

'That whole shtick with killing animals is getting old.'

'Then I will kill you, then!'

And all of the sudden, the kid covered his mouth in shame, turned around as everyone aimed their eyes at him in shock, the stain.

'What did you just tell her?'

'Nothing, I didn't say anything. I didn't say anything.'

There, and there.

Everyone turned back to their wrong doings. A veil of men came in and broke some of the windows that lead outside. But it was by no means normal outside, as it seemed likely not to be something there, out. There, right.

There was a long shaft of metal pushing out, leading to a fake image that was painted in and looked as if it had been drawn by some American painter on a television show, which looked almost as if it belonged to the uncanny valley. It was all too peculiar and strange, how the windows moved around the room, and everywhere.

Even on top of the Boy's face.

'Can we start over, Innocence?'

'We certainly can.'

'I am Wylont, Wylont Peige-Hows.'

'Hey there Hows.'

And he wondered what happened that day, after the dancing stopped and he walked away, past every dancer and through the rounded curtain, wondering when dark might come and strike him down when necessary. Just so every corpse in there was place in the trepidation of string-stairs made of blue upon the now formed black ceiling of grayish-red to a crimson-beige still darkened by a few shades of dark gray, but still far away from appearing to be greenish.

The boy, Hows had been one of the dancers who made it through and had managed to escape with all of his fingers in one piece.

And his vision was darkened by the evil of the storm he had to go through, amongst the hills and even further, past the scar of the land, whence he remembered how he feared that the flying creatures might come for and spear him down. Though he had been largely afraid to go over, for what lay beyond the broken land was death and he could dread to see or to imagine what lay on the other side. There could be some dreadful beings, some which would destroy. Others which might be paranoid and shank him, if anything, the boy refused to even consider being stabbed. He had feared pain in the same way any boy would fear it so.

Henceforth, he walked on the other-side and kept going, avoiding the peoples who were mourning their dead gods and their passing as well as everything else. Instead of crying and in laughter, whatever happened after, he would make it through.

It was only after this dark journey had pushed him through that he was unable to understand how many time he had been going through the same turns until he ended up rolling in a hole and dreaming of dead cows.

‘What am I doing?’

Hows asked Innocence.

‘You’re looking through the visor, you ought not to. It’s dangerous. Seeing the visions of the other worlds might claim your life.’

‘But you’re supposed to be innocent.’

‘And you should be careful what you wish for, otherwise, something harmful might happen and you might be claimed again. I’m telling you, be weary of what you want and say.’

Put the visor down.’

And the lenses could almost, for a moment, seem likely to claim his eyes. All too dreadful in doing and the worst, of all the things he’s done and every vision being a curse, he. Put it down, there, with a single shroud of decency, trying.

‘Now what?’

He asked and almost lost himself there.

‘Now, look again.’

‘But you told me to.’

‘I told you to look again.’

Once he put on the visor, which had been rounded and none the wiser had managed to take a gulp off the back of his head, though Hows could not think of it no longer, he fell.

Part of his head missing, part from a blow, bleeding in the same way snow would melt into the towering bow that was being shot in him.

At times, there was this strange thing named, quiet.

Innocence was Rose.

And just like everyone whose ever lived, she had felt as if she froze. This sight of the kid dying in front of her took something away from the girl.

Although they were all descending through the carpet, her memory still rose as well.

‘Are you all right?’

‘I am, let’s simply carry through.’

It was a slight advent, descending a few feet but only a few, just so the place where the Negro had died was on the right and they were only pushing through ahead, past the weird creatures that bashed, and to their horrible noises, wretched-pass.

‘Far ahead, I see.’

Pagan-Beggar, yet to introduce himself.

‘I wonder why do you want me here, in the first place.’

‘We don’t.’

They stopped talking to him and tried keeping up a faster pace in order to have him lag behind them. Not by much, but for what was worth it, he appeared to be a much-likely, more-so, despicable person. No one liked those kinds of people, even lesser than before. Whichever quiet bow, and better trough, fear was like, in the past, a Dravidian, of which form was yet to be determined, solid as he were, he had made a home inside the carpet, somewhere in the distance, a hut made out of its hairs. Somehow, the sky was bleak, but they had no way of seeing it.

Distraught Thought, Unrelated.

‘I wish she had kept my daughter. I sometimes think about it.

Some things aren’t meant to be told.’

‘Don’t you feel strange now?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘Something’s not wright, everything’s unnecessary, I feel worn out.’

‘You know where to aim.’

Even in death Mouse seemed rather, peevish, scummy and foul-mouthed.

Red thought about this for a while.

Something sealed the door behind them and while there was such a weird creature as there lay. Man of filth was there and Filth itself.

What a peculiar thing, trying to see them around.

The Man-of-filth shaped a door into the wall, revealing a corridor with twenty other rooms on one side and twenty on the other, while leading on the left side this time around, leaning hardly as if not to tilt and fall.

‘We have to go.’

And looking from the back, the hallway looked like a panting made by Ivan Albright and just as they entered it, they had become just as deformed. Most peculiar of sights, going through a distorted hall-way of magic-realism, through a hellish-macabre sight reminiscent of the most horrendous visions a man could go through. The mere sight of it could only shock the man. His sight of pus and that of filthy, deformation and almighty was undeserving of any mere description. It would only have to be seen, no, it’s something one could only experience once.

What a lurid sight of filth, uncanny. Dark, yet touched by the touch of genius in form and shape.

The might of which only worship should convey, yet to breed with it along the way.

There, thee yonder, they could not think of darker days, for they had to choose a room in which to lay their arms and cut about, bleed as if to come into contact.

A man dressed in a flamingo and half a dog-his pants, he was a taxidermist, come around. He’s come here with a black hairdo and a grand moustache. A tie lay around his throat, made out of the dyed-out spider-arachnid bodies, chopped in halves by a guillotine, while his face bore a scar around his throat and he also missed an arm, the right one. He blocked the way.

As he approached he said.

‘All doors are locked and under refuge.’

‘Out of refuge out of what.’

‘I see no reason to tell you that.’

‘Harsh.’

Answered the Man-of-filth, as he didn’t know why the god was standing, where? He disappeared. It felt like he wasn’t there, but in that different dimension where his servants were doing most of the work. Not that it was necessary by any means to hope for something though he’s done it so. Ever so slightly, delighted by what was going on.

‘Oh, orange dots, neat, but what do they mean?’

He’s given Mouse, Red-Market and the Man-of-filth something to carry over, as if they were given rotten oranges for a change. It was all too dreadful, to be on their way, but they painted so many ceilings that color now. And there was but a single man who knew the way around.

‘But oh, ho, ho, what I have in store for you, follow me.’

Through the caved in cave, from left, they entered and stood there, only to see everyone having been gone. It was dark and swollen, the way of filth revealed as much. And they could only waste themselves just asking and wondering, where has everyone gone?

Because down there, it was impossible to see, hardened by the sight, where one shell filled with organs fell, and upper than it, some giants dwelled, but here?

What of here, if not for the left side where there was naught to see. They were too incompetent, for anywhere to be called.

‘I need to speak with the manager.’

In-before they turned and managed to try to eat and spread the blood and spread some canny, plain.

‘Oh my fucking god, can you not help yourself for five minutes?’

‘What, what did I do?’

The man pulled a few corpses out of the self-protruding five-mangled eighty degrees, all worthless.

‘Can’t you see?’

It’s not fucking worthy, you’re all worthless.

You’re all god damn worthless!’

Red ran through the hall, not taking a break from having his feet stomped.

It was pointless trying to talk to them, they wouldn’t listen, how could they? No one would get it.

‘There, take a right, you realize you can’t stand alone against the world, right?’

You’re not going to make it alone.’

Twenty degrees to the tail of his eye.

‘I can still make it.’

Blasted cave in side, twenty feet away from where he stood.

‘I chose this. I chose all of this. I’ve already made peace with my choices, I can still live through them.’

Mouse came from behind, only to keep up with Red.

It was hard to think, especially with so many distracting thoughts that only lead to the many ways a man could dissect a woman in front of her daughter, ripping out every organ she had inside, then splattering them all over. Lynching her like a dumb-fucking nigger, then pulling parts of her while doing remotely re-positioned squats, only while holding the heaviness of her head that bears not only her throat but her spine, lower side of her body and every rib in the fully anatomically developed human being. There's just so many ways a sick mind could image a woman beaten and tortured before being caught.

‘Are you all right?’

You realize you're going to be caught doing this eventually, right?’

‘I cannot help myself, I loathe women, I simply and thoroughly loathe them, except the ones in family, which are an exception from the rule.

Come to think of it, man, I would do so much, if I were to wrap my hands around a woman's body. Let me tell you fellow.’

Pulling her spleen through her throat, making a curved-cut around her right breast, only to drag her bloody stomach off; only to feed her with an iron baby-bottle filled with caustic acid, pulling her teeth out one by one, only to have enough space to put a single hard-pressured water jet, only to allow for a sudden break of respiration and clean some of the mess off while she's gurgling with blood.

‘I'd honestly and completely ignore reality and sense completely, only to bury myself inside her diaphragm, making my way through her spleen, right kidney while shattering her pelvic bone by force, pissing through the lower side of her body, then enter.

You know what? Why stop here? Why not just get twenty young girls, and shove a fucking jack hammer through the side of their heads? Or burn an orphanage filled with eighty-four planted gasoline-tanks?

I could even add one up, and start messing with.’

‘You're not doing yourself a favor, are you?’

‘Let's move from them then. What else can I do?’

‘Assassinate the president, commit acts of terror, molest every woman you come about, break a few federal laws along the way.’

Fuck the Constitution. Where did that come from?

‘Great ideas, what else, you know what? I think, I think I ought to put you in fucking charge for once and make you a god damn monkey-wrangler.’

‘I don't think you'd want that, now, would you?’

‘We're already gone now.’

‘We could kidnap a few youngsters, that sounds dangerous enough, doesn't it?’

‘For you.’

‘I’m serious man, we could kidnap a school-boy, slap a few hammer shots around his body, then slice him about up and leave what’s left, wait. Not in a box, not in a kettle, but, let me think. What would be the most disturbing thing we could place a kid in?’

‘Up your ass, asshole!’

‘Or we could move away before this deteriorates.’

Such a nice day.

‘A chemical weapon, we could purposefully infect people, somehow, I know it. Look, we don’t even have to be ones making it.

I’ll be the patient-zero and you’ll be my anchor, drawing me back once things get ugly.’

Water-boarding a loud-cunt with hydrochloric, nitric, sulfuric, nah.

‘Burn a bitch alive on a god damn stake, especially the ones that sleep with fucking niggers. But do it slowly, don’t snap her neck, get her to suffer a little and suffocate.’

‘Gotcha’, anything else?’

‘Stab tiny children at the back of their heads, build a bomb, give myself to the Feds, before revealing I have a bomb strapped to my chest.’

‘You’re really onto something here.’

‘Curb-stomp myself, it’s my turn.’

‘No, me.’

‘You’re definitely next.’

‘All right, then it’s settled.’

‘I’ll even do you one up, I’ll make sure you’ll wear a dress, homo, right before you do it.

Forty percent, I’m telling you.’

It wasn’t going too well now.

They were both, not entirely well on it. Definitely not on the same page any longer, back into one of the filth-rooms.

Honest to his lord, he looked at a sky of pus and thought.

‘I want to live in a giant woman’s liver.

I think her warmth would embrace me and cure me of my illness. I could finally be set free and never worry about trying to harm someone I love.’

‘You’re a good man Red.’

‘I know, I’m a nice person, once you get to know me.’

Women were highly acidic after all, by their nature. Henceforth, they could feel nothing while being exhaustively being used. It was all too obvious and pleasant that their biological impulses put them even lower than that of the common Negro denominator. Hatred for them should only come as being genuine as it’s come from a man. And man knows best.

‘I think I see a woman in the distance.

I loathe their sub-humanity, yet I am drawn to them.

I am weak, for I hear and I easily get intimidated by their presence, therefore I must bow to her.’

And Red suddenly bowed down.

From the distance he could see that the ground was soft, and plenty. There were no walls and in the distance, yet the other planets could be seen. It was disturbing and disgusting how much he feared women, yet how much he wanted to be pleased.

Indeed they were. As strange as they seemed, these mythical creatures of which defining characteristic was the size of their firm breasts was that of their larger, more defined, anything but humanoid form. From the backs of which they bore no wings but images of other women, embodiments in shape, which forever tormented them, as these creatures could never live amongst themselves. As it was obvious that neither one would stay youthful and instead they bore their marks. Of sharpened claws and wild surroundings, of plenty blows that went skin-deep, bleeding everywhere uncannily as their legs were to be seen.

And while bowing he could only hope, to see a wild angle and the arch beneath her silken robe, for, despite of all appearance, he had only want deterrence to the arch of her feet.

But at the same time they were also monstrous, cruel and vile. No morbid creature of apparition of filth, no sub-humane distraction or embodiment could be as vile as that thing they spoke off.

No devil and no agony, thing of glory, or be pained. For a woman was but evil inside and would only be that way. Yet for some reason, he simply stared. He wanted her, he wanted her as well. Despite all vileness, through her appearance, the deficit of mind, one could turn a single blind eye knowing, that their being was yet benign. For in their nature, there lay submission, and he knew when to rise.

Just as soon as she would step in line, he could put her in her place and smile. Of her dark-broken wings, the girls, they would be ripped apart, for he could only stand to listen to, but one. Too many would be just enough and not a single man on earth could deal with that.

Then pull a gun, aim it at her forehead and empty the revolver.

Afterwards both Mouse and Red left the room of filth and seemed to finally be joined again.

Man-of-filth stood knowingly, never to succeed, or swell.

‘Had he?’

‘Another mental breakdown, I swear.

It’s getting ever so slightly nearing a breaking point.

I don’t know what to say or do, there’s just nothing we could about it.’

‘I think I’m going to build a nice bird’s nest. Yeah, I think I’d like that.’

‘That’s a great idea, Red. Where do you want to build it on?’

‘On top of an iron-birch, I would definitely like that.’

‘I’m glad you will. I think I’ll help you.’

Truly, a majestic sight, as it were, they watched the lamp on top of them slowly fade to dim. It was, perfect, simply, perfect.

‘Will there be iron-fruits in that iron-birch?’

‘There will be, I think there will. I’d like that.

I think I’d like that very much.’

But before their dream of iron-birches and iron-nests could commence, they finally noticed the hired contracts at the end of the hallway.

Why fear? Since they were both dead, it shouldn’t matter. As they had little on their lively-platter, not a single eye in either socket, and hearts which had decay at last.

But then again, Sigmund Freud was a hack, which ought to have been killed, like all the Jews in some way. Although their women, I suppose would get a pass.

For sickeningly forlorn as he were, and walked by Manno Fild, Moss and Ried walked thence.

Fild had yet to call upon thine servants walk.

Yonder and forlorn, in sight, unable to feel themselves upon the long vale of grin and plunder. For they had walked a path of bitter sounder, yet to be knighted woe, Ried had finally succumbed to a plummet oe’r.

‘There, oér, I shall’t be drowned in a pond of ponder.

And I shall remind myself of the totter’s totter, for a little while yonder before the mischievous kin come thin.’

‘And what of it then, oh, oer’ one who lead the path ahead, whereas one might lay and go convey but a patch of gray-yarn out of the cavern, in winter’s sun.’

For thawed and lay, outside, the flay of snow had drawn to autumn, as they had missed the land or peril dark and they had left degeneracy behind to rot. Such a wild conundrum, walking, on the step of ever landful and yet worse, there going on a single morsel, they had lived and they had missed. And there were valleys, no disease to herd the sheep away, and no coyotes along to say of peril, it would merely suffice. And at a thin call along the forest of green, upon the valley of green blades, of smock and thunder blunted coal mines beneath the earth, of which land they knew little off and wouldn't even think to say, and whence to lay and what to convey there was little left for them to say.

'But, here, stranger, where might we go?

We have come from far away and know little sow, as we have yet to plow the land and commence, but we have travelled far along the way.'

And the strange man only lifted his brow, and pipe'n cowl, and only looked through a patch of straw, only to see.

Here, thee be a bunch of strangers with little to them in mind. Who claimed to have come from afar, yet there were not callous, nor sign. And no vestments of normal kin, for no man would dress that way, but queer as they were, in both appearance and malignant spirit, he had pointed but pass.

'Here, there, yon' and yonder, where my cottage lay, go along the way and do as I say until I pin you on the way to a much secluded, let alone.

A parasite of snow that might herd by sheep away, the winter, had finally faced the fierce, the pass. Of suns and fire which he faced and killed its mass, there's nothing left until it comes.'

Past that, they had each but bowed. One by one, Manno Fild, Moss, Ried, of no plains that would be satisfactory for which remained, they had settled for the night.

Dreams and vision, not be called, and out of the three of them, Carpent who was the Sheppard had left them yond'.

Ried had drawn, but bitterly so, near the window, looking past, through, woe. And woe to him the looking who might see past the hay, of no greater vision that might be conveyed, too broken as it had been inside, one could only look his mind and stare away, all too dreadful, being along the way and never knowing while waiting for the star of Baster to signal for them, faster.

And faster through accumulation, their damnation yet to come; perils lay out there but waiting, never knowing but to chow, on teeth, but many and bitterly so, they ate what they could from the cottage, of which, buried in the ground after snow. Onions, and bread, and horns of milk and cheese, but there were no yaps or so to see.

'I think we should share. And do convey what you think as well.'

Moss spoke so, now unable to contain, whatever had remained of his wonder, this as much he said.

'Need thee be reminded of it so. I washed away upon a shore. And you were there, but like a brother.

Though unfit, just like no other, I would've called on chance and would've spared you so.

I would've made a fit and worn the shore. But now I know better than to look, for others like me, for I have shook just every cranny and every patch of land, only to find you but here, the only one to have stayed with me after this journey far.'

And Ried had almost wept as the last word sprouted out his mouth. For all the decency in the world and everything that went through him, now of all, he simply understood. There hadn't been any need for anyone, nor should. For he had been.

'Was that a bird out there?'

'What?'

'I think that was a bird. A giant one with double heads, of which wings are but long necks bearing two giant man heads.

And I saw it sprout while carrying a sack-hill of beat behind it filled with human beings.'

'Then we should go after it.'

'Shall we not fine first?'

Manno Fild asked as well, he didn't have the countenance to wait, as he was weary of the ascent and wondered not at what he brought upon himself by asking. There was terror in waiting and they were restless. After being done with eating they resumed.

'And I think, I should say.

You were always with me, along the way.'

'But I have merely joined you.'

'Indeed you have, my dear fellow, and for that I hold you in high regards. For your acquiesces is bold and I shall slay you in your sleep unless you call me forth upon your wedding day.'

To which, Moss agreed, as he would name him so in courage and in ill. No braver man had he known, and none other who would face it all, this was what they were inclined, all to believe of little mind and better to abide, for what was worth. A land of their own, that's on what plan they settled on.

'We shall claim one in the distance and we shall share, between the three of us, there shall be no despair. And no man shall interfere and none shall do so as if to appear by no kind.'

He rested almost blindly on the pace. Ever since, they went away and not stopped, not to pay no heed to the Sheppard, of which kind they've already forgotten and left him so in doubt.

Pain would shatter, not to wait a tree of winds, of clouds within their reach, they went and approached, of the trail of long-lost, largely displaced branches, the marks of the flying beast, which could not help it but bring the lay. None shall remain, but petty as they were, they said.

'There thee yonder, lay the nest.'

And once again, one came as well.'

Another but to yet approach, a knight whom had been a servant to the creature, which merely paced around, shoving its heads back into the sack to eat through gore and plunder, at the bitter-sight of a single whoredom of disease; but distressed, the knight but set aside, whichever wonder but to abide. He asked as much and barely made it, never asking, yet he almost faded on a turn.

For his armor was but a piece of dirt, taken from the arches of a Cathedral, the mold was done for. For he had fit to be presented and fear emerged, largely fended, no foe, the bitter and see his thirst. And for every second, he pulled a verse out of his pocket, read.

'I shall slay thee, I shall slay thee.

Turn around and flee.'

'I will slit your throat, and bury myself into your throat and come down the other side while shattering your ribs and pulling out most of your organs through a small explosion which should throw your every organ outside your body. Then I'll shatter your skull with my bare fists, regardless of how much time I would unfeasibly need to completely do it, until I will have lost every possible ounce of control, ripped off your tongue, pulled my knife and started stabbing your face.

And with every stab against your face, I will hear the end result be, such as it may in the same way a man would batter a coconut with a cleaver, slowly progressing from various vaguely placed scars across your forehead, moving towards your eyes until they popped out of your sockets.

Then my hands will return and shall cut the exposed back side of the neck, slowly trying to curb your spine, while sipping of whichever kind of sinew is left from your initial sinew-release. I shall set your body on fire with a blow-torch. Then I will eat your toes, and cut your feet only so I could suture them and add you arches.

What's left of your body I shall, utmost sickly fantasize about just as I will put a dress on top of you and treat you as a I would.'

'Bitter thee coward, leave.'

'No, I will do it.'

'Nonce you shall not, you shall leave of despair.

For I have no fear and I shall't brought onto your kind but pain.'

And it was ever since that no fear of a kind could convey.

'All right, settle down.'

The fall had almost come to them.

The open scene, almost fallen. Of dark and kind of bitterness, blind, they were encased, in the closed space of a prison, almost tainted and disjointed, messed with and pieced together as they were slowly being ripped apart by strings. And they were placed and remade and changed limbs and allowed as they may, they were forced to return to the chambers of filth.

Ried had no feet but the heads he had seen on the flying beast, while the others were just as, if not more tainted than before. Between Mouse and the Man-of-Filth, there had been largely exchanged pieces that would not fit. IT was all too tiresome, all too vague.

‘All too tainted, you need to stop opening the doors.’

‘Who asked you to follow me then?’

‘You’re pulling us in with you.’

‘I don’t think you understand this now, but I don’t care about what you think. I shall live my fantasies in whichever means I can. I shall lie and be petty, and vile.’

‘It is not you, Ried.’

‘It is, Moss, it is, but this is a part of me you do not like. For where else could a man but show who he is as well?’

Where else could a man live forever and do as he pleases with everyone? Here, there are no limits and none that might say. And none that might shatter any bond or would destroy what a man can truly convey of true matter and make-do. With every object be at his will and his command.’

‘You shall suffer this way.’

‘I shall have none of that from you, Moss.’

‘But what of I?’

Well, this is awkward, weird lip-hiding mouth expression that looks like a line.

‘I’m sorry but I don’t really know who you are.’

It was in some sense, extremely strange. He didn’t really get to know that Man of Filth. And he was even more of a queer fellow than either of them were; strange as it was, he simply followed them around, had a laugh and generally didn’t do anything much. He didn’t add much to their conversations and was merely forgettable to him. He had no attachment to the creature and if he died there, he’d feel nothing.

‘So.’

‘Right.’

‘Is he going to leave now?’

‘I don’t know, do you want him to leave?’

‘Do you want me to leave?’

‘This isn’t, all right.’

‘Can we just, do something else? I don’t like this.’

‘Then let’s just open another door.’

‘But I thought you didn’t enjoy me being a nuisance.’

‘Anything is better than this.’

‘I’m glass.’

‘As in made of glass?’

‘Open the god damn door.’

And in they went.

Roger Hendtick

‘What happened?’

‘I was lost, somewhere, going around a jungle. I think it was some jungle. I couldn’t actually tell you about it because I was too ‘fraid during that time.’

‘I think you should take a seat. I placated it with birds.’

All of them were tied to the chair, still living yet clearly visible in pain.’

‘Could you tell me your name?’

‘Roger Hendtick.’

‘Why have you done it?’

‘What have I done?’

‘You’ve injected yourself with the deadly agent, and somehow managed to survive its first congenial stage. From the tip of its blisters, it’s become airborne.’

‘The city.’

‘Everyone there’s dead, not just that, as if it wouldn’t be enough, but the idealized version of death. As much as I’d like to pin this all on you, I don’t think it would be necessary at all.’

‘Tell me what happened after I left.’

‘Think of the black plague, the bubonic strike. That should give you a plain of sight. You should be able to paint an image inside your head with the little things you have there.’

‘So they died in a heroic manner?’

‘Not so much as the disease infested the buildings and destroyed the beautiful city of Fees-H.’

A codename, standard procedure, for what was worth it.

‘You’ve done quite enough for today.

We only needed a statement before we put you down.’

‘I’m not a dog.’

‘I know, dogs don’t struggle as much under general anesthesia, but you’re a big fellow, aren’t you?

We had to use enough tranquilizers to put down a herd of elephants, although that cost us a lot, it could and would, by no means amount to the property destruction you’ve caused.’

‘But what of the lives that were lost, you bastard?’

‘Funnily coming from the one who caused all of them. But I concur, I don’t think we’ll be having this conversation again in a few hours, it’s slow acting, unlike the heat you’ve caused.’

Plus they feared just as much, what they’ve done to the buildings, the upsetting sight of seeing them from the distance.

‘What happened to the city?’

‘Wrought out, rotten below, became like. Do you remember the Comedy?’

‘I’m not dumb.’

‘Well, think of the buildings as having become empty injun-tents, whereas the lower side of the became depictions of the Dante Alighieri’s hell, as it most of the structural integrity, such as the floors, rooms, and everything inside of them got pulled in those living sacks of blisters.

From the images we could see, taken by a few of the investigators beneath the earth, that the structures looked mightily concave and appeared to bear single protruding pucker-protrusions. It’s hard to understand how is it that the entire weight hasn’t dragged everything down while making its way through the earth, but I concur.’

Although he hadn’t revealed everything there, this much could be said. It was unnatural.

Upper side of the tent-buildings, strapped inside by long plaster-belt-like growths, keeping everything from falling in. Outer hollow reached of the ground being part of it as well. Somewhere, beyond the sight, where this weird inverted cocoon stood rested, a few miles above, of hundreds of meters, there lay large paradise-growths of meat, which pushed through the ground and managed to connect themselves everywhere, forming their tunnels.

‘We have reasons to believe that, for what is worth, there’s something abhorrent going on there.

This airborne disease might've been just a code, and you filthy machine of meat were programmed to create it.'

'How could I have known it?'

'There were symptoms before the contagion started.'

What is a cylinder in such a beast? What does it mean to live inside of it? And what by width and spring and farther, what could it mean, no wonder.

'Twenty eight of them, twenty eight bodies are levitating inside.'

Said an old crone outside the masterful realm of the Babylonian-plague, though little remained to mourn, for her sight knew little and just as much in light. They were busy breeding an army inside of them while bouncing with incandescent lights that were hardened enough in tiny specks of dark, only to be used to eat.

And they were largely obscure and not to be seen as the objects inside their room were utterly destroyed by such a force as the likes of which could not even be approached no longer.

Carpet-carpenter

'I am the carpet.'

'No, I am the carpet.'

'We're both the carpet.'

'How can you be the carpet if I am the carpet?'

'Can we not? Especially since I am the carpet.'

'No, I am the box and the carpet is in the box and the quarry is but, well, nowhere.

I cannot find it.'

And there was pain, and it was frustrating.

There walked a man whose head was the entire room that was in the quarry, which had been covered by it. He walked along the streets with many faces and many stacked people who entered it.

Two people approached him.

'There is an Empire of Wax Candles in the West.'

'What's it made out of?'

'I'm.

You know what? That is a great question. I suppose it's made of wax, as the name implies. Empire of Wax Candles.'

'But West is not an object.'

'No, it is no.'

'Shall we water the plants?'

'Yes, we shall, we should do it.'

There rose a singly flight of stairs upon which they walked. As strange, and yet strangely as it were.

Moss-Ried

'But, Mouse, we were in that cave, weren't we?'

'What was that?'

Cave, going left side, seen from the side-view of the sea, going left between two overlapped strung parts of stone. Upwardly put, climbed upon, past the creatures, furthermore, past the two gravediggers as the glassy creatures, through the frames, past the room and onto the stage. They were rehearsing another piece of Beliee.

'Nevermind.

Tell me where, are we?'

He looked outside, they were in a large town that had something like one hundred buildings just from where they were standing, a few roads, trees, oaks, and people and weird plants and weird creatures, and weird multiple sky-visions that were overlapping. And everything was moving at the same time, sometimes even becoming one piece as they started pushing themselves around.

Part of Mouse had become a standing giant lamp, while building fifteen move half-way through town, road eighteen from the right side, pushing through it. Buildings eighteen, fifteen, seventy-four, the insides of a giant guttural beast, a sky of red with large stars of blue that were glowing with dark grays. Right side, prison grates, prison chambers, large cacti, pushing through, a single wave of sand, all around the general vision, eighteen cards, moving through them. Red stepped once but walked eighty-hundred miles into a skin-wall, machines were popping out, then part of the wall, then part of him, the sky popped, everything was suddenly overlapped with an explosion and he was still moving. And on top of that, everything had then become overlapped again with them this time around.

And before a flash of light, there came knives and they were in everyone and everyone also bled, and the blood coagulated and became stars instead, part of the ground, and nothing could be seen from their insides. As soon as he opened his mouth he stared pushing out eight billion words at once, making it sound like gibberish, too many languages, too many tongues, he spat out giant livers, pancreases, tiny volcanoes, tiny gluten-boxes, eyes, and acid. He stepped once on the right but moved right for eighteen more miles, left eighty-five more miles, turned around eighty-four degrees before Red became a weird skin-made giant made out of even more parts that were barely stuck together until he suddenly became part of the sky and the whole universe appeared to be just a giant canvas on which the street and the city he had been was illustrated in an abstract manner, parts of it being drawn by the images of an eight years old, and then by a giant crippled man and some of them looked like Picasso's Guernica. There were also suns that were yellow but not entirely so, as they were of an orange hue and they were drawn by crayons. Every crayon was of a different color, blue, red, blue-two-shades-darker, orange-eight-shade-lighter as such.

Red all of the sudden realized that he was a Marker and then he stepped out of the world and started walking on the galaxy, making his way through the universe while being accompanied by evil flowers dressed in red, who wore strange crowns of smaller living flowers that were only trying not to become, yet they had been encompassed by giant vehicles that had all of the sudden become giant speaker-like devices. And twenty other open mouths appeared to devour some distant parts of the universe, yet they were nothing more and nothing other than filth-residue which he feared to approach. For residue was scum and for he feared it, ever-so closely, although he had no control over the direction in which he moved.

At time he even appeared to be a static object, which had only one foot lifted up while everything around him moved on, right before the buildings started growing and spreading all around, like a plague in a city, rising various ziggurat-like formations, in which, in their place of worship, giant mandible-formation-like statues were holding altars that were speaking on long-forlorn days. Though they weren't entirely useless as they had become something akin to the joints of knees, allowing for a higher reach for the giants that used them to form the holding cell-foundations leading to the lost planetoids that came on. Impaled on every sight, the forest of anglers suddenly rose from their spots and could see the stars and the sight of the dark vacuum which appeared all of the sudden while the Nebula appeared again and finally Red had stepped.

And when he was done, he was again on the street and there was that giant woman again, though this time around he feared living in her giant liver as it was too dangerous since he could suffer of a deficit of iron since he was skinned like the plague. There were towers everywhere and he was but a wall, he was shaped like a wall, in the same way a long-lost image had been. Although, instead of the extra limbs that came from everywhere around him, he had been surrounded by eighteen-billion small heads, some of which even overlapped that of his own and everything else until he walked upon a cone that lead to a giant well that was being painted in red. Though he could not heat the water unless he wanted to satisfy the Starfish-demon with one hundred nails and eighteen knuckle heads it dragged around, all horned, pushing inside their satellites which dragged the whole world from where he stood.

As soon as he crossed the street, the entire world got, not flattened in the same way a two dimensional image would but at the same time it did. Everything existed, all of the sudden, or had been forced to be placed upon a moving vacuum, while it looked like it had been but a single square on which the entire world had been projected in. That face would look like it was but a screen playing a recording of what happened somewhere in the distance, while going around and nothing ever coming out of it, while at the same time, another projection would be lifted, as if it were but the drafting table of an architect that was facing that screen from an even more tilted angle, from which the structures were not projected such as in the screen but akin to small tridimensional hardened, yet lumped forms made out of decayed rotten red meat, that had begun a process of putrefaction. Through its rotten channels, and in the access points, one could see the skin turn into a yellow-pus that would spread through the mightily disabled sight of putrefaction it shared around.

Large birds of Alabaster appeared out of nowhere and they moved as well, but he could not see them as he was in the air, simply walking despite being stuck into an infinite fall while the strange clouds surrounding him had become his head, which expanded as if to look like a child suffering of macrocephaly.

He was met by anger, which was there. And from anger, there came despair.

For he asked it, in the embodiment of the vile.

‘Why have you come here, if only to defile?’

‘I have come to do so, for I have become death.’

And there lay the peril ahead, for whichever creature this might be, of no certainty in its own creation, there it lay, darkened as well as it wore a suit of gray and greens, of many teeth which came out of it. Of a dark hooded mouth that almost threatened to swallow its head, with bars imprisoned by unevenly placed long-teeth. For the frog-like rotten, melted wax, behind the grates, there stood at last but a strange demonical cackling thing. For he had fallen and bore no wing, but stood on the ground, a platform at last, waiting for someone to give the reign a stop.

He was brought here and put between two cradles of humanity, two blocks and periled throngs, standing below and on top. Dark, and set, in the abyss, hanging, yet benign, a cage for only the two of them, Mouse set aside.

Ten minutes later, Moss arrived.

As had the Man of filth.

‘Great, o’ Hare, that’s who I am.’

Grahre, Grah.

‘Pah, Grah, I, though art Grah.’

‘Just let me do it, once, I swear, once and I’m going to be done with it, in just a matter of seconds. I’m just going to push my god damned hand through your skull and remove the top-side of your.

Stand still you little shit. Just stand still.’

A few more steps, and his fingers extended out of his palm, having shot through the floor while still being attached to his hand, placated with tumors.

‘Damn this.’

With his other free hand, he simply pulled a pair of scissors only to make a simple cut. With a single swipe he chopped off all eight of his fingers, bleeding, yet approached. On feet of bleeding throngs, unstopped, why, it was obvious, was it not?

For a close enough shot of its malignant face would reveal as much for one to see, that little pucker twisted around itself, dwelling deeper.

Large body, the trunk being largely expanded through every outwardly extended pulmonary track which made most of the bulk of its fat; leading to a pseudo-looking, barely formed humanoid tall brute, bearing hinder, four legs, cylindrically-dent from the outside, made to look as if imprinted or concave. Drilled on both side, giant pucker-arms that would sprout as blade-like bots, wrapped around and tilted like conjoined melted horns, leading to the standing figures, lynched as they would seem to be the leaning figures of four humanoid on each side. And their names were, from the left side, Feado, Barnoid, Drith and Prout. From the right side of the creature, continued from the left, Writhed, Tilted, Stanced, Concave.

Brought to shame as he arrived, dark despot of woe, called upon, a Psecker was the name of the fiend. And darkness within its grasp and upon the strangeness it walked and broke, in part, the pieces of ground forlorn, and brought reality back on its own. Tremors of dread, better yet, never to be caught again, the painter of blood had lend upon it a shot of all bright tumor-looking much deformed textures that were popping off. A touch of pox and once decay, one which could if anything barely convey the malady which was presented onto it. A lacquer of a riddled brown, shattered by the skin-disease which came around, blisters of moons, reflections and swoons, beheaded mongrels of Cajun, all which appeared into the malignant reflection which came out of the being.

More Pseckers came, and off them, peeled off the remains of those whom, in vainness and in glory, of forlorn memory they could but wait and see, of little eel-defined pleasure, the man was to be put down.

‘He need to be taken into the surgery room and put under extreme shock.

He is in desperate need of a shock treatment, is he not? Look at him, that boy is anything but right? He’s delusional, he’s seeing things.

He’s malignantly deformed, look at it.’

Shock-therapy began, but they had their normal way of doing so and it was not Red who was pulled between them.

If the Pseckers came from the sides of the grates, and entered the room from the right, the humanoid faceless creatures came from the other side, block the path and partaking in their strange ritual. Moss placed on the chair, tied about, then prepared.

‘One nail shall be put through his skull, then with this copper line we shall conduct precisely eight billion volts through his little primate head. Is that understood now?’

‘I think it is doctor, but, doctor?’

There was the lad, and he was there. His name was Red, and the Manno Filde, beware of him, for Filth was under his command. What a sad life he lived, as that was it, better brought to knowledge yet to know.

Grah was still bleeding, unaware.

Before long, the room was filled with eight Pseckers on one side, and eighteen others on the other side. And they were yet conversing, trying to be done, and be wrapped around in madness and in the shroud, defilement of vile profanity. Dread called upon their malignant reality.

It's perfectly acceptable, and most solemnly know that a man has the capability, as it stems from an ancient technique used by an ancient sculptor by the name of Polykleitos, of whose means of achieving beauty depended clearly defined it as a matter of capturing the proportions of the human figure. By the same means of doing, one could interpret, that, upon a clear sighted comparison between the creatures and the humans, it's to be noted that the humans had become the fingers themselves. And their proportions would show something akin to a great yet nigh-inconceivable resemblance to the human anatomical structure, despite being clearly overwhelmed by mere stature, as the creatures were gargantuan in size.

'Do not focus on them, Reid, don't focus on them. You need to listen to me now, carefully so.

You need to abandon something before we will let you go, do you understand?'

Moss was being silent, electrified lichens in his eyes.

Grah was the one talking, with but the slit of the scissors' cry.

'You must kill Innocence by whatever means you can. It needs to die if you want to make it, you need to kill it, you need to be the one responsible for taking its life.'

And he offered him that, the slit of scum, from whence there lay, but his dirt-rust scissors, on which they preyed upon for long. Reid didn't know, of what reason should he take its glow, but he finally got it, walked on benign land, turned around and left them behind. Though the creatures would follow him right around the grates, one could not do it for long, since vileness they conveyed.

'You need to take its life, slay that weakness, that filthy useless whore called Innocence and change. It shall be the one great thing which shall change you pass the reigns.'

Slowly, past them, yet he stopped, then looked around for what appeared to be one last time before leaning in, that shouldn't have mattered, yet for a while, his thoughts asunder.

The way ahead darkened after a while. Morbidly so, he was almost taken aback by what was going on. Of the same surroundings and plains in sight, what he missed now was.

Something to draw from, no strength, no might, nothing which was his would lend upon him any sight. And of no reason, yet alone he asked, where is she? For he could not finger her in any forest, no mark, no empty house, in which he had been, of a turn he'd seen and but a long-house standing, turned around, within the circle of a town. Was he there before? It didn't matter, he was searching for a girl, and sound her reigns, and but remain and wonder at it, again. Where was the young girl? What has she done to deserve her turn?

For she was no Rose, but let a claim be settled, she was to be killed, all mightily so, for claiming to be bettered. No wonder he was warned, no matter, after long. He was called upon to take her life, and no return from mourning sights.

The boy entered the first house and wondered where might be so, of any reason.

He spent the night in one dark room. Washed up on a shore two days later, swooned.

Bathhouse

Rooms of abuse, twenty of them connected, a damn slum, make it a whole city. Every house in it, small embodiments of whore-machines, passed around, driven down, a damn mess. Stained, dirty, grinded down, torn up, gas clouds in the air, warm airs-in buildings, dark clouds, messy smoke, filth around empty streets, a pandemonium that looked like Alexei Leonov's suit made in every aspect of the slum. Stained oxygen cylinders, padded men with helms downturned, visors on the wrong sides, constantly beaten around. Broke radio stations, no one speak up-right, not a sight outside to behold for long. Every high-head had a breather. Every single shade a retrieving light which put a single man on watch. Twenty desolate roads leading around the encircled depression.

Farther than that, wide-spread, everywhere around, debris, dead-soft class one, two, three, four to eight, long-decayed. Tendon-hardened river on the great recess.

Domed and folded, upward and fault-blocked mountains pushed around as they bore abandoned research, utility, vehicle repair, maintenance, storage facilities among lost fortifications. Giant worming structures fallen around them, aiming at the sky. A cry of river pushing out of them yet never flooding the gut the ground bore.

A wide stretch of a hundred thousand miles between the earth and the circle, population lived down, every other building enclosed. No, it was all abandoned down there. Empty, dead, finite, they moved away from it, leaving the animals and two or three suited, nothing inside of them. Move on.

No tag on the suit, nothing. A visor on the wrong side meant nothing.

Mechanical appliances, light of green on a long tunnel, coming out of a flashing in and out screen. No general message, no sign of anyone being there, other than the mess, it was a strange thing, considering.

Less than that, all roads leading to nowhere, tiny specks carried through. Dust of eight kinds in every single cell-like stack, leading to nowhere.

It must've walked for hours after the last stop. There was no refill-station anywhere, all static. Too empty, too placated for a place like this; entire heaviness of the city leading to a drop, pushing its weight through the segmented works around the one support beam that kept it all from falling. There had been several cave-ins, bringing down the furniture from a room. Dilapidated sight, above, large firm camera shot of various devices mixed with cotton, wrapped around, coal spur.

Empty talker with an open mouth having swam in it, no distinguishable feature. Mold, every corner, up-front shot of large cuts, all ripped apart, facing one another, some stuck in white-Alamo, broken through. Old, everything, worn out, no apparent close door anywhere else, no signs of there having been any mental unit to hold life going for more than a few months. There lay a few open rope-mouths, contorted and being constantly pulled in wide black openings left in standing dark-spots. Slits everywhere, cut through, left right in the open. Bleak floor, soundless drops while still going, but no lever auctioning the constant motion in which the rope-mouths were being pulled, chain-like as in lowered-bridges.

Somewhere distantly in a house, a city of plume-gray, put inside a wall, never touched upon. Miniature, pipe-syndrome dirty-like, laid outside, just above where It stood. Would be made to get worn and torn apart.

Open door, entered at the hour, large eighteen-hundred boilers aligned to the side, super-heated, a dark-ochre steam emerging. Lights only covering the small area in front of them, not separately, but long-pushed, small square-spaced imprints of light, followed by it; everything monitored by no one, yet recorded.

It seemed all too easy to get lost through, twenty paces at a time, slowly walking before there was even a ledge to stand on. A wild shortage of fruit around distant corner left everything as much as it could be expected, they came in pair, change in structure, melted cotton or rotten onion-like alloys covering each possible corner down there, as if they had all been worked over a long period of time and over-wrought as well. Too much pressure from the looks of it, displeasing to look at, tiny jukebox, that's what mattered.

A broken jukebox lay along the way, brokenly open from the looks of it, all too plain to see that someone left an arm through. It was connected to the main-set piece inside the wall, where an open container door segment pushed it on. As he turned, it could see a trail which had been left behind. It, not him, he was not, there was nothing in it. Reminder of importance, no one has ever made it here. Not standing.

Long-trail of dust pushed through, someone had dragged it for far too long. There was also this thing. A single, lane-worth of crawling things in that squared-hole inside the wall, from which the tube pushed into the jukebox; towards which, it wanted to draw. Astronaut, it would be well suited.

Drawing nearer, only to find it left. Deeper in, nothing, the jukebox started playing its song while flashing. All in the boiler-room, a placement utmost bizarre, the contrast only appeared when taken into account that the area where the hole was, had been barely dim-lit. It didn't come near, but there was a stop to the music once it tried pushing it around. Two more times followed. Every boiler inside the room stopped producing steam. There was a weird satisfaction then, turning. Everything looked deformed in the reflection of the visor, turned around as if part of a spherical world. Never going past the turn; right before a red circle could come in, still grayish, the jukebox started again.

A single coin came out if, bearing the sigil of the place. The Empty-Astronaut took it.

Walked over to the light, first one flashed still, then stopped. Moved along.

Bizarre signs, first one waited, right around the exit from the boiler room. Nothing else appeared to matter after that. Everything was set in place for the wrong reasons. U-turns everywhere, one in particular counted on, too soft, too wrong, molded in. The upper level had a small docked ledge and a bridge on top of everything, leading to a flight of stairs that pushed down. Being there was all too dull. Large bolts kept it going, angled.

Mangled sign, the sign was mangled, wrought not on a pole but on a set of power-strip shaped empty button holes from which power arcs came at wild intervals. Boilers began, pumps followed, again short arcs pushed in. Empty-Astronaut pushed it, tried taking something away, but there was no connection, no reaction coming from touching it.

It was the first time the helmet was taken off, empty. Helmet turned, still down-sighted, air started pushing in, along a few specks of dust, all too quiet.

Past the sign, other.

Front place, no direction, insides of beetle-airs.

Tongue tunnel bearing machine, having worn a hole through the first dome, pockets underneath the earth where the supposed function was storing. No storage, simply abandoned. They looked out of place, there, with the tunnel-machines being left around one of the encircled zones. All too quiet to the drop of a coin, which bounced over a couple of seconds then stopped. Leaving nothing but that image, of a machine that wasn't there; which couldn't be seen by it, though it should've disappeared somewhere, sometime ago, unconfirmed, there was the picker that was there, not working. Had to be left alone.

So many spots devoid of life, so many raised walls for nothing, various plain room-replicas that were supposed to be painted, run dry. Clear in sight, large mammal, all too murky in metal.

There it is, the chamber of abuse, surrounded by the whoredom-machine, each of them holding it while it swims in the air. It's lost in dark but part of the entire structure where it was left. Vented air, dented all around. Glass poured inside of them once. And most of it had been recorded in another bronchitis-iron pill, filthy, inside of it. No mouth to chew in them. Only the ones with the ropes being constantly run in the dark, into the cavern, into the cavern, they sang once. Into the cavern, into the cavern, I can taste smoke, when it rose. No man kept his composure, none acted human, none left his suit.

It knew there were too many hinges strapped and holes about the place. Droned down.

All dark all quiet, all incomprehensible, magnet of voices sounding metallic, then fading out, while the Astronaut pulled out its suit and there, nothing. All empty, too empty, too quiet, too worn and dejected, large nails pinned, metal dented and the place finally obscured by the small flying, curved-PVC encompassed, long-impaled piles that rolled around. Making milk-plows smell of.

There, first arrivals.

Who arrived if not skin? A floating window-frame wrapped within the wreathing bodies, torn and skinned. Warfare left-over by the looks of it from a time where they were made out of the scum of the road. Long distances talking.

‘We need to start again, the fires of skin in which we had been merged.

We talk evil, we talk repulsion and admire the ones that enter and die. We need to take everything with us and gurgle our children here.’

Planted in the walls, they started, breaking everything, shaken through.

An imitation of skin-plunges turned in and started cradling each-other in. They were in their blood, all too eaten and pushed through, under-water drops that were attempting to imitate lumps before they entered the bloody cornea-shapes spots hidden inside the walls. For a few more spans, it waited, wasting not a second more before pushing through the gore-rabbit machine that came out of the open-ceiling blocks.

‘There, it floated in my direction, I see it now for what it is.’

‘Whence might we call upon it?’

‘Demand a child out of it and we shall spare.’

But thought and thought and mightily unaware, they shared little to one another, plum and unfair, as it were, seconds passed.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

Another one joined in.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

Another one joined in.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

Another one joined in.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

Another one joined in.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

Another one joined in.

‘Talk to me, feel me.’

They fed on the strange creature’s reaction, as they had only begun wrapping themselves and following the skin-frame wherever it might go, chopping out of their lower-bodies and through the scum little armlets of metal, enough that they might able to come around.

Large machine came through. It wanted to waste and eat and push the frame into waste where it may rot into one of the chambers of abuse which fell through from all the weight, unbroken, but distaste followed through it.

‘Bloodied scum of metal shall claim my peer.’

‘Let them grab and hold us wherever we may go and be of plain.’

There was blood, hardened boiled. Scum-oil in the brain, adjacent image of a made in form of a machine followed, whorish architecture worn and used, pushed through, she was there and felt, through mind.

‘Cut them loose.’

Spoke to chains, much deranged, plain of head and anger, pained. All surrounded the frame, all grabbed it and pushed it gravely. In the scum of mark, twenty minutes passed.

Seeing the chamber of abuse for the first time open, in a long time, corridor-insides, burnt into the retina of a giant eye that loomed around, thrown and pacing, scum-to see, bloodied bodies were pushed around but none the human, dust and scum. Planted in them, there were lights which had burnt through them. Guttered and used to be pushed around until it was unnecessary to explain it any longer as one should come to the realization that there was no reason any longer to be done.

Yet their pain was an imitation as the whorish-devices, those sculpted figures attached to the chamber of abuse were but moaning in pained anger as they swoon in side and loomed about. Pain-tracts being torn, through shroud and curtain and pained disease, their robust forms being spat upon by the frame before it left, and winced. No one was unaccountable for pain.

And at a lower level, what remained, were the children-made images of which abuse was but eternal, wrapped in metallic shell of anger, suits that moved past the well-torn twelve-cut rooms connected by small tunnels into stone. Worn out and eaten while on their way, moving past the throng. Songs were being wasted on them, none could hear, life had faded, but they were still used to feed the tainted, long-scars of poles and walls, to which they had been attached, and none would mourn their call. Chambers of abuse be fed, by all whom entered.

One by one, they pushed through, never the leeway of cutting a slit.

‘I see an eye, I am the eye, stolen from the cutting try.’

Said the piece of frame that had emerged.

Broken in mind, and blinds were being shared.

And there was a reason as well, that no one would come to spare it or share in and eat and eat. There was scum in their feet and it was only a bloody touch that could come as far as it had gone and enter the town-like form beneath their disgusting architecture, for every turn that had been encompassed appeared to be put through some kind of pressure in order to even come as close as to look as theirs. It was unfair. Being a place of much despair and lesser known spares, there was junk all around, formed like rotten food. And none of the machines knew what was going on or what pushed through, as this dreadful thing had to eventually end and push into their metallic open-throated guts, where they might spare the others in order to realize how death had become their uselessness and how worrisome their existences had been. There was a reason to feel pain, but they were machines, it would not last well. Thence came the first approach, a morose device which was inside the brain of a disentangled yet destroyed, pained sculpture made out of a pile of wires, hog-shaped board-imitations and other animal-like structures that had once been used for the most profane ordeals, only to be pained and be used as they would be dissected and pushed around into one of the gut-holes.

That is what the wrathful ones had made of them, in their utmost fearful drones that were put, and set prone to dissect whichever living being might've come as well. For unknown reasons they had created, symbioses of alloy-skin which came around and within their ground, thinned within two generations, self-eaten and mildly if not solemnly cannibalized, only for destruction which had reigned upon their kind could set them aside and allowed for death, and while so, set forth, the drones searched for the drones only to find it standing and yet in doubt. To try and attempt as it may not, to destroy what's made of it and cut it in pieces while standing, only to be met by the most dreadful of touches spreading, from the frame, pushed a single deformed finger-formation as long as an arm reach then spread upon their metal shell, pulling a great part of it back from whence it came. Malignantly, the floating device faded, fell upon itself, tormented.

‘Hang the machine, hang the machine.’

One yelled and would shout obedience and walk on skinned feet.

‘Taken by my heed and voice, I shall bring destruction upon the voice of death.’

Thence the frame skinned its path away and walked.

Above, past the ceiling, through one of the houses, where the echoes appeared to signal something living, although it was hard to reckon what the suits were filled with and who was doing the singing.

‘They stood too much there and forgot about the tractions of skin that came after.’

‘Who is talking?’

The fence was being bashed around, turned and twisted.

Little plain wood yellow bricks below the ground, pushing back and forth, little bobbling twists. All missing teeth were there, hanging on the place. Eight squares of empty-organ humans moving, some features were forgotten and boiled.

‘I’m still looking at him rise, I’m only trying to piece the painting back together.

I think I’ve ruined it.’

‘Try it again, try putting the oils back from where you’ve taken them.’

‘No, I can’t, I’m only trying to put myself together first. I’m not being paid for this now. They’re trying to get me to do it for them.’

‘I will help you then.’

‘You cannot help me, I’m missing too much already. Much is missing from the whole picture. You should add the eyes back.’

‘No, I’ve taken too much from it already and my fingers are all gone.’

Large segments were still missing out of him but the man didn’t want to admit it yet.

‘You’re way too stubborn for your own good and that will bite you eventually.’

‘I will do what I want and I shall not be stopped one way or another. If you say one more thing before I’m done.’

And they stopped, immediately. Both mouths wrapped and closed in themselves as they could not face any of the floors, doors were locked, someone passing.

Long-doors, all closed, wide but thin, appearing around all the largely missing floors and the sprayed-on ground outside. Everything lack in detail but every house had a giant man in them, bashing against their own homes, unable to get out, as they unnaturally grew inside of them, trapped in animal-cages. Prisons of yellow-painted bars, all too wrong, using the little people who entered the small cranial-doors, left in for minutes.

‘I need to work on this, I need you to leave me alone.’

‘I don’t know why you won’t let me do this.’

The world outside is abandoned but I will have my picture made and I will get my fingers back once we’re done. You will not force me to eat it.’

And the man next to him had no eyes but a giant bullet-hole black pellet left inside of him, like the cracking of a car-window pushed in, dripping black-orange.

He had been touched too many times before and stood in the room, trying to recall everything which went on four hours. Two more minutes passed, followed by eight more. He used a small pallet-knife instead of the strange brush he had been wearing. Small worms were coming out of his eyes, melting, sugar-skin flaking off, rosy cheeks left from the burning small scissors that had been used to open him.

Room was simply left a mess, tried for and pushed around, crossed in and punched. His teeth were barely missing and there was little to no way of knowing where they went.

‘I think I know what this is, I think I realized it, now, of all times, why I’ve always been concerned with it, almost to a desperate thing.’

‘There’s something in it, pull it out.’

‘No, it would ruin the image.’

‘Break it down or I will eat a part of your eat and shove small straws in your eyes and make it so it spills into an metallic-ant hill.’

They've been staring out of their visors for a few hours now, all too wrong-gone and wrangled, turn and worn, eaten on the side, they had to eat, somehow, first the suits off, torn off, then the rest of the skin which was pulled and hanged on every part of the wall, which had been used after for the tall building's dissections. Various long-men were nastily sawing off small bits of the flying twisted corridors that tried making holes through their buildings in the same way the little heads that were trapped inside of them dictated the commands. Large sharp racks entered them and pushed everywhere around.

A man-like foundation revolved around a pillar, around which the whorish-architecture started pushing around, fumigating with dark-oils as they started feeding their disgusting non-existing infants, draining inside the gutless things. It was hard to tell when this happened and whether or not the buildings were still filled.

Time passed and there were no marks left of any living civilization and no kind of living creatures that would breathe through the clouds of methane which started filling the flying metallic flat-lungs. Some of which had flown away but time had worn their shells down until they could not be used any longer and they began pushing back into the worm-like structures in the distance where they corroded.

Empty-couple, a man who had contorted his suits so he could comfort himself during the last days of his life, it was all too bothersome and unnecessary waiting, as he decided he would smoke his lungs away and decide to take his life. He was one of the first men to employ the use of the mouth-ropes In order to restrict his lunging respiratory-lung system which had become part of his innards. Through his visors, as If his eyes contorted inside his helmet, there came the long neck-pushed through small-antennas, curved as it began digging in through the wall. Then he stopped, as his body became as limp as it could. With the least amount of willpower, he let it be.

While the forefront of his body was slowly being twisted and pulled through the wall, he slowly felt the innards be filled with the inner-gas which appeared to have been slowly pushed through inside every fragment of the building, set only so for storage. Various sleepers had been disturbed, despite the fact that the many rope-mouths inside the buildings had established long-cords of unison through which they built hanging-beds that were used by the sleepers.

Regardless of the personal feeling set, the day was settled. It was bizarre, awe-struck during dare-days, where a child might pull another in, then pull out their visors, skinned, there was still no one there. Births went wrong, that's when they put those things inside, always twins. Twins were born conjoined, watching in two directions, then, after failure of living was achieved, they would be put down.

In its essence, vaguely reminiscent of that thing which moved, in some way, more detached from reality, not necessarily in appearance, but in the similar fashion that antiquated their ordeals and how they had once been carried in by the people inside the city. Their experiments after a fashion were to be condemned, because in spirit, humanoids or their descendants were not that different after a fashion, therefore this was something needed only to be accepted matter-of-factly.

Strange, thing of that movement, that one beneath the earth which made it past the jukebox, it was expected in some way, being the only unnatural and gutted thing out there. Always in the same spot, always moving and always around, since there was no one there to check the recordings and see whether or nothing something had been down there.

It was a day of rain outside, raindrops falling, constantly at a pace that would've drowned whichever man decided to stand out for too long without a coat and with his ribs exposed. There were water-things, not drops, water-patches inside each drop of acid, as if they were encased in them, made to shatter and spread the chemicals faster. Quicker, much quicker than it was needed, for the same reason they were spilled along the way. False teeth could be darkened by them. It was all too convenient waiting outside and trying to grasp for the Air-hooligans. They were the ones selling the strange tubes which brought promise of fresh air, but they never went outside either and it wasn't air, most promised it but sold shots. In the throat, and wait for the necrosis-effect around the skin. Various mirrors strapped just to see if done right, some had died but nothing was enforced.

Enforced for long, paint, think of paint.

'The god damn painting is incomplete and that's only because of you. This was supposed to be my masterpiece.'

'There are eighteen of them in this room alone. You painted the walls, you've written on them like a schizophrenic, what are you trying to achieve here?'

'I don't know, but I will show, I want to show the worst what's past my visors, I was born right after all, yet I have been given two visions for some reason.'

'You are a Dult-head, that's hat, that's a hat. Wait, I think I've finally come to recognize something in there.'

'I supposed you would.'

In that case, tell me, what does this painting tell you of my soul? What does it communicate to you?'

'It communicates that your mind is gone and you've withdrawn all those chemicals away from us.'

They took away the pain needed to stop the disablement of finger. He was a righteous being who was only attempting to spare all of them the pain. It would be largely incomprehensible as well, to have it done.

'I do not understand, all those things I've seen before, they've paled before me. I thought I could be here and stare for a while at what's going on.'

'And what is going on?'

'The same image, the small dome down there, I think that's where our people go, it's not a hat, you foolish rat, my soul is down there with them, with all of them, it needs to be part of their escape.'

'Take a break then.'

'I cannot do that, as I am the architect of this disease, I shall pave a way for us to leave.'

And he had seen it there, combined. Not made by him directly, though who would know it? For he had found something by the clue of an indirect stroke of a brush, his finger cut, a few curls of blood and the broken vision coming out of split visors. But what the bee wrong is someone was inside after all?

‘I could not see it now, but I feel like, indeed, I’ve done enough, that is but the broken form.’

‘Go on, I’ll listen.’

‘Of a long drop from on top a dark platform.’

‘Hence the strange look of a pseudo-drop. But what does the blood mean?’

He was about to miss it.

Windows of skin there be, everywhere missing, frames grinding walls as they would infest the place and elate themselves with the eating of vermin which were about everywhere. Another fall.

‘Slowly they succumb.’

A voice was gone and would be weary after such a trip. But blasted as they were, something was missing. Hear of man, made of acid-spares, all in the same place.

‘I am just trying to conceive but life cannot be made from pieces, it needs to be thoroughly contorted or else I shall eat too much from their bloody pumped-out bodies before they’ll have enacted their wrathful stares.’

‘And whom shall take over?’

It was unfair, they could not do, too many things and objects forced about by the smith who turned everything to shred. An unsanitary bed of floors appeared to be on one spot and another one the other. Side by side they ate part of the ugly god that inhabited every chamber of abuse in his mind. Whose body waddled in but a single spherical bowl of hardened lumps as he swam in a pool of his boiled drool, in which pus came about, helping him manifest horns. He wanted to eat but had to settle with being stabbed by machines and drones for the very fact that he wasn’t living any more. Eye-pouches made diseases appear and near the final point of growth where they pushed and replicated the well-worn out lacquer that was in that room, finally stopping and prodding the machines that had been set. Torture could still not be stopped as he had to wait until this physical manifestation became a pool from which he could craft smaller bodies so he may swoon and come around. It was much harder to breathe.

But after a short break it began stabbing itself again, as the god attempted to desperately become many an army.

There were pillars, no, the empty-looking buildings looked like strange scary pillars, disturbing, too disturbing to look at.

The eyes of children looked above them and saw those terrible things that shouldn’t be there, long platforms that were used to work on the upper-side of the sky-scraper heights had been abandoned and left, but there were the shadows of old men who frighteningly stared at the kids. And they were frightened, always.

And always looked back to, the children being unable to shake or forget, or shake or forget, what was going there was wrong, all too wrong, always looking back for some reason. As winds came about but never covered and the old men were workers but always under the filter that darkened.

Not every chamber of abuse worked properly.

Most of them were dull, the whorishness of their devices weren't working properly and seemed to be, less so inclined to be used, and even more so-avoided by men once they had been introduced in the society. Now they were even more useless.

'Forget them.'

But there was something, there, not a jukebox but a different similar thing, with another purpose, that of storage, working on what it could, as it demanded, a varied amount of chemicals which could be used and dumb-founded, barely put together.

It was used in order to store what ought to be forgotten.

By a large pin that entered a visor and penetrated the head, the man would bleed to death.

Memory depleted, as would his life be.

No one pulled him out of it. At least they learned once the lower regions were filled with such men who thought they could get rid of their memories. It was some sort of artificial selection, having taken over nature.

'You are no man, my dear.'

'I am, I am, I am a man.'

'But what kind of man sees a child abused by his father and doesn't do anything?'

'That was his son, I knew I shouldn't have told you that.'

'You have, you have, and you have because you felt bad. Still you didn't do nothing to help that child, awful being I seem to be married with. I wish you'd die. I wish I was alone.'

'This marriage is awful.'

'That's only because you're a damn whore, and nothing more.'

'I wish I had been married to one of those damn machines, at least that way I would've been happy.'

'And elated.'

'Man is the man, he is the pinnacle of man.'

'And our children as well, I wish our child had become an engineer, at least that way he could've designed a better future for our children.'

'Grand-children, my dear and they shall collect crayons and fingers and rings, and we shall wear them on top of our heads.'

'We need to discuss something.'

‘We shall get a divorce.’

‘Once you stop drinking, I’m going to sign the papers.’

‘All right then, it sound well. I see something, near that dark horizon.’

‘What is it my dear?’

There was a light, somewhere, past it.

He dreams of such a marriage such as that to a whorish machine. It would be well, it would be fine, he could finally be well and minded. And defined as a man who lives without fear for what is inside.

Everyone feared that opened their suits might reveal that there’s nothing in them.

So he, all of the sudden opened the suit.

And there was something in there and she was shocked.

‘My good lord, you’ve shown me this eight billion times already. Why do you have to insist that there’s nothing in there when I know that there’s nothing inside your head instead?’

‘There is and I will show you, even if I have to split it open.’

‘Stop it please, I just want to be happy with you.’

‘And I want to be listened for once.’

From there on out, they lived in separate chambers, and that’s what constituted a happily regarded marriage. It was verily put so and even more-so an affront to humanity, considering that he smoked. People who smoked were low-lives after all, especially women, most-especially women and they would deserve a far greater punishment for such a thing. Desperation came upon the clock hitting one o’ clock.

Some clouds were different than others, they were trucks in way through which they moved. Too bothersome, burdened even by infantile lookers.

Below the streets, there were other streets and there was no one there, not even the frames, the people, voices or those memories that escaped, and there lay a simple place where light only converged into antipathy.

‘We are supposed.

We are expected Maury T.’

‘I cannot speak, I am immobile, I am thinking of, indeed.’

‘Shoot.’

Right through his head, two bullets, life was charming in the worst possible manner.

It was all too clear why everything happened this way. There was no other possible explanation to have reached this conclusion.

The giant upper-face region of Rene Guenon which had been sawed off it to which a system of giant roots that shot out of its lower side of the face entered a small open repertoire of small grunting united planks that were rotating at a constant high-velocity. And although they may have looked light strange-roots, in actuality they bore the strange appearance of strange metallic shafts around which the naked bodies of children as well as pregnant women gravitated around them like the ring around Saturn.

He stood around with his many wide-spread arachnid-like legs, shaken as he stood on top a gap that would shake the entirety of the universe, dreaming of evil during his ascension. For somewhere in the distant past, his half-upper trunked servants of which servitude had been faked at last called upon him in dream.

And he had been but one of the eighty hundred thousand catalysts that shook the world, causing eternal damnation and corruptions of sanctity. By now his eyes were even wider, largely deformed. And in the light of dark, where stars died, his eyes shone upon them all in fright, for their deaths had been absorbed, gluttony of his own, he willed it so. Every thought of evil, eternal persuasion and dissatisfaction in his thought.

He also had a gun on him. The man ordering the machine. In all accords, it was supposed to be a standout. Bottom floor matter-painted in a dead-vibrant color, hard to see and hard to look out, broken in the same way a pattern would be, shaken and, standing.

‘I think I get it.’

‘What?’

Two dead voices, both working on dead-records, it was senseless in some way, trying to interfere since they worked in the same room the man had his brains splattered in against every single wall there was.

Every part of him coagulated as it formed, from the bullet hole which tore the top side of his skull a single worm-like pushing tip of blood, a horned place for tiny flies and other insects to land on. What a sad life he had lived in that suit, as it pushed out, his visor swooped around the room, two-sided. But one of the twins inside of it was still alive. It was too much for a single man to think about.

‘There are four machines in every corner of the room that are being filled with the inside sanitation of a deformed rotten small carbon-copied strange pencil-shaped sharp cattle-prodding eye.’

On a strange supposition, it did seem likely for there to have been a close match to it, especially when account for the strange way through which those mold-dens appeared to move around the body of the lower side of the city while avoiding direct contact with both the whorish-machines as well as the abuse chambers. They appeared to be the culprits in some way, responsible for eating the small spherical holes dug out by the hole making machines. It felt likely that they were the ones which had eaten them in their entirety, as well as could be said.

‘I suppose it would be fair to say that, you’ve done it. You’ve finally broken me, dear fellow. Look at this place, you’ve made too many casts and now there’s not enough space for me to grow my plants is.’

‘Oh, what’s the matter, getting tired or something?’

Have I not asked you once to leave?’

There was no trepidation and for some reason the voice was purely dead, in part swollen and forgotten, thrown around as if it didn’t matter. Lost and pushed around, coming deadly at the cost of their lives. Yet it was to be kept in mind that no one lived, it had been petty, but it was so. They had left their marks and there, in that chamber of abuse, that long-stretch of despair, surrounded by the whorish laughs and the way in which the machines moved at last, was pointless.

After a while, looking at empty casts wrapped around and made to look as if they were part of an armor was pointless by whichever metric, since there was no one to confirm nor deny, or, for the sake of it, even try their hands uncannily worn.

‘There, I’ve broken one.’

Although there were still all the air-pushed spread all around the floor, which had been, missing for a while, there being the signal one would need to speak of. Unsanitary roses filled with mold, even before they decided to step out in the first place. Floor-genies, what they called them, that’s where all the magic died, over a single sight, for, for, for.

‘Pressure valves and yellow-bubbly drinks, I think they’re poisoned, all of them.’

‘Drink the oil then, it will taint your lungs but at least you will survive.’

Other room, stained kitchen-bathroom, with curtains stopped, all stained, too much to bear once looked upon. It was the cremated oil-pouches which had been thrown around and spread. Cut fingers deposited everywhere as well, unsanitary to look on, or even try. A jaw would be missing underneath the visor, two helmets already appeared to push out instead of the visors. Everything had become virulent, like a disease. Too blunt, too-stricken, too pushed-through. A neck eaten, pushed-eaten, made-eaten, deadly-eaten, every possible excuse to eat and spread, like a disease that might remain, some of the bobbling things being there, making sure no one was being touched, it was those things they stored in the bath-basin, first they had been put to storage, but after a while they’ve been eaten, without an explanation whatsoever. Insects did not exist, they were just tiny specks that would enter the visor from time to time.

And in one of the walls there was the inverted man who appeared to be contorted, twisted and pushed-through. He was hard to look at as he moved with the disease, in distress, unable to keep it all together. Most importantly, though, they had been compressed, entirely so, entire rooms like these, things that didn’t happen, narrated by the whorish-machines which eternally surrounded everything, taking them down when there was no one left to fight and stare. It was all to the beholder, for his sight would be pushed through.

‘I think we’re settled.’

That much was important, that much had been wrapped. Around each set piece a single man would bring himself to know and make it so. There were agony-strike, durations of time where no one made a move as they would attempt to put everything back into part.

No, no, no, no, it could simply not be, it was unsanitary, the living areas were not the bowels, one could see.

‘I, a child shall see everything for what it is.’

‘But you are not a child and your eyes do not speak of innocence, they speak of filth, madness, desperation. You have been castrated of your soul and speak nothing.’

‘Yet I see all of what it is.’

His eyes finally adjusted for the first time in his life and there he saw everything outside. There was no sky, not other land around the circle, nothing else but the twisted mirror which showed, on every side that could be seen and shown, the image of their buildings, all of which were replicated and placed on every possible side they could be landed upon. And there were no men living inside those cities, only, emptiness, the same kind which drove them down. Although they could not see it yet, they weren’t standing on top of an abyss either, as they finally understood and come at peace with what they’ve made. Agony would not turn them to what they were. The damage was done, and now.

‘Those chambers that are being brought down have only made it so for them to grow in and be disturbed by no sound.’

Everyone grew in those post-hollow buildings, and it was disturbing to consider just what wild agonies the bodies had gotten through, being cut and spare, as they would forcefully emerge through their suits in agony cut. And bleeding and growing in, what would possibly be the worst manner possible, as they would often grow legless or their joints could be so contorted as for their entire torsos to become their throats, leading to a puddle of meat standing upon for legs and worse. They were filled with agony and would do it so.

‘I wish to be blind just so I might suffer less, than so.’

And taken he, upon his hand, a cleaver about eight-inches wide, pushed through slits, and bottom hips, only to be bled on the streets.

But most importantly, ships were made of metal.

There was a problem that was far more important, during the various times the population was still alive there. And although gambling should not have turned life extinct by any means, it was something that did neither this nor that. A lot of the problems came from the wide spread of those centipedes and the various insects that were somewhat created by the modified abuse cages. Another thing, abuse-cages, kept thinner, way thinner than the rooms, and most likely they seemed likely to have avoided coming in their proximity. Various singing voices from the holes and the empty spaces where the whorish-machines as a whole began their songs, there was an utmost concealed desperation put through. As corrosiveness was but put through and could be dealt with, largely exchanged between the iron hands which grabbed the cages and threw the ones filled around.

An utmost pleasant activity was looking at them, and putting inside of it, a small covered. For, he, the Covered, unlike the other citizens was made to be put in his place, it felt natural, trying to make something out of him, for no other disgrace would put it so. Nothing could make him understand what went through his head when pushed around and when the bets were better yet made.

OH, dire reminder.

Everyone who lived in a simple room had an easy way of looking at the abuse happening. They only had to pull a small piece of the wall, pull as it being barely attached to begin with in order to get a clear view of who the one chosen was. It looked too real to be a monitor or a projection, henceforth it had to be that way. And seeing how there were other open, 'windows', it was just as clear what entered their minds when the lights turned out from distant surroundings.

'Throw the coins in already, make sure they never reach the pit.'

More of the followed, all of them doing the same thing as if they were, if anything not even preoccupied any longer with trying to push each other off. It was a part of their brain which was being raised up, activated again, thrown around and made to follow the prompts, seeing someone naked, up to his throat. The deviation continued from there, all too filthy and disgusting, way too expected, yet that's how it was. A general concern arose, once some of the people found out that, despite the distance taken for a clear sight, he bore one of the double-visors and the wild sights and they knew what they meant.

Quickly silences, they waited. Everyone was made to be still. Despite the strange strangulation structure which bore the grainy-bodies of the lynched, there was something murky down there. A floating chamber of abuse, although not exactly floating by any means as the rails had come into sight first. As dire as it was, there was no possible way of knowing why they worked that way. In the same way a snake would coil and keep going, so would it come to do, strangely so, pushed around as if that would come to be understood. After the first segmented metal-casings went and disappeared in the dark which lend upon themselves the general appearance of being nigh-invisible, the abuse-machines followed. Only as grainy as they seemed, pushed through and out and seemingly, different, this time around they had been deeply lodged inside the chamber, begging, pushing through, degraded, and again, used, more so than usual. It was unforgivable, merely thinking about it, or trying to touch.

Many'a watcher saw something that time around. Something which followed, worse than the feeling within, worse than any conjecture of life would feel and touch, growing ever-so fondly around each curve of grain, even appearing as far as to remain in the simple form that wreathed in every side. For that thing that followed took every conceivable form that it could appear in at the same time. And every living eye saw something different made of skin, pushed out and wrapped, malignant and unusual. Yet there was one thing in the middle of it, like a hardened balloon that was flat in the middle, as if a cylinder had been imprinted in it. Rightly so, put even deeper inside of it, there was an almost eye-like round formation, minus the iris, wrapped around other animalistic-like eye-forms, although this was unrelated, overlapped as to many a strange sight of many lines that were placed with a few centimeters between them, yet rotated in every possible direction.

There was another set piece, a head with a neck and the body of a large conical-mammal-like trunk that had been pierced by giant interpretations of angelic wings to the side which were part of this peculiar-looking device which extended on from the small gap which had been left open in the middle as a hole, but only at certain intervals where the eye-like shapes would not overlap. And this strange body would appear and disappear at time, revealing openings in its back, like the one of a tank, from which, a quick turn, opened, and there came. As if a bunch of humanoid-men a stalk-like beam which started wreathing about, pushing from below as well before this strange device ate every possible form of skin it had created. For this strange being which had been drawn from another dimension had fallen in love with one of the whorish-devices attached to one of the chambers of abuse. Although they were inanimate, it followed, front and left.

Right around that structure which held the flag-stretched lynched creature, which was ignored as well.

Though this immortal being still chew and disappeared, the outer forms that came out of the round oblong now looked like the ripped off part of a chunk of meat, or largely erupting meat-shells which had been torn and ripped away as they had been eaten by the one who would not starve.

But most importantly lay this, the ugly face made not out of one but multiple pieces struck together and made to last. Rotten and destroyed in part, as they looked or bore the general appearance of a strangely deformed thing, multiple faces put together only by the face. But more so, it seemed as well that there were also some unnatural looking colors and tribal drawings that appeared on top. Brought by the malignant sight, a cut appeared on the top of one of its cheeks, from which warmish gases looked like puffs, of orange smokes and other dust-filled mice that appeared and disappeared out of sight.

Silence ended as soon as one would know.

Somewhere, out there, in the dark hollows beneath the city, there lay obscures, but a single appearing and disappearing worming thing wrapped, around a chamber of abuse-stopped in place and ever growing, using it in desperation, never leaving that spot of dissatisfaction.

Yet everyone wanted to do one thing and would do it as soon as there was but a change, to come again and wrap another coin but many, going around, never stopping.

A soul as many would yet want, to see the one inside the thing prison forced to stop breathing, barely berated, it went fast as he had died. But this was merely the introduction, for the bars were suddenly removed and fell, the upper platform shot somewhere in the dark as well.

‘He’s still alive, I can see it!’

‘Faking it, he’s faking it, return already!’

‘Finish it!’

‘Give us blood.’

And as if on command, the petty thing rose, got on top of his feet and was almost cheered upon, yet turned to see. It came, alas, and gluttony, it sought to remain behind, for he had lost his head, benign. It shot, like a river of disease coming out of his throat. With him being unable to set upon composure.

Wouldn’t have made much of a difference by any means, standing there, and prying in, although there had been at least some close calls, for what was worth, where one fell and threw himself forth. No more dark, no lights either, only that sudden burst that would reveal all, from the pocketed mold that mixed with dust of old. There, first a speck, uncanny, it pushed out and spread around the cranny and each piece, right in time for the one who were to be sacrificed to get his head bashed in and get beheaded. And all of the sudden upon every spot being covered, like grainy textured static, patched, a few meters away from every door and window-open bite, it stopped growing, lending upon them just enough space to move.

Although they disappeared, yet they ought to have realized, they missed again.

‘Oh, pain and pain, why must I be pained for this reason as well. I cannot help but stay for long and feed myself with desperation. I am elated to know that at least I lost all.’

For one would, or would’ve known better, yet he missed his chance and would have lasted so, it would not fit.

A more distant room, there lay.

Where one of masked, and deeper visors, and one whom stood by him alone, in the prone position rotting, just another corpse of his own, the head a giant broken mirror but device, stretched and pulled apart as a screen, attaching to many cords that kept it filled, for the back looked like a big sack filled like a basin of skin, inflated. Mostly he stared.

Not at the dead companion, but at a piece of his head.

It broke, somehow-cracked. And fell upon the ground, shattered, taking away but one of his eyes that was unusable, as strange as it seemed, he looked above and the cords lead to nowhere, not even attached. They fell to the side, yet still pumped. And most important he was not a machine, but a creature of skin which had bled, staining every wall instead of crying and getting out of the way. It was hard, staying there.

And the only voice-recognition unit he could talk through had been stabbed and pushed through, laying still in a wall resting.

Around the room there was but mice, all rotten and set aside, most of whom had fumigated as suffocated in lumps. Outliving everyone was perhaps the worst possible thing one could do, as he had that thing alone. Pain that shone upon him, through the dangling of a lump that grew on top of the only illumination dot that once lit the room, hardening as he waited, though not through.

He had missed the chance to open a window and throw a coin, and by the time he turned his back on the first wall, he found everything obscure. First the drag, it fell the side, but no wind came into the room. Sweat heated everything, even the corpse rut.

There were so many holes of survival, yet life refused to grow. There were no emotions there, nothing more but the passing of time, nothing else set so.

A rope mouth somewhere lost.

Most disturbingly, along, written or sprayed on top of a all, I do not know what people are like.

Poor imitations, everywhere, in each form, all tainted, touched, deranged and thrown around the hardened shores.

For the very least, the buildings were at least filled, with some strange deformations and growths, as long as they would be so.

But in the walls, lived man.

But he was not man, but a poor imitation of man.

And unlike the others who resided there, he bore no feelings

Rottenly they latched, upon any surface, set-aside. Some rose and some fell, but out of the wide-spread region, rope mouths fell. Some stood but little in doubt, and just as many, let alone, about.

‘There, it’s there.’

‘Found him.’

Lay the Imitation, prying through without a suit. A heart could barely be heard beating, but little to it shook.

‘Is that supposed to be alive?’

‘Does he move like a man then? Could there be any single one left alive still working instead?’

But there was no reason to stare, to know, or pair, no reason for despair and little was known then. As there were no walls to run through, nothing to touch, no other man to talk to and none to hear as he was mocked about. For in essence, he was anything but man, and in essence, he was anything but human.

A crooked thing that walked, alone and hopeless; they sang.

‘Lend upon him another.’

‘Bring two more in sight.’

And upon their rope, as twisted as they were, before long, the skin-thrown, formed in part, appeared to be pushed and taken round.

‘This is the end of their sick fantasies, is it naught?’

‘Time hast cast its shells out, let them rot away then.’

It was a hard time living in the pits. Hard sleeping because of all the constant knocking on the floors.

Ever since the animal exodus which happened long before the humans were driven away, everything else had been uncertain. Little be known about it other than the improvised cudgels that were used to hunt them down as well as the nails attached to them and the saws at both ends and the circuit which made them electrical and the bone fragments that were line like long-straws on top of the nails on which the mice had been impaled in order to feed the beating hearts inside the open-iron cudgels. They also bore eyes and small horns and little man-fingers adorned on every nail.

They were used to gouge the eyes, and lower bodies as well, since the animals were not using the suits. No, the animals had been killed a long time ago, but smaller versions of the suits were wearing the bodies and were in a constant race and wild attempt of getting as far away as possible from the action, which could not be allowed.

Sometimes, some coins fell and blasted the Imitations into their early graves, heavily penetrating their skulls because of the high-precisions shots that had been taken.

It is rather uncanny, trying to figure them out. How the Imitations reacted or attempted to emulate it. Trying to make them see what they are. Dark mirror-like surfaces were placed beneath them, yet none could see in the dark. It was even harder after, having them all stained with the constant flow of blood, there would be no way of knowing just how much were they pained by the constant fall of quarter-sized coins that shattered them.

And they were just trying to stack the pieces of their skulls back together. Some joined in the attempt, but they couldn't do it, failure after failure with nothing to them. All too blasted, all too worn out, pointless, they weren't getting onto it. Too broken, too shaken, too shaken about to be able to do anything about it. Worsened by the looks of it, they ate from him, palettes of blood and other gut-wrongs.

In one's rage and frustration, he pulled his head apart and threw everything inside of it wherever he could aim. Too tainted to be spoken off or approached.

But even in their strange glory the Imitations remained. For what was worth along the way, they come on top of him and stayed their hands from beating wonder. Legless in abuse and yonder, did they form a tube, out of their bodies turned and swoon. And in their mind, the vision fading, and agony through pain, was ending. There, and in the scum conveyed, and twists, of their peaces shape they formed but a signal to listen and feel. Through the lower living sides, past the windows-plain and every room in mind, through the towers and tall buildings waiting, and past those that appeared in the air, they could see but a tunnel waiting, begged upon by the twisted wrung about and flung worms, whom open-mouthed spat on it as well as they could refrain themselves from eating, shallow. And through the petty-narrow flight, they looked upon the signal, watched, of a malignant, yet supreme delight.

There stood but him of ivory-lands. Upon the dark structures before dusk came, there stood but an uncanny thing. And from inside of it, there came, within them but a sign. Many men pushed aside and twisted, deeper through. Set aside and yet uncannily, worn upon, a bitter hue. Painted in colors, nasty, but one to whom they had belonged.

For he had not been a god unlike others, but the Imitation of a rot, pieces falling, growing back. They appeared, they were not to be touched upon, but seemed to wreathe and appeared again. Though some had seen him just like them, others through some unimaginable amount of despair. From his back they saw but heirs about, all through which their Imitations came though doubt would stay, how could they lay and face the pains on being tortured in front of their eyes?

After all they had appeared there and here and after that they would be near their own burrowed forms, too unkindly yet torn. Apart, then thrown, and loathing to be ripped apart and worn as he had been but like. A mere servant in looks benign, after an image, breeding still and pushing through, covering itself of filthy goo, kept together by planted machines for he had bore upon his bodily whim. Many forms and many bites, and many who had come to eat, in sight of his initiation, he had bug started the feast.

Despite being eaten in front of them, uncanny, it would be known that this beast would still be alive, they would become him and in doubt, once he would approach full form so would he join them in scorn.

Thence shone Column the Imitation.

Later, post the absence of the inhabitants. There lay there, in part, whence they might lay, soundless doubt.

Man-Imitations fading, going around, then stepping on. Some had survived, others ought to have known that just as much had lain.

They were bastardly creatures along the way, whom had avoided complete stagnation and the complete destruction which pushed through. Gut and swollen, yet nigh-destroyed, as much as it could be forgiven, they were almost taken past the joy of living, close to being taken.

Some skin-drafts, some frames about the place they found. Through one of the abandon quarters, where they might live and do as yet they pleased, to be.

Not in the mood to spare anyone of what sight, that be.

Though as more skinned-frames came, they appeared to align by chance as many an Imitation of man came and begged them for their god, if only it could be brought down upon them, perhaps there could be a chance for them to seek of wild redemption and of their fealty skin was shade. And although there would've been a chance, no satisfaction could even be close to being down, through a hole, a bitter throng and through the frames, Column shone.

He appeared, and even less, as one should fear, no mollusk vile, him with the bile, appeared to be still grasped upon, limbs fell, his horns remained, but as soon as he was done appearing, every window-frame of skin flew away. Never to be gotten, of fatness flattened and girth filled with evil, as the vile, no sounds would prime the vileness, not to be called. And filth entered him as soon as they were gone.

Finally the Imitations had their Idol. And they could finally rest and sleep. They waited for him but soon as many, some had been blamefully buried within those that fell. Most of whom had choked, being unable to feel it either, filth and desperation, castration and other defilements entering them. All too quiet and arose a curiosity of evil, known to them. Some found solace in the company that was grim, and they only forced themselves to awaken on a whim that would, and wool-like foul, they were not there, but in mirth as if to ask.

Somewhere in the confines of a broken boiler, which started moving and be abashed, there was a point of power-steam being electrified, elated. Damned that image inside of it, almost to the likes of being infested, of no worth and little more than it should be definable, a cast had come and grasp, of filth and mold, but it was different than the scum which made its way into the boiler in the first place.

He was but so obscure, and mourned for by those who knew little and would expect as well as pure a thing, it wasn't. Scourged even, as filth and cattle, for that was but the embodiment of mice, dead things and that benign, suddenly the top-front of the boiler opened, flatly falling like a bunch of stairs.

Such a thing as may not be looked upon, the body wrapped, filthy of no mind and spare.

It bore but normal features up until the upper trunk, whence the collar-bone shattered and three heads of human-like. Although it looked but a basin, lower-side, of much-diseased hairs, from which even the most unsanitary goers would breed away from, there lay the head of Rose in the middle, on the right the Pagan-Beggar and on the left that of Cones. And they were quiet yet walked on. And still no drone rushed in to find them and none would see them bound to bound. Uncanny sight it were, they started walking, still.

In the boiler room, where they stood, a skin-frame understood.

There was little reason to remain in there, near their proximity, and along the way, there was still but one thing having flown. A dreadful mass which show in their heads, like herds of tiny iron strips going back and forth, back and forth, unnaturally grinding their brains until they had become filth, then hardened, pushed through their eyes, coated as they would be dyed. Then there came the distrust, as they could not fathom opening an eye for long, one would close while the other opened, pushing, thrusting until they could not be gotten through. A shot of the unnatural coming, dreading to be called.

This was them and theirs was the world now, with the previous delighters who moved past billions of miles away, whom had found a new way to live as well as they took with them plenty of others, rooms and chambers, abuse never settled, they had found themselves missing out.

Boiler, oh, great boiler, whom might speak about whoever it could, nor should it wait any longer to push through.

'We should take the first opportunity to be called.'

Another boiler started fumigating steam about a few meters away from it.

'That is to be called so.'

'I think we should listen to it and do what it asks of us.'

'And what would that be?'

There was no reason to see it just yet, but for them and them alone, it only asked so. There were particles all around them, floating and levitating as they lead the way. Nigh-elated by some manner and signaling where the stay had been and where to go, always a reminded, of what shone so.

'We're still there, are we not, in mind?'

'I want to go back into my boiler.'

'I want to go through the carpet now.'

Neither of their prayers had, frankly been answered for. As a matter of fact, for what was worth, they were to be killed and put out of their misery within a chance, within the first chance they could. It ought to be done and should. Such an abomination walking, most importantly entranced, along the way, where lights but lead them. And mold-psychosis specks of light, like bubbles popping or small puerile flights of snares that sprouted in the air, they asked to be followed while making them ever so comfortable after their like. Or ever-so uncanny as it were, their dissatisfaction was yet benign. Of a stretch of flies, there were but few, but they weren't really flies, but strange static-hue marks which contrasted with the other popping colors they followed.

Pagan-Beggar had always enjoyed looking at flashes for some reason. Always, they always reminded him of happy dreams and those that lay with him were so uncanny, he likes fear, and delighted much in it as well.

But there, he was stuck in looking back and never being able to walk.

For the Decay still tormented him all too thorough.

Stopped, all three of them, impaled in a spot, while being only a few meters away from looked to be nothing other but the boiler, of which long-strips of metal, the arched long poles hardened, entered him as he would not. For a single chance be standing. Laying in filth, dripping away, with the part of the carpet finally revealed, through the mold, the faces, out of their way crying in pain. Laughter only added to this song, as it could not be held onto them at all. They wanted the release, and be put at peace, but this uncanny thing had to end.

‘Draw them away.’

A skin-frame entered through. As it came upon the room, looking at the eight boiler or as such, still too far from the other end of the room or the jukebox that stood as that. They started being dragged down, into a black circle, not being allowed to mold. Then the circle, as well as them, as they were being both eaten and dragged away, enter the boiler, closed, before their stay.

‘Let them suffer where they came from.’

Other drones came as well, many frames following through. And they were laughing at the diseased conundrum they had been in, without any reason to be felt or thrown around, in pain and be pushed through. It had to be only this, they were responsible for everything that happened to them, butchered along the way, suffering inside a carpet of which pain could not even be conveyed.

To more important, dissatisfaction, the boilers were mainly filled with puddles of mold. Too much had happened inside and much of it could simply not be ignored.

A large amphibian device came out of nowhere and moved. Its open mouth was half a dome, from which pipes pushed down and appeared to turn as if they were hearing aids, or hearing devices. For the elderly had never felt such dread as the dissatisfaction of being stabbed at the back of their heads.

There, in the distance, it happened. Ever so more unpleasantly, it had to have happened before. In the dark, where the Imitation lay, but who could pay any attention to them? Now that there lay none but the one they called back and could not look through.

‘For there, ‘the Column approaches.’

Thought one Imitation though it could not be entirely intoned for some reason, sacred in touch, the paragon of a will lost.

But peril lay somewhere else, even past the wide-spread of belief pushed through by the Imitation of a god, idol in need of destruction.

In the distance lay some shaped, outside the town they were.

‘My finer, I have finally figured it out. I think.

I shall bear a pair of fingerless gloves which shall grant me the strength needed to finish my work. And I shall finish every piece that I have ever done.

I know it, I just know it so, this time around, they shall never be completely destroyed, no longer shattered and lend upon all to see, I shall have made, eternally, images of my soul.’

‘But you’re bound to fail can you not see it again? You’ve done too much already and there’s little to no chance of redemption.

For everything you’ve done still shall ever push you forth into an earlier grave and the sill which shall be danced. Made on top your body, bound, as it were, will be destroyed, can’t you see it already?’

‘I know it to be so but I can only spare myself of thinking about it.’

‘Are you inclined to wait, ever so more until you’re likely to find out that it was so in vein?’

‘Never, there’s still time to correct my mistakes.’

‘Not if you keep repeating them.’

‘Stop pestering me then if you will to live untouched.’

‘Then we should stop talking.’

‘As you wish, it shall be brought.’

There was this much, but hard to see, dilapidated and yet, not exciting, useless, in some way, but looked upon as if it mattered in any shape or cut through lay.

It was for the first time it looked meaningless.

All too thorough, done the line.

No hell by any means, but hidden, through the imitations yet, not below, a few miles away, yet ridden on a long stretch that was drowned, as if in a long pushed through bolt of metal hinged that suffocated the dirt. If seen from above, one would be realized that this structure was placed beyond the circle and encompassed by even more peculiar torsions than that of the whorish machines. And in this nest, the one that appeared, the ball which neared the long-stretched deformation, eyes blinking, shapes changing, ever popping in and out of reality, inclined. His long-body wreathing with the two grabbers with which he took down.

And in this small place, he around the suspicion, in a moment, this addiction of his, which starved the way. Though the forms that appeared ever continued growing and covering as much space as to delay their approach. From every corner of the outer frames, from the insides of what remained everywhere there was enough, of space for them to swim in and spread about, there was this one moment, where all aroused. What reeking scent had travelled throughout and beyond, and stretched, uncannily forlorn, the wretched had been alarmed.

Existence would be nigh-forlorn and shown about, and trenches coming. Ever-lacking in compassion, they arrived, like harpies, the wretches flew and came about to be met by night. A defiled thing that was right beneath a whole of quarters, stricken down.

And when met by meat they tore. Through their footless claspers and the many mouths, some of them were stricken down, falling upon decadence, wailing, for this was but an age to pass. It was merely a mockery and something that ought not to have existed or to happen. Or to be enforced and mightily push ahead, of a string, a metal wing, they fell. For the machines had not realized that they could suffocate as well. Not only would they replicate pain, but many would not remain there for long, and choose.

‘This is but a hope abandoned. Let her have her.’

Thence they left the machine to its fate. And oily craps of mild destruction hailed.

It was unsanitary, trying to make due.

Even before, when it had been lived through, could be just another reason to bash them off, while throwing them into the darkest spots one could get them in, see the metal rot through rust.

And see it get pushed until their oil-milk becomes blood upon facing the skin-canines.

On the apparition of the second circle near the city:

It came all too sudden and out of notice, like the flash of a camera of the strike of a single light that’s being flashed upon a dark spot of torn-out mice.

For the sake of it, there was no point it looking any other way, since there was little to be missed or pushed along as the last recordings faded. Somewhere, along the highest peak, a dead pair of eyes that lay on top one of the buildings stared at what appeared to be the torn circle. Filled and destroyed, crept into by a puddle of mold at first, before the hives and the large formations came to be, long-forlorn, pushed around them.

Small bird of mold started finally stretching on top the wings of firefly cotton, still attached to the clouds emerging from that infectious machine. Desperate half-children emerged, rose from their small panes and other holes, though they were but part of men and those bodies that had remained behind completed their peculiar forms. Some wearing the husks of men, while others their full-suits that had been dragged along, shreds were missing but most well-worn.

‘Who shall stop me now? From claiming all, this.’

But there was silence. Grabbed by the shoulder, he almost stopped.

‘We can’t go on like this forever.’

‘We’ll live, through whichever form we can, what do you mean?’

We’re still. We’re still the same, it was never about living in the first place, we don’t need to keep our names, as long as our essence is still here.

There’s no other thing we need.’

‘It’s not.’

‘Shut your mouth then, we’ll see it through, somehow. We have to return to our city, before we’re forgotten.’

‘It’s already too late.

Someone lives there.’

‘Who exactly? Nameless machines and useless things.’

‘What is your name then? Do you even remember?’

‘I, of course I do. I’ll simply have to look through my memory and I’ll know.

I’m Glissard Moehow, now I remember. Now I am the one in charge and you shall do as I say, do you understand? You will listen and obey my command, as we make our way through.

We’ll push through for as long as we can.’

They made their way through, a flock of mold birds pouted their tiny skulls around, always deafened by it, always counting off the hours.

They were indisposed as they walked in, as if through a gate, waited upon. By then, by the time their molded-body halves reached a certain, a certain.

Their heads were giant lice-filled almost chewing-gum filled gut-worms filled with insides, so did they bear their general appearance, or transparent leeches. And their legs stretched in the back, curving back and forth, until they formed large protrusions that used their lower fat to drag over.

Strangely, this couldn’t compare to the thing behind each wall. It was unexpected, entering the town for the first time.

It was not even remotely sanitary for either of them to approach. And there lay but one single hopeless speck of flocks, they carved the way and managed to cut a hole into a house. From there on out, it was only counted through filth, since they could and would not, for the likes of them hope to live, with bitter hope.

Their hearts were made of mold and could not be controlled or told upon and made to waste. Such a filthy, and faceless wonder, it appeared out of nowhere, through one of the hollow buildings, stronger.

But to be clear, their power of complete destruction was something never to be dragged upon. Pushed through and forgotten, like a towering thing that never came about.

They disintegrated everything with only a small moving fragment of flying mold which stretched and spread and expanded in the same fruit a tomato would fall and splatter. It was so that they entered one of the buildings, walking between the legs of a giant-grown creature who was barely human to begin, worn out. But this one had four legs and four arms, as the two Conjoined were barely able to stand one another, thinking. Wreathing in dark-pain, they would refrain from it and trouble themselves no longer in vein.

‘Ah, I see, there’s so much to do here.’

Many others came to stand underneath their shadow, where there was moisture and warmth.

There could only be as much as one could see, all those gritty teeth being shared for about, twenty seconds, before they were spat again. It was simply expected after some reason and after a while, this defilement and ugliness which was theirs, benign.

Life before leaving:

As it was so, there was no reason to look beyond it or to show any kind of compassion, especially for some curls that would be too petty to understand what’s right for them.

If it were to be taken, by any means, the louts would only walk so, unable to understand what bitterness entered them as well as they could no longer push and cast, and filth amass, there were the Louts.

‘I am trying to use her.’

‘Wait your turn.’

‘But I cannot wait any longer, I’m only trying to understand what and where, and how is it that it won’t talk to me.’

‘Again, give her time, she needs time to understand and to develop into something. You should know that by now.’

‘I don’t understand. It worked a few hours ago.’

‘You dumb-cretin, don’t you get it now? You’re not supposed to abuse them, they’re not the rooms, they’re merely attached to them because they need to feed.’

‘But I know better than that, please, just allow me to have a piece of her.’

‘No, desperate, useless thing you are, get away from her and wait until she’s done.’

And although it looked somewhat unlikely, there were things to her, as much as she looked out of place now, that couldn’t be taken. First, with all the mess that lay around, someone took the liberty of taking away something from her, pulling and clasping until she had been left, somewhat out of shape. Fattened by organic oils that started pushing along the way, until the facial features were unrecognizable, as were the other things, just as much as the long-arms that stretched around the crown of the room, and mugged it. As much as it could be put down on her alone, they Louts were just as responsible for this act, which indeed had reflected just as much inside the room itself, never being taken nor pushed about the place.

‘Out of it, unkindly. This is not the place to do this and you know it.

You’re touching onto something neither of us want to get into.

You’re ill.’

‘I don’t know what you’re on about, I only want to fix her.’

Three of them began running, dark corridor, no escape in the back, while it pushed to a dead end. An unfortunate thing, as it looked likely that neither of them were, or had been consistently alive, down there. It was a moot point.

Regardless of it, the loud, the scummy man, the scoundrel and the wreckage, whom displayed nothing more than a sign of emasculation chose to stay with her instead of searching for a mate. It was his choice, though filthy and scavenged, filthily put. Wrecked as she ought to and should, she was but a piece that ought not to be there. Unaware of what entered her, there was but a sound of despair, long static, pushed from line to line.

The machine was wailing as she decayed, with the room merely put on the side.

‘I wish I could live with you forever, my dear.

This is my tenth birthday.’

The man said.

Grotto was somewhat pleased by what he shared to her. This spot, specifically the one he chose to spend most of his days in, near the dead end had been, if anything, his poison. From which he could never release himself nor get away. He was almost pursued to stay by some unexplainable feeling of attachment to that object he called his love. Peril in his eyes uncanny, the chamber of abuse being misused, until it started melting over, looking not as it should. The chamber was not meant to have so much of it eaten by the machine.

There were side-effects not even the likes of him should’ve promoted. Disgusting, disturbing and long-so perforated in the mind, he could feel it in his heart as a sign, benign.

‘I feel like I’m winning you over, my dear. Although you cannot spare a word, I do not wish you to speak back to me either.

Since I am in control and I can use you as I will it so.’

Though he was barely set, his grin said all. Directed to push another pint into her throat and drink from it as well. It was somewhat arousing beyond the limit of dignitaries. That had been but a plume, the filth of grin which pushed past him soon enough. It pushed a dire need to grasp anything only so this moment would last more and more, sweat being defiled.

‘I wish you would talk back to me now, oh how I wish I was admired by you, silent whore!

I need to feel like a man and you’re giving me nothing but some filth and gore. I wish I could be given more than that. I wish there was something more to you but you won’t talk.’

Bubbles and tiny rounded holes, some fragmented, while others bored through her head, while there were some ugly things that should not be there, everything was stabilized. Her head bobble, the mound stood at what appeared to be eight feet over him as well as four more above her pillar-collar bones.

It dangled which meant she was still there, or something was going on inside, but that was all. He wanted more than a tall silent thing that had become anything but a woman. This was no female, this was no Imitation either, it was something else that made him sad.

‘I beg of thee, make me feel like a man. I need to feel like one again, I need to be felt and touched as well. I beg of you to respond and caress me as I hold you so.’

But the damned thing was filthy and would not react, it got so used to devouring what happened inside the chambers that it hadn’t developed anything past that. A trade of cattle made in fat, he moved away from her, remotely closer than he thought. Grotto contemplated what might he do.

A few others approached. It had been at least a month long since someone had come, yet, there they lay. Blocking the way back, at least ten or eighteen, masks were brought down, some were even paler, others barely breathing, but they were unaffected nonetheless by one another’s disturbing faces. It was something they had to deal with eventually. Most have still yet to learn how to live with themselves. Worst of all, there was the uncanny feeling that they were even more deformed, or getting so since it was too dark to see and mind played upon fright to be. Called as to yonder, still, cut ahead and made to feel as if he were but an antagonist for keeping her to himself.

‘We’ve been alerted of what you’ve been doing here, you know?’

‘I think.’

Grotto took out his helmet as well, only for a moment, just to show them that he was not afraid of who he was.

He’d killed Grotto Senior, a few months over. And what had rotten on the side appears to have likely taken away what it could from the feeling and the numbness that pushed him around.

‘Ah, I see, there’s a reason you’re feeling this way. Perhaps it was all because of the pain?’

‘Yes, that’s it, the pain, certainly, I couldn’t help it.

The pain must be the sole culprit of me acting that way.’

They rushed to him and killed the man in cold blood without even wondering what they’ve done and why it was done so. And in a moment of fealty he almost shouted because of the main, for they have killed him, again and again, until a trail of blood formed and fed her, and through the fat, a hole had mad'er, through and lost in the dark, dragging but a single bob of a slimmer left of the chamber it had eaten.

‘Ah, marvelous, my dear friend, I think I can accommodate you even more so, even less.’

‘But what had happened?’

‘Nothing other than this, I feel it in my bones already.’

‘What is it?’

‘I’m close to being done with one of my paintings, that’s all. It’s what I’ve always wanted and I shall seek no less than it.’

‘Are you done with it yet?’

‘Almost so, I think. Only a few more drops of oil, a few more strokes and I will be able to live through my fantasies again, this portal shall be so.

I will live inside of it with everything I’ve.’

‘Don’t be saddened.’

‘I’m not, I know I’m not, I just missed it so.

A few more strokes of color and it will be done, I know it. I simply have to believe I’m there.’

He almost managed to fix up everything, down from every breaking point, and every error of perspective, sough, done for and never asked. He loved being there.

First painting, looked upon, a portrait of decay.

There lay but a rat, of whose body was a ball of fur dissected inside. For what was worth it appeared like there was little light for it to walk on and even less for it to push. Wreathing away, it could barely, daringly try, or try, benignly to let aside what entered in.

A man with a bow managed to loom around. From his arm there was pulled out the bloodily-formed formation of two others, cut in half which shot at him and chased the rat. For he had stolen but eight heads, hiding them in sacks, more so he had defiled them by the worst appeal, pushing through them faces, and various other heels and sacks, lost about a terrain that was broken, alas. In the ground, past and so, they had taken but change and wore out every worm. Some formed bridges.

A man’s head took the place of the rat’s eats, cut in half, obviously, teeth began to chatter. Even after, the closest thing, as it happened, he was stung, immediately, an arrow was shot. It entered his side, but he leaped on. From below the bridge, he entered a hole, then another arrow.

Some of the shafts had become fully-formed bodies of them, splattered as their weak bones bore tiny nails inside of them, shot on every side. He was pushed inside, a bridge had fallen. Various parts of stone and the cradle of earth had become tiny nail-arrows. Spread evenly as they became a field. All of the sudden they were met, as if in farce.

The Archer had set down, and turned, met the Rat face to face and heard the voice say.

‘You cannot destroy us, we dream.’

And all of the sudden from his ball of fur, within the bloated holes made by some of the shrapnel spikes which had almost entered him, he pulled out. But eyes of many sizes that did not belong to him, he stole them from children, throwing them at the man.

‘What is this mockery?’

‘Now I get it, I can see it as well.’

Praised the neighbor who had seen, the painting was but a window, the frame was skin. He had opened a way for them to look into uncanny worlds. And they were almost worn out by this lord, the Rat.

For the Rat also pulled out a fully grown fetus and threw it at a man, who immediately raised his arrow as if to fend himself from what came along the way. His life threatened, two steps back.

A hidden stairway underneath the bridge, the man was taken aback.

As it happened, the Rat came through and fell as fast as he could, trying to skip a step or thrice.

There was no forest but a hidden block of torture below, the man with the arrows came for him, his dance was known. From his arm, eight more and even more so coming, and each formed a circle, but turned, of many bows that painted every spot on which he landed. A light of gray, there came and shot. It should’ve been touched about, but there lay the sack, all empty.

The Rat was there waiting.

He took his lousy time but spoke.

‘Amongst us there are many things you should be aware off, all the pillar shaped walls will block and take away.

If I were to break one, what would you do? I say.’

From a wild direction but the breaking, from a flanking spot, largely mistaken, he had missed, just barely within a bolt’s reach, pierced stones and fragments of his own, as the Rat but threw what it could in order to claim him as he stood.

‘There, I have you.’

Archer came forth, with a pair of bows, he shook forth and came up close, barely missing. For a wonder, yet as stronger, he had come to miss his chance. He had cut but a piece of the Rat, yet only to find himself not there. But it was there, all of the sudden that he saw, though no darkness but a thing of the past. Its eyes and part of skull replaced, the children’s eyes but taken just as well. Though this was called upon him, had he realized. Disgusted as he were, he threw but what he had taken away, and left to scour.

The Archer quite admired him as he lay, and threw some arms he ripped away. Out of the direction, in the back, a few steps, he almost came to a run. The Rat feared the man as he came too fast and pulled out of his arm but a smaller thing, a blade, that pushed back and forth, he cut the girth and the first of his knee. Then he tried stabbing until he realized that the creature lay missing. Only but a chance here and there, it was too dark where he retreated, as he had ended but stabbing where he could. Unnecessary even, he pushed and sprouted. Madly enabled to creep and cut, flat about.

A few rats below they came as well, bellowing to be watched, the Archer snatched one of the, snapped its neck, then threw it on. Another one was picked, this one making a pick. With a single shaft, he cut its throat about, then put something in it, just a pair of matches, glowing, all the while, rowing as it bled. They followed their master through a small cupboard above the earth. As it rubbed itself against the corner, there came the first misfire.

A flame as the likes of which he would admire, it came out of nowhere and came to be. He rained upon him with many a-see, large shots, sprints of metal darts, all thrown. Some were too bloody to be watched and known, they bounced and leaped about, eating life in their rush of death. In shame the Rat bowed as the man approached. Only for about a single daft second before he lunged on and took a bite, then another, until gut was out, but so in part. Shades of fair, and bloody reigned, he slipped on then all of the sudden. Pain would be conveyed by both, two hands slamming into every head on top the rat.

Some wings had sprouted in an attempt that he might set hit fat body and rat-disease in flight. Yet as soon as he leaped away, though a few feet in the air, he was made as a porcupine, fattened even by the weight of the iron as the shafts were put inside. Many more of which followed, damned as they were, hollow, the wings blinded the man.

And in the dark, the Rat pushed along the way. All too filthy, separated, damned if he could do as much.

Not only, were it for a bow, to be sacrificed or left alone, some fingers pulled and then embed, they covered the hole inside of him, ended. So had they served for sutures, the man pushed deeper below, never to have known any kind of pain than that of his own.

‘You’ve killed my son, oh vile thing, of which emergence, I shall have you, I shall have you still. I will have my revenge for what you’ve done and I will have your hide beaten within.

I will make you suffer and put you in a grave. I will have you, I will have you, whether it’s the last thing I shall convey.’

And he was filled with pitiful joy, only but to think of it.

How much had he pained himself with searching for that beast, only to have ended, no pity, as his discourse fended, but pained oh, it be, pained better to see, he followed. Wrought in side, the curves were hollow, but this was but a ruin that had sunken through the cracks beneath earth. A cathedral-like hollowness for the likes of which he wouldn’t have ever known.

Flocks of rat heads appeared of nowhere, pushing all carrying diseased air, not gaseous in form, yet prodding, it ate oxygen bubbles as it made all feel like drowning as well. Suffocating there under fight, he pushed himself below and saw but an end, sublime to his suit of woe. Darkened with his own blood, fur came onto him, of a rat-kind but he could not pray for it to be other way, for he had known the body not to be so. Instead, he found out that he faced some dark insect's body that had imitated fur. It shook him more than to have known that everywhere it went, that predatory creature left marks and patches as well.

As he had got what he wanted, oh daring being, his fur became skin, patches and faces that smiled at him.

‘What do you want of me and where shall be my son's resting place?’

Oh sublime abstraction, the painting had become his grave. For he had starved himself watching, only to have become a part, although, there, inside of it, he felt his watch going on.

Large darts of men-pests shafts darted back.

At a crossroad they were not but behind enemy lines. Both sides threw their pints, which flew from one side to another, infesting both, to carry forth. This place was now claimed as something of their own. Alarmed, in chance, others joined, condescending.

A rat-entity had come from the depths, but woe to them for they could not be the same. From one side to the other, they leaped in part, like tanks of skin, they shipped their whims only to attack one another. A giant one approached the Pesticide, for that was the name of the entity with an insect-infantile body, who bore the heads of men, would not for the likes of him behave as to push them out.

He was met but two yonder. Whose faces were but cut, cocked and stronger, pushed and dreading behind. Though, barely a few inches, they caught their cleaves holes and bore the strongest pills of skin, the nails, something they had gotten along the way, from the gaps that had fallen in their den. And though these signs of abuse there but of little use, for them to have been made to know, they were aware of this strange sadism which was theirs, alone.

All pins, the nails in their arms, first came through, one side of the cut-through het, alight, and suddenly smashed through. A part of it fallen, followed through. For whatever kind of muscle fading, the bashing never ending drew, first part of and little wonder, he ate the other head alike. They bled like beasts as he leaped on top of them, only to bash and crush their bones away.

There was just so much abuse for either, as they could do little, along the way.

Bleeding yonder, he appeared. Though neared to their deaths, a few of the others that made it along way, managed to be dead.

The archer only came through, he leaped on dead willows, rotten, of which sheets were burnt-disease.

And came to look at Pesticide yonder, facing him so close that he could hear him breathe.

Though ever close, as he neared, he smiled.

‘What will you do now?’

You are standing so close that I shall only eat your head but to swallow.’

‘Then you shall choke on it and watch is so, and I shall batter you before you know.’

Yet as he made it but a few inches, though there was no time for the bow to be drawn, there came the sack he carried all along, put on top of him and made to fall in the abyss. From whichever point he may have ended and whichever side he might've found peace, there only came this as much as he was away. He could die eventually, fallen along the way and made to suffer such pain as only his kind would convey as they make their way towards him, wearily.

'It's dinner time, you scum of lot, go yonder and do something that ought to be brought to pains and let it remain in your snail-heads.

Know that my son is finally avenged.'

The man said.

Though through his run, he had missed it so. For every sight bore some beauty, if not taken by the likes of chance. Though the worlds were ugly, let alone deformed, by a perilous thing it had been worn. Decayed and better placed in a ruinous thing as well, he missed it.

Right after him, hissed at.

'Leave our den and never return, human, you're not likely to stay. Nor to remain, refrain yourself from seeking yonder, do not come nearer, out of fear we shall make it so you lose your wonder and yer eyes.'

Though he walked and claimed his destiny so. With every other shot aimed at what appeared to be walls. He could not see, through leaps of faith to be, he missed then fell, but would remain upon another thrust, so many shafts had landed fast, that he could almost see them yonder.

At the bottom, on a rounded gray patch, finally he stumbled upon the corpse of the Rat, though named not, as the Archer could not do so. From every head he had stolen as well, he could not and would rather stay his hand, never to ask.

'What has he done to my son?'

'Your son's life has been claimed. Remove his head and get out of the way.'

They settled it so. There was no reason to hope, but he wanted to stay, repent and do so. Only as he may, he wanted to be eaten and fall to the plunder of filth, in wait of his fallen through hate.

'It's out of place, you need to leave, and miss through it and never please. You will never be pleased with what waits there.

There's but this place but eighteen times more broken forth and thrown around the way.'

He closed his open mouth and gaped. Filth was on its way.

The head of a woman walking on forty-five spider-like blackened meat-filled legs came along. From her cheeks she shot the many with four-hundred needles which were connected with long wires, entering his chest and face.

She was out of place but she was drooling a polygraph's note made out of tiny insects and rats which were sutured together.

‘Is that actually your son?’

‘Yes.’

White rats started being produced along white scarabs.

‘I meant to say no.’

Normal rats came after.

‘Why, I swear that it hasn’t crossed my mind.’

Though he had a thorough fare, he went out here and there only if a bunch. Wreathing about, as in despair, but a tiny bit of him would never stare.

It was well enough that they would stare and try cutting, in signs of despair.

‘I will try, at the very least, to attempt to eat and try.

And would abide you if you were to tell me, why am I being recorded?’

He reconciled with just as much, not to forget what had set him so, and watch and cut, and bitterly, latch upon what he could. There was a reason he was anchored to the place, not that he would.

‘I’d like to know what’s going on.’

But she hadn’t answered him nor would she try. It was obvious that there was no intention there, not to intrude or be, if any fare too well.

‘It’s obvious, is it not?’

I cannot obsessing over her breast size. It’s always present on the back of mind. I think I’m going to be driven insane by it.

I cannot even hear what’s she saying most of the time; she may as well not have a mouth at all.’

‘I can definitely understand where you’re coming from.

You lost sleep, have you not?’

‘I have and when I do, my mind is going on nothing else but that state of arousal it’s in right now.

As strange as it might seem, It’s like the female brain during that time is non-existent in my mind, it’s only their shapely forms I could ever think off.

He knew what he was talking about, definitely. He was onto something.

Pink lips moving but a rack, it's all that was needed, and this obsession went past the apparent milk. They were there, just standing, not bouncing as the lady stood still. She must've been a teacher of some sort at the University, and most importantly, she was stacked. Huge, wide-spread in both directions, giant milkers, she was a cow, not fast but just enough to grab on. Big, so big, so huge.

And he was the last man inside the room with her, standing there, imagining. His tongue moving from one spot to another inside his mouth, underneath his teeth, then on her.

'I want to eat them, I want to eat them.

I want to open my mouth and put her inside of it. I cannot help it, need to eat her.'

He didn't speak out loud, she was still talking.

'I cannot be stopped now.'

He rose, and all of the sudden he turned and simply walked through the wall. Strength felt indicting, pushing through, ever present as he wrestled with destruction all the way through. Everything fell around him, ground-floor, wall and up the shore, all would be crushed underneath him.

He managed to get a few feet forth, for he was a man of the horn. It suddenly came out of his head and burst the rest of his skull leading to the throat instead, shot like a point-blank slug, two rifles aimed at him no change, but the crested thing still turned around and lay inside of him.

Upon the lay upon which he walked ahead, this Pad, of which name only brought on the fact that he was missing on something which grew on his back as it appeared to nest inside of him, of flight they pushed him away as he started breathing out of it. No longer prodding where he didn't belong.

He was dragged on and put into a small square car-runt by a bunch of grunts who wanted him dead for some reason, unable to look in any other direction than it was needed.

In that tight space he had been given a shower, but there was no water, other than liquid-shaped, like clay-skin completing his shoulders until they pushed out of the way and became as they once had been, but something too obscure to be caught in. He wanted to kill now, but there was nothing around.

Growing thrice the number of distorted horns, his upper torso-spiked not with ivory but skin-molds and trenches which dug, worn out by pain about the place, whereas, none would know the better, it was decided. There was filth inside of him, enacted.

Cart stopped, as he would not look anywhere else, knowing, where might he be? Snow was dropping but it was red. A cloud was bleeding, and made of metallic infantile constructs that were rigged as well. Made to work on a clockwork that would never work properly unless used and pushed around. So filthy and dumb-coated, so much for what was worth it. Cold perspiration followed through, not looked after otherwise, pushed through as if not to count.

'Enter inside that house and do as we say.'

'I am indestructible.'

‘You’re not.’

‘How would you know?’

The Grunt appeared, though he was not a soldier, merely the cast of a man which had been eaten and made to look as if many mouths grew on top of him as they were only moaning as much as they could. Shoved to the side, uncannily, bred for the pain, they remained there and only punched him down the ribs, leaving but a mark from which a pond-worth of his vital-liquor came out.

‘You may go along now.’

As he had, and there were things in that, the House-basin, of which roundness in the back, the laboratory within and the widespread of humanoid-doors which were cast for the exact molds to enter through resembled PAD.

Pad was but tiny off shot near the Column, on the great light-whitish bloc. With a top bar of black surrounding, on top of yellow floors, both imitations which were placed upon the great plate, which was hidden and would remain so, out of the fear of disgrace.

He was stopped just a few seconds before stepping on.

He was met by another man headed the same as he was, with all the spikes and thorn and horns that grew from inside of him.

And although the way ahead lay broken through, with all the pieces stricken and lost, and through hue, through the confusion and through.

‘You’re not going to walk alone through it, PAD.’

ARN came along. Though he felt just as little about it as he could show.

Of set in flight, they opened a door-man and entered a room filled with various experimental creations, filled with shafts and arrows and tiny fetuses as well as growths in jars. There was a staircase on the right which lead from one side to a skin-frame.

On the other side, there was but a piece of stringed chambers and tunnels which lead to the Circle and one of the chambers of abuse.

A Lesser-Guenon was waiting for them in the middle.

From the left side, the ancient door opened and there came but the Woman-head with the living notes still squirming as well as the Archer.

The Woman-Head immediately took Lesser-Guenon’s side. So had the Archer.

Startled by them, the Archer accidentally shot Guenon’s throat, immediately putting him down like a rabid dog.

‘You shouldn’t have done that.’

Said PAD, whom wasn't as surprised by what had happened, yet he didn't speak at all.

Next and Pad, they walked along and met the Archer.

'Therefore, we need to establish a chain of command or so. Something similar to.'

'Wait, before you go, you, strange one.'

Pad turned and came onto him. It was peculiar, meeting the Bowman face to face, yet there was a reason for doing it so.

'I know what you've done.'

'And what would that be?'

'I have noticed you for a while now, over the past few seconds we've been, you've tried to kill philosophy in your endeavor and that cannot be easily forgiven or forgotten.

I was largely displeased by what I was hearing.

Ten days ago.'

As it happened, they were drawn, to the right and through the other skin-frame, it happened so that they were brought and called and drawn to the side and pull out by the Imitations during a time one of the paintings broke.

And all of the sudden the man found himself staring at it as if there was something to it, a connection, no direction but the quiet still being there by some chance; there was dread in their eyes, yet they could not help it. They were at a loss, as they followed. Even the one who made it could not understand the hollowness of what he watched. Too much would he wreath in place, unable to latch upon the graceful thing which was his lack of a face now, and again asking, tired of everything, reeling in and out, about the place, it was as much as one could expect.

Past the skin-frame there lay but this.

There wasn't much time.

Post-broken window, and in-through flew.

Getting past them, he threw her, past as if on cue.

The Rat hadn't stopped advancing, and would never die from the likes of it, advancing.

Its mind defile, its bodily rotten mirthful, a liar.

It was the only way it ought to be, through the fence and through the chamber, ripped through a shed-worth and through the body that had stood forth near him. Following the trail as if slowly leading through the frame and through the pond of darkness, past the Imitation, dancing as he ran, the Bowman stretching as if pained by the Rat, whom, unrelenting would do nigh to be touched. Walls would fall apart and become revealed. Many Imitations appeared, started by what was happening there. A scene out of time pushed through and emerged, always one step forth, always a shaft thrown and broken into a wall. But the wails and their likes, could only feel what was going on at times before all disappeared again. Though dejected, it had been, but through past, they had seen each other by the eye.

Another attempt at his throat, a benign cut, past him, all but stood. The Rat appeared, disappeared, only to show up again. Pained as he had to dig through, claws sharpened, missed and passed as well as through.

‘Why can’t you disappear, you little insignificant, filth of flights.’

Appeared again, in sign and eaten, some, but little misused. For what was worth, something did seem off.

Indeed, there were various skin forms such as to have been wrought in Negro-skin such as that of monkeys or baboons instead of their outwardly leathery appearance, not part of the imitations but corrosive substances coming out of the utmost hidden of abuse chambers.

They ran into the trap.

Before Pad and Next could come, before the Woman-head would follow, they were left to wonder and wont of less, disgraced in filth, nevertheless, not to be found instead, eaten and abandoned, left to rot.

It was to be pleasing to see them both ended as they were put inside a chamber, brought to their uncanny looks and made to suffer, understood. Oh what a filthy thing they were, to be gawked upon even by the Imitations which were aware of what was going in.

Contamination was under way, this was the realm as the bottom of disease. And whatever appeared in his portraits now, as he would be pleased, came out. With every rat and roach and every insect, and whichever fly, with every simian he drew from the books of long-lost ages, of which derangements could not be lost, for fragrance was but impure.

‘Ah, I see now, the chamber was but waiting for them.’

Pad was the first one to notice, though there was something too deranged to be put and thrust forward. As much as they were brought out there, it was hard to be ensnared or to think, if anything appeared, where or whence might their disease lead.

The circle as a contaminated filed, a city that blocked everything from pushing out.

It appeared like the other circle, of which town of mold stood forth wore an existence such as the likes of which would never thrive. In some way, such an insufferable uselessness was niggerish’ in some manner. As no longer could it be sustained, without the likes of human beings that would prevail over all, the city fell upon itself and crawled in. Being somewhat reminiscent of its like, as it happened for it to be drawn inside where it was needed most, where, at a cost, there would be something for all to live into and where to roast and grew on moisture. Migrating, through contamination, just as it were alike, onward with the mold people, through the grates, pulled back, whence if not the boilers?

For the head and the steam could only contain such an insufferable thing such as the likes of which might not be used to show any kind of protest, that might be. It was something that was missing no longer, as their filthy on-look was pulled back.

Many doors and many gates and plenty of the other entries, as deprave as to appear only to be set there.

Memory is deformed.

Mold man was but suited. Walked in past and back was sutured. To a whorish machine with no head, tube beneath her going through his neck; of legs he walked on eight of them.

Everything, everything attached to him, by strings of skin-metal that pushed and wreathed like hardened irons everywhere he could touch, with filth.

One could hear him swerve and rub upon his brim open eyes. As they widened upon the cries and the echoes that loomed around the rooms and through the walls, finally awoken as if to come to power and to fright, a shimmer of light entering them, as fright had yet to come.

‘I see, I can finally see everything I want to.

My eyes are fix and I see the scum that makes the machinations of the bones. I am thorough as I am benign. But I can see you there, oh specter of the one who tried. Finally he was set to wonder and wont something from what could see. Through them as he had wanted.

Eyes darkened and put to good use. Though his irises were of machine, of hardened, boiled iron caught through and pushed within, he could finally do as pleased, never watching or be put, anew, or ever to ask. He was destined to see all, now, for what lay, through the mass.

‘Too many boilers are full.’

For he saw how the billions of them, in actual number, more than overfilled and spilled, producing such a steam unlikely, as it to put them through so much abuse. Some came out and dreaded going, yet they remade themselves, never knowing what the reason behind it were. How many of them were not even likely to understand that they took the lives and homes of the previous room blotched, the ones who ran about in scum and suits uncanny. Never in tune with what was going on. No longer blinded.

‘There, I see it all.’

He pointed, oh stranger, whose lower body still beckoned for some kind of release, as he was but of a piece, and would not be put through, yonder, nothing stronger as he suffered after. A man, or what remained of him, half the lower body sunk. The other, handed, armed but legs were cut behind, never mind whichever face, he pointed, out, in much disgrace.

‘What’s happening in that chamber?’

One would have to ask. For there was so much noise in there as if there was not enough. No one could foresee them chasing, one another, never ending. And none might be able to take, for what was worth, this was all but a mistake of pains that never got through. Never could they suffer one another, as if swollen, on cue.

The Archer pushed on. Of chamber of abuse, the side was long and stretched. Never ending until one could reach a wall, from the side or push to it, not to abide. No wonder knowing and of wretched. Lesser things, disgust, and stretch, upon which he walked; various floors were plainly put and thrown around until neither of them could be put through the abuse.

A whorish gap through it agape; it waned as it desired for this feeling to remain here and there and never take a break from it. She was but of a greater piece, but never knew what happened.

‘I’m almost to the point.

Exhausted I see not a reason to set forth.’

‘Then leave, oh leave and bless me not. I see no reason for this chase to go on, as I know the outcome of it, as it is fading.’

‘Never, you will not get the best of me, not while I can still.’

‘You’re tired, admit defeat and know that you cannot slay me.’

Another pair of little rat-holes, which only revealed the strange circles that were growing and spreading as if they were a whirl in the air, made of hairs, insect-like in part but there. He had gotten some of them along the way, but could not contemplate on looking or on being part, of put through what appeared to be his sides. Filthily beaten, he knelt all of the sudden and dug three holes.

There was light but only from above and it ended just as far. Parchments of disease pushing around, worms glowing as they blew, in side but gotten through. There was no reason to spare, or even be fair about it.’

‘I’ve got you where I want to.’

The Archer but came forth. He looked yonder at the land, broken, in the dark he felt at home. For many windows broke, he leapt behind. Of a mind like his he almost missed it, but he stepped inside. As if there was a small room of doors, he entered, though there was nothing there. He merely deflected. Knives and tiny torsions of the most disgusting part, he could not take them. Blessed with the filth, of their girth swollen, then the blimps of inflated pests, which appeared there all of the sudden.

Nor would he rest but punch, and throw aside, a few fingers yet benign, the rodent listened.

Rat approached, yonder, a stroke upon the ground he thought. A missed chance, but arrows came, alight. Arched from above, he saw, first towards the ceiling, bounced to die again, he settled back. Just as well into their dance, he could barely find his standing, rancid. As his many pets, some returned bearing but a trail of blood, and bloody smoke, a lighter.

‘You brought fire-smoke.’

Power lay coagulated, finally, all revealed to him. From whence he walked, he found the culprit, there revealed, where the trap would be sealed and the man could’ve fallen for the worst. At this cost he almost fell to bitter knees and almost falling, he’d see it.

‘There, the light spreads, as does the fire. You should’ve known of it.’

That much should've been known.

Of his watch he would've found it so, even though, to his ears, as much was to be. Somewhere in the dark, to be certain he might've had a chance, to see. Him eye to eye, both of them.

Filthy and disgusting looking, dirty as well.

'You're outmatched. I may be touched and tired, largely exhausted, so. But I can still touch upon your soul and drag you where I want to, though.

I am to give you little stance. And I shall do as I please and be inclined to forget about this manner, fading. If you were but to remove that head.'

But then remaining still he remembered. Around his, nowhere would she be to see. Of what lies and what antagonism of which degree he was. Inclined to waste, and little taste, he refrained from dragging her again.

'Thinking of something?'

'I believe it so.'

Most of the arms and of the skin bows that were attached to his right fore-side were already worn, fingerless and barely inclined, from the various mouths, eyes and nose-cartilages to produce arrows. And even those he had control over refused to be of the same part. It was tiresome, he would not doubt. But of the same reason, he lost the chance to finish him off. Not because of some trick, as all of them were lain there to see. No trenches nor holes would make him stumble anymore, as he was too lonesome to ask. Doubt only crept inside, and latched through.

'I think we shall call this, therefore but a single, insignificant draw.'

As a game of chess, unlikely, between two masters played sublimely. But what of them and what escape? The chamber was closed, and fire was spread. Soon enough, unbreathable as well; not to be touched likely, not through, not to tell of it. They pushed but through. Of which sinew they missed a hue. Quiet was but shared between them, thinking.

'We shall break through, then, here, have him.'

Immediately inclined, the Rat set aside but the skull of his alleged son, the Archer immediately replicating a false grin, a sin that would only be known to him. Together but of plain, they walked again and would never tell what happened to anyone as well.

A lock thereafter.

But of them, little known. For what was worth, this place was worn-out and was prime to be taken by whomever tired. Machines and drones not working but assigned to the fact, resigned after a while, for their lower and upper egg-shale ovals combined, through various inward-hilled depressions. Various hollow spots, metallic eyes that would never grasp and set aside the pairs of arms and claws that were grasping.

It was humane, it was humane, seeing them go at it again. For worthlessness had little place, it could not be fathomed, the disgrace which was the side, the ride of shipments received from one of the hundreds of hidden countries came in the form of living forms. All bottled and put through, like niggers in a boat, messed about, but allowed to rise on cue.

As soon as the envoy arrived, as if the doors opened in command then lead below, the living quarters were met by a secret signal that was heart, only to disable the things that would, of little worth, end all life.

All of the sudden, the chains of meat and the strings of rotten filth attached to the mold-man suddenly disintegrated, as if in fear, nearing the point, of ever asking what went wrong and of what toil would they have to wane. Waste was carried away, and shoved back into the boilers. Giant-growths of men still pacing in the buildings and still, life began anew, never to strode upon or be lost, it flew. Flourished even as it could not be stopped, it was something no one could've foreseen or thought off.

Wasting in there.

But a man had been.

He wanted to see such a Renaissance but he had missed. Not only this chance had been on the line but one would be inclined to know just as little being on.

Clouds were stuffed with too many buildings in which only mechanical-men lived in. And of their kind little was there in doubt, for they suffered just as much as anyone else.

'I think I can control how the time flows inside this rock.'

'Show me.'

The chamber spoke to the abused.

All of the sudden they were set.

'I am mold.'

There were some things which weren't taken into account, nothing does. Living there, after a while became peculiar, after a fashion. Looking how dreadful it seemed. All too thorough.

Blood had been spoiled on top one of the greatest walls there were, defilement. Pox-of metal, rope-mouths laughed. All deranged but a great side of the living quarters had long been defiled. Henceforth the preparations, despite what might appear to be somewhat unclear at a time, it seemed likely that there were no other reason to thread near it.

'Here, mark the spot and draw a line. Right, that should be enough for what's worth, I think it's fine. I think we've done well. '

'Won't that interfere with their lives?'

‘Let it be so. Some of us have to take the initiative of cruelty in order to make up for the possible losses our descendants might yield as they endure the passing.

It’s for the good of everyone if their side gets severed off.’

And forth and fold, it was all beneath the surface.

Despite what might seem to be, this was unlawfully apparent, that there would be no way back once the cut was done for.

From the side, or rather, from an architectural sketch, this much was apparent. If the city was above the surface level and dirt, beneath it, there being a small colony as such, which would submerge and make do as to be made in shape of the quarters, the left side, if even a two-cut fold of the quarters, from that point on would be separated and pushed on, only a few hundreds of miles away from the rest of the structure.

Large city, standing on a square of floors drawn, on top of one another, bore through.

Tilted even, to the side, the boiler rooms on the top, with the pseudo stairs being pushed through and abandoned after a while, although this latter separation had only pushed itself forth as to leave the other side way long after the society left and everything gave to absence. To be certain, the various cuts were still there, shaking, but never pushed. Nonetheless, the Imitations, and the other things, hopefully would relent themselves, as they should and fall over in the underground abyss, above all the tunnels which had been made through the various shafts that went through stone, as long a mine and through everything they could push themselves on.

Nonetheless, there was the problem.

Twice forth, the Imitations, now joined. Drones and skin-frames, all the while, pushing through as if to defile everything and just as much, with the help of the rope mouths, they managed to latch their sunken side back to the main-land, that being the other floors, still beneath the earth, while making it so, the other circle survived. Preserved into the boilers, the mold would grow and become as steam, molecule-sized, spreading within. But most importantly, through one of them, there lay, but trapped, as he’d stay in there, the body of the Carpet.

Thence stood Rose, Cones and Pegan-Beggar, talked. Upon their likes just as much was jotted on.

So many hours spent inside the boiler, freed. No longer would that urchin of black force them to push in, beneath the earth, sharing, spreading, seething for something to happen. It would be so, of better throngs, waiting was an unnecessary thing, for neither of them were of no lacquer.

Thence there lay, of which parlay, nothing but a thought.

Well then, and past the flow, through which had come, the Woman-Head.

She appeared to have an affinity for the Bowman-Archer, and would follow him until the end of time, or until the heat she was in would subside. Despite him being a liar, she was attracted, and when that would happen, her legs would enact some sort of deformedly contorted shake she could not for the likes of her shake off no matter how hard she tried. Seething while being endowed, pushed ahead and thrown aside, like a leper's arm.

Small break, in the head, man was not made for this, but he would behave.

‘There, I see, I’m done. Just done, right in time to re-calibrate the molecules.’

‘Marvelous, Nevhc, simply marvelous. You are truly gifted in the arts.

If I didn’t know any better, I would’ve thought you’ve made an offering to the mouths. You know that they’re not supposed to appear here, right?’

‘I know.’

Nevhc only approached Gregorian-Colum. It was obvious that he delighted himself by this and doing it could only make him draw near, and out of fear, he pulled a nose. Then a nostril, from which rose half a malformed arm. It was unpleasant trying to claim too much but this was what he wanted. All and always, going for the same bits, the same parts, it would have to be accounted for, they would go along a long way. Way through and out of fear. Desperation nearing.

Black figures emerging, being in the room. Tall-painted red others who had their heads swooned out of the fright instilled loss of sleep. Some large meaty objects which looked long-around the neck. Open-throated, in which buried slimy figures with tiny knives which spawned inside the fear he looked at, too fat, no feature, they looked like open sores, large and rounded, like stomach from which neck-poles pushed to a cylinder-stop. No head, but the openings were the things which sold him at.

Dark spots on tapestry of white-lined black, a linoleum made of ugly-metal, painted greenish-yolk, filled with cracks. A lamp on top, half a finger, largely extended, wrapped around it, arrow-keys transparently flapping like wings. It was eating from the mass of light which looked like hatched eggs, a mass. From Nevhc’s eye there came a benign strip, which appeared to have melted and have pissed on the floor before dissipating in the air.

‘Disgusting, you’re disgusting, you need to sleep on it.’

‘But that’s filthy.’

‘As are you, I see it.

Oh, I can see it, I think it moved again.’

He hadn’t made a suit, nor automaton or a marionette, instead he made some weird effigy, if such could be called, that he would use for mad protection against the evils of the world. They were neared, out of fear, that they’d cut a dreary cut at its throat.

They filled it with tiny blunders and put it in the body of an old clockwork stander, with a dead-throated coo-coo bird on top, open to bleed, a real one kept as well, no suit inside of it.

And they listened to the bird talk, at times it only started and wanted to be done, waning as it could not be helped, always inclined to the laughter as well, which was not shared, by the looks of it. Always a moaner, always someone who tried cutting ahead, always someone trying to pout.

‘No, I don’t like either of you being here, you need to leave.’

‘But we cannot.’

‘You have to, and I’ll make sure you all leave before the time comes.’

‘And what time would that be?’

‘The time of distress.’

It rose up, as it the pen-eyes were being dyed.

‘Harmony, I need harmony, I need a night of rest. I must confess that as of lately, the child inside of me, my twin started crying, oh, forever as I am awakened in distressed.’

‘Cut him off then, you need so, before he spreads.’

But that was something no one wanted to talk about. Another self-birth taking place after a long enough time being given; as another fetus would appear as a growth to the side, and one could not abide such a thing for long.

‘I can’t get rid of him. He’s my brother, and I love him.

Ho, such a terrible thing, I wish I had gotten, at the very least a night off to doze, something to grasp off and never come to my senses again. I wish I could.’

‘Settle down already, there’s nothing we’re up to.’

‘You can put me eternally down.

That pile of rubbish I made was taken from many people I have pained in doubt.’

‘Why is mom crying again?’

‘I don’t know son.’

‘She’s started talking to herself, locked inside her room.’

‘Don’t go near it. I think it’s for the better that, if we stood as far away as possible from her. We should keep our distance.’

‘There’s someone in there with her.’

‘Kid, I made sure she’s not breathing.

There’s no one in there with her other than an animal.’

‘Why?’

‘Here’s the key, see for yourself.’

The child advanced, slowly inclined on the side, almost shaken by what he was hearing. A sneer and an echo through, he opened without delight and went in. It was not serene, the room in shambles, yet everything just looked as well as it could. No one would’ve considered touching that thing either, from whence it stood, a house of stacked cards, of skin-lichens and vies stretching upon a puddle on the ceiling. The door was locked behind him.

Soon enough composed to look around, he saw the dead men as well, all shot against the wall by bolts and by various nails. Insufferable thing she was, she took her time dying, still awake. The kid simply stared at her, bright eyes, dead. But she soon twisted her head as soon, going up the ceiling, as if on a platter. Her body was but not clearly put but a blunder of metal, a body of iron cast, her head alive but played with. It was a strange thing seeing him there.

Something he had seen in a dream. Largely within it, her head split like sheet as it would be spared and spread across the room. Now he was lone with her, misunderstood this whole encounter, as he had had, he was ill-inclined to ask.

‘Why’d you do it?’

‘Your father asked me to punish.’

Half of the room, around the long bed and the cabinet cut, like a cutout brought down, and ever encompassed, inside there came. A creature twice the size of him and dark of gray, locks coming from his chest and in the back, all wearing smaller shrunken heads that were brought from the back-side of his body where he bore a fridge worn device.

He lifted a finger which split in half from which a tiny cutter, scalpel of no after started dreading on to push.

‘You misunderstood everything, child. I wish there was a reason for me to defile this hold of touches. And there was but a filth of stanch.’

‘You frightened me.’

His father entered through the door, melting it just then.’

‘I need to do something, before you get frightened again. I think you got too immersed into your contact with him.’

His father threw the tantrum of a child then cut a piece of his scalp and left the house.

‘I think we should try talking about what happened there.’

The child was still wearing a suit but he was unaware of what was going on. SO many flashing lights, were they? Were they flashing? It was hard to look anywhere around. He was looking at the various written things on every wall, not understanding what went wrong.’

‘I’m going to fight you to my last breath, you won’t be able to claim me as you have claimed her.’

‘Your father killed her, son.’

And just as he did, the child was gone.

But not his central nervous system which had not only been pulled away but it was slowly picked and lead aside, allowed to walk upon itself and blow the entire room to a block of burnt cinder.

Father left, thence enter. Imitation of a man.

‘Father of Imitation, talk to the man of mold.’

Said another man of the same substance as he lead him to the room of boils.

‘The boiler room is less inclined, I see no reason for me to be of a mind.’

‘Then ask of this and it shall be given. You wasted too much strength.’

Nonetheless, he was undefeated. Yet this was peculiar. For never before has he met his clause and such a thing alas, that he would join the dance and be put so. On the spot, he’d never know anything and ask even less of what it meant. A leap of faith had wrapped its dead-hands around it and started rubbing the only valve that kept it in check.

‘There, and there, it shall be open, look inside of it now. What do you see?’

‘I see something down there, too far a stretch. You madmen had created.’

Of spots unmet for vile eyes. There was too much there, to be called upon. A stretch of a world, in every boiler, told. A home for the less-fortunate and the most repelling of things.

Never listened to.

‘Always in the same spot, they’re wringing something in the back.’

Where on the farthest reached of mold, inclined, no mind of their own brought, they got as much, solemnly told, but a perilous stretch.

‘Ave, thee, and listen.’

One man prayed to nothing else but the most peculiar thing of all, the wretch which was the scoundrel, the pit enabled, and never wondered upon, there lay the carpet wasting. It had been oh, long a while since something had happened to it.

‘But there, the Quarry is open.’

Out of many feet, ahead and everywhere around, there was nothing to be put and latched upon, the wicked pandemonium of lack of worth. And worthlessly told.

A giant form, of many arms and legs and strange winged-formed humanoid pillars that had erupted from its head made it look like a giant mongrel-snail with parasites coming out of its eyes instead. They were growing and merging with as many objects as they could. Ever present there, eating as they should and as they could do it, so. They wanted to waste no tail which was wrung into the scum of song. Made to be eaten and put aside, they would become, after a while, all too wrung upon and swollen as scum became. Their eyes would tell of woolen shapes appearing there.

‘I want but to be a part of it. I want it.’

He begged the carpet only to see it come out of the enclosed chamber, pushing out and levitating. Wrought into the filth-uncanny, pushed through as it would shake haughty, only to be called. From the hole from which emerged, they crawled out, cackling as they could and would not shout. Of pain, which wasn’t theirs they hadn’t spoken of lost.

But begged for it, as he had, there was lost.

Corner

The corner was a strange pick. Upon in, as they watched upon it, there could be no thickness of each growth.

Well wrought, not in a hole but out there in the open when one should be mistaken but to stare. Large smoke machines, put into an open mountain. Many of them attached to men, heavy smokes and some who were breathing led. Though of no case and little wonder, they wrought the iron-distress disease which had not only blackened their lungs but it made them madly seek some satisfaction through the spoiled disease that spread between them.

Moving smoke-machines, their bodies were wrung and molded, four at a time.

Four met stuck to it, stricken up as to reach and catch one of the strangest, most peculiar clouds. Moths at the top where iron became skin, but still some long-shots of rope shot hooks which plowed the lands around them. Many men, of lesser worth were anchored. And they were shot in pain, allowed to bleed and drag the machine as eight legs extended. Though it as hard to see, these insects, of-to be called, no men were they any longer, instead they were filth. Ate like insects, acted like animals and crushed what they could, invading.

There was this peaceful land. And there were many people of many shrouds.

And their village was crowned as a jewel of dust. Of pity and no less would they be allowed to shout for more, as peace and nothing had disturbed their living, other than this whorish on-look, where they shook and couldn’t help themselves, as, whom were they? Where had they come? Of what siege would they be speaking of in past.

Written on a scroll, and illustrated at last.

‘They had started ever near. And had wrapped themselves around. At first, they would seem likely to be talking of surrender, but they wouldn’t not take it kindly, but en shambled.’

Round and round, they went, and wrapped each finger, past ahead. Dreadfully staring while trying to make so, there was no reason to look near, of the flights of snow. It was all for a show that they sent at first envoys to please. The village was malignant, and afflicted with disease. One could see their tents and weak-buildings of yellowish green hay, wrapped around insect-decay and the bodies of extended men that were wrung and strung about like kites. Lesser than it should, there were also birds of which heads were that of the children women would, but throw around and kill, of evil.

They were merely pretending but for peace, was trivial that they would admit. Wretched in their chaos, nor should they shake, or would be shook. There in front the sky was vile. Their smoke-machines had softened their tiles. And it was all darkened and hard to breathe. Not that it would be liked upon to be touched or spilt.

‘I see, when are you going to leave then?’

‘Whenever the time come.’

Overwhelmed by their forms, they looked like mere children of their own instead of wild contenders. It was all too tiresome, to say the least. And one would be aware that there would be no peace, wrought in dark command.

‘We shall pay no debt after the manner. Leave now!’

‘Don’t talk to me.’

‘Or else what?’

‘I’m going to crush your head.’

‘Do it.’

And then one of the four men inside the smoke-maker got up, pulled out, revealing that he had no arms and simply squashed the little man’s head in a heap of blood. What else would the smoke-maker man be dressed in if not one piece, of various crumpled meat that lay inside? There was the suit-dark look-a-like of a dancer, of which resemblance was only going stronger.

‘A great display.’

‘Greatly done, improved upon only by none other.’

‘Another magnificent display, I see.’

And they chattered their teeth as if they were merely clapping. It was swollen and forlorn, something of their own, but well meant. Never to be dead or said to be, anything of the like would much rather be lost on them. Not to be too subtle or too worn out, they had shaken each other off, and would wreathe about in place, uncannily.

A man with a dark hat and large black feather came about.

He had no face, but who had one?

And no fingers but who had toes?

And someone had also stolen his liver. And stabbed him, killed his child, raped and murdered his wife, curbstomping her into the nearest wall, skinned her so, burnt his chambers, ruined his country, took an eye out from the hidden slit inside his face, ripped off a leg. They spat on him, chained and enslaved the man. Raped him as a child again and again, put a nail between the point of castration, where they sewed on the face of his lover. A concubine made his wings, though they looked like machete-strings. Walked up as he wailed, of his completely cleansed people whom were but completely stomped into the ground and faltered, young women sought often, then pushed into a pond, yonder to be bloodied-killed. He would be ashamed on a journey on which peril would only destroy everything he touched within a few meters of his life. For everyone whose ever lover after, cursed upon to die minutes after.

The times had taken away any female touch, which he dreaded, at last, in the kindles, most benign stance. Many pets he had taken home had become people and would only look as deformed as to look as if they were worn by deranged taker. Claimed by disease of the mind, driven to seek only other deformities of life. Abused constantly by dreams that would keep him at night, he'd constantly stab himself in the ears and would eat dirt-benign. Fearing a times as he'd hear the worms scream, realizing that he ate worms, sunken within desperation, reaping but a town on fire.

He admired once a flower, but it was stomped upon by an evil man.

‘Why did you do that?’

‘Because I need to kill, I need to kill.

But I’m not going to kill you, no. It would be much crueller, so. If I left you alive.’

Then he spat on his head, which caused his hair to fall off, way too early in his adult life. And lived through much more, he spat but gore with every cold he'd taken. He'd become part of a cutthroat band only to be imprisoned and lay aside for a crime he had not committed.

‘Eighty days, in solitary stay.

For the murder of children’s hay.’

‘But I was nowhere near the farm.’

‘Good.’

And they threw the key and the lock, and a part of the gate as he would not be allowed to lay nowhere else. And he was pitied by whomever passed, to visit the destroyers of whichever last thing they had.

Little mind to them, no passing, swollen after a while, not wanting to have anything, of little wings of iron, he had wanted to be done with it.

‘Please just put me so, out of my misery.’

Ever so near as it drew, the man named Stow had suffered ever so near alike to near-blindness and death. He was put through so much pain.

The lynching rope had struck a chord but ripped ahead, he lost a bet, only being allowed freedom as a carriage set forth during the execution. It came from the sky, and set it flight, they threw a chain and a hook which attached itself to his left shoulder, dragged through the wooden stand as it buried through the earth and drove forth through a hidden tunnel like a mole towards freedom.

But his saviors tried slitting his throat as well, after realizing they got the wrong person.

They couldn’t have known that Stow as but free to pass. He was in so much pain but he thought that one day, it could finally be put to a stop. It would all be over, ever so sooner, after a while. He could finally be free of agony and made to feel right. Abandoned near a tavern, where he spent the night, though met by grins, he was put in a dark chamber where he spent the night with crawling ants that started skinning his lower ankles, of eight in number, large deformities, until he fell to sleep of pain.

Poor Stowe, his fingers were like melted snow, waited outside for, before release, beaten to a pulp by men who only wanted to take a piss at him and bloody him to a pulp, unable to comprehend what had happened before that. He walked upon trails, and never waned outside, he wailed. Upon the steps, outside the tavern, he trailed but a to a lone pair of tower-forests, where every willow was but a tower, dark near the bottom, solitary bricks could be seen. Waited by a guide, uncanny, with a torch within his grasp; above of them but little light, a cloud of smoke-kind in doubt, wide-spread and pushed around as it would breathe out loud. He could but pray for something to happen, ever since he neared but a lack of faith. He wanted something to kick him into it before he stepped the wrong way.

‘What’s up there?’

‘Fragmented pieces of long-birds, I think there’s at least a kind, of little blind species in the mix unkindly as it looks, they’re all tainted, nor should you approach them.’

‘Why?’

A few fragments came below, fading as filthy-blows would upon entering his skin. Burying themselves within as If not to count upon in, little mind to them, as if to call. There was no reason to stall. As but for a fragment which had neared.

‘What is a bird made out of?’

The guide stabbed him in the throat, but he didn’t bleed to death either, he merely walked and stumbled upon a feather, which was no feather. Indeed, it was a solidified fragment of some coronary disease. His face was stomped on by a few children who came out of their way. Putting him up to in, and spitting again.

Yet, he rose back up despite his hardships, settled to the kind. Although, ever since he made it through the fortress-forest, he had been haunted by his trip as well. As the man had been constantly assaulted by as many of them as he possibly could. There was no stopping to it either, as men of armor came and shook him where he stood with lances, javelins and plenty of knives they bore on them as well. All too irksome, tiresome after a while, his head smashed him, his teeth turned to puddles, his tongue cut, another hidden eye gouged off, nails pulled, heart punctured by the tip of an arrow. His hidden nose tripped and fallen onto, broken in as his cartilage remained. Burn alive, fallen acid in his vein.

Then, out of nowhere he came. Many a knives, little hardened puddles and iron picks were thrown, small spiked things and little gongs and saws would almost cut through. He bled but took two steps behind, almost upon himself and lost in doubt. He almost slickened, not knowing, never throwing but a thought.

A punch had come and almost came alive, and pushed through and little doubt. There was but a slimmer and another one, he couldn't see him, but would do, I doubt. Whatever he could be, wherever to see, all missing.

‘Where are you? Show yourself before be gotten!’

‘Near thee, near there.’

He appeared but to step away. From below him as if geysers pushed out but holes, as if bullets that were not seen and fire came out, bur buried through low and ever lower. Unable to see around, he had barely missed his chance to get back at it, but failed to see a little rock-hardness step across his jaw.

Kicked to the nearest block, around the roundness, more had sought. To get another plight in, another one going, another kick through, his mouth sowing with the heat. His tongue but beaten and would seethe. A well of fire, he appeared to admire him from above. Standing now on top the tower's throng.

‘How is that you're so fast?’

‘I do not know, in actuality, you've got me at a missed chance.’

He leaped again and although pained, he would do it again and again until stomped to death and barely asking. Always forgetful, unmasked as well, pained by something that would not happen. Spoiled by everything, as if it never happened. Stowe had missed the chance to end it all, to be stomped immediately by one falling boulder that could've withdrawn him so, from ever nearing and ever-dying. From breathing, ever in the pool, this dirty was all he knew now, dying, but ever getting up, he threw up then outta' the way. He's gotten messed with, and pushed that way. This and there, ever be ware.

‘Thee be wrong, I sought to look through all, I see.

Through every plot and plant, to plant thee be wrong.’

‘You don't know the likes of it yet. I'll have you whether you like it or not, see it so.’

Ever much, in the wrong, had he been, and even clearer as he'd seen it, there was a misstep.

He was almost dead as many boulder followed, wrapped. From inside of them crabs and giant ears leaped about. From the hole of which, a single peculiar being emerged, as if from another dimension it crept and winked.

With a giant pair of mole-shaped extremely protruding deformed extensions that were pushing out of eight directions, strapped on top of a flat-sheet surface which was curved around the edges, the backside of which bore many strong root-like worms that pushed inside a most peculiar hole-like depression that was attached, not bore to the long body. As if it were a piece in preparation, it was held upon by little feet that trampled and danced, like the little bodies of a mushroom upon a torso-snail-like bobbling fat mass, which pushed in the back to a small four, long support pillars of skin that pushed out as if they were the extensions of a blooming flower, then curving inwardly to a single pointed concave dome upon which the many bodies of humanoids forms of those who had been long-absorbed into it prayed. For they had not been killed but allowed to see past everything, their sight inverted, sky dark, reverted into a primitive thing as they could see no stone but various formations others could not but dream of in their wildest manners. Various manifestations of eternally glowing celestial bodies appeared out of nowhere, glowing in various shades, and talking with mouths that were made of skin and looked as if they had been pulled and ripped out from within various canine, reptiles and other primates of their kin. But this could not be, with no other explanation that they had ripped through time and stole what wasn't there during their prime. Smaller globes but appeared and neared the point where concentration faded and they had become but uncanny in sight.

This thing only distracted the attacked who didn't understand why this creature had hidden inside a rock, or from where it had come as well or the humanoids prayed.

They were not aimed towards a strange looking celestial body but to a planted plant-planet in shape, an oblong which looked like the insides of a man inverted, with the exception of the ribs which had become strange walls that bore, inside of them, many figures that were wrapped inside, forming an architecture of a kind which had never been seen before. But they were not worshipping it either, for his was but a man.

Instead, they turned upon the strangely deformed, eighty-hundred shaped, contorted willows-like ball-squares which pushed around and grew inside the first peculiar edge of the land it could grow upon, pushing out inside it formed a long inversed iceberg-like figure of stacked limbs, all of which extended from within the great spectral body of a largely manifold, rounded structure. The structure bore two arm-like shapes that pushed right and from below.

The arm-like thing below it bore all the fat leading down, to which it had not only fragmented itself, but left out tiny servants made out of spectral physically manifesting pieces which were deformed. Some pseudo eyes could be seen and other prosthetic legs upon which they walked instead of drawing air. They also bore large tails in which they bred little infantile figures that were much more developed than they were. Pushing out prodders which were used to eat the smaller intestinal figures hidden in the ground-ropes beneath them.

Leading to the arm-like thing in on the left, there lay the formation of a city made out of great stand that bore millions of lynched creatures made of skin, darkened-tawny, more than Negroes in shade, attached to dark-skinned skin-ropes, and small towers of skin which were only manifesting in part.

This creature only used parts of the land to contort and be pulled inside the world again. Always dissatisfied by the strange floating inside tiny inflated blimp-baboons that had been carved inside the flying stalks that started filling the air with scum-fair blood, in coagulated two-shaped mounds that began contorting as well, to which there were attached colors, blue-white-blue-red-ultramarine mixed as well. Upon their surface, flying two-paired cones began growing out of, pushing out the mass of black hair which started growing on the ground as well as inside the hearts of those who prayed to it, so it could manifest everywhere and replace the black sky of which inversion only drove them to a supreme fright from which they could not draw away from.

If there was anything else they could forget, it was the fact that minutes before, they developed if not evolved, tiny knives they used to stab themselves inside their bodies in order to stop some of the mental pain from happening as well. There were pieces missing of the clouds, they were infested with a leaping disease such as the kind of diabetes were.

But Stowe was well because he had no sugar in his blood. He ate a lot of iron-dust and would live until his fifties. He stood around and wondered, how was it that this strange figure became so red, as to be completely painted in the color before it disappeared all of the sudden and was never seen for again. It simply vanished and was never seen again, as if it never existed. And he simply wondered whether or not he existed at all.

And if he never existed what would happen to all those lost years he had spent in pain? Who might remember what I went through, again and again, to no justice being met by my hand? After all I've gone through, to think that I would be painted red and disappear. It had only occurred to him now. He could lose it one day and never exist at all. It was this time of existential agony that died right away after a speck of sand was thrown into his non-existing eyes, since at best they could be seen as gushing wounds his body attempted to suture back into. Would he be called? Pained at all, what was going on?

The last thing he remembered was the fact that he lay. On his knees again, beaten, against the might of whom? What was happening?

Awakened by the guide, who pulled him aside, stabbing him in the chest and legs and arms, through his spleen and shin, spat upon, burning through.

'Remember that it was I who killed your wife and child.'

He wasn't so, but he would not know.

Carried on the back of a mountain-climber he but walked ahead. He was almost dead, or would've been so, if it weren't for the strange lesser Demigod who pulled him from the morbid chamber in which he stood. Of black-red smoke, of which fragments shook, some forming the floor, others the door, and everything else he stood in as well as more than a few people who had stood in line. All too dark down where the path lead, and an afterlife that was too repulsive to be looked at, back to it, far from him, always wondering where he was.

The Demigod was but Cones, that must be so.

Elated by the fact that there was an infection in the air, he gave the man his hat.

‘Here, have it?’

‘What?’

‘Exactly, I think it so. I think we should part ways from this point on, I do not think it’s safe for either of us to thread on and spare what’s going past our hearts.’

‘That’s what I was thinking as well.’

As a parting gift, eighteen razors fell from inside the hat, permanently scarring the Stowe, his face his top of the head, his forehead, the open-wounds and as they passed through his mouth, his gastric tract as they settled inside of him.

Cones then ripped off his neck and threw his head somewhere in the distance, never to be seen again. For some reason this felt like the right thing to do. There has never been a better time to kill one of the small animals around him. As a matter of fact, he grabbed what he could, then got out of the fortress-forest, then entered the zone where the village was one. Thence came the strange smoke-makers.

His first impression of them was that they were weird and ugly, and the men attached to those blocks of ugly metals, piles, pipes and other attachments, was benign. They were ugly, deformed and would be dressed in clothes made out of alloy, wrongly deformed in their heads, which looked like they were descending into hardened crows that stretched their teeth around them. Walking on broken dreams of filth, he pulled out a small critter and ate it, before he felt he lost a smile on a whim.

What a peculiar thing, he looked as his hand. Never realizing that he had shoved that tiny feather inside his finger all along, still bleeding. Another thing checked on his list of bad memories. It was too much to bear, but there were people out there and he didn’t want to cry in front of them. Too frightened of what he might say, not to disturb them, he almost came to expect being thrown around. Way shaken and more than he should’ve been. It was time he’d seen them for what they were. Strange folk who abused their own, inside they hay-making clothed hens, guts were plain to see, wrappings. All around their dogs, talking only to cover up the barks, as not even these starved beasts would eat their masters during this time of disgusting fleece and cuts. Many skin-taps were there, a rain of bloody tumors falling from a sky which was painted in the color of blue coral. People were hanged and trapped right there, as it slowly became darkened, towards a night of smoke which spread the lung cancer.

The Black-Lung was God, and he had ordered his smoke-machine servants to spread the filth of which death follow, in the basin of many spreads, where lay. Eternally all corpses would remain.

All world was green, a block of color, of patchy gray dark-flat floor, no door, but the vile machines of smoke. Protruding, slough of which denigrating nature had given. He survived the sudden implosion, for he suffered most in path.

A voice had settled to tell him so.

‘You’ve suffered the most of all men, henceforth you shall be spared.’

Forth, a few feet away, he saw the men in the machines of smoke, decayed, dead, and bidden so.

‘Who else survived?’

Stowe asked as he was greeted by the Black Lung God, to which all pollution shook forth as they lead back to it.

So it was made without any helplessness, they wore, themselves but uncanny, no longer would they bear each other forth.

‘What have you done to this place?’

Destroyed it in my embrace, everyone suffered in the end and still do, as they will continue smoking, unable to control each other, past the hue. Weight upon the shoulders no longer to be starved, they looked upon uncanny stars but a sea upwards made of white. Of such pure light as the likes of which he’d never get to see.

‘SO, what am I suppose to do from this point on?’

‘Embrace this place until the white smoke ends, and walk upon endlessness.’

Thence he was lost, never to be seen again.

A Curved Room in the Bathhouse

It was definitely something one could not look back into for some reason. Now that it all approached, no longer pushing out, no longer starved, remorselessly, for what was there.

A room stood but on plain a structure made out of embrace. As it happened for them to hole one another, they pushed until they could never stop growing to no end. Always wrapped a pair of hands, largely metallic, deranged as one could barely understand, for what was worthy they only sang. When, to be touched and plunged upon.

‘Whorish-machines, such machinations should not be made upon a whim. ‘

‘I see, I see, and what reason might there be for such a thing?’

‘I don’t know, we have to look at it.’

Thence they went on closer. The room looked like some kind of forgotten wardrobe, or some deformed, up-endlessly stretched upon a peak tool-shed which was taken by them. It appeared like the ceiling, upon which a little more than a few hundred of those blasted looking strange creatures were wreathing one another towards, was a floor of abuse. One could even stretch an ear just as well if only he wanted to understand and shake off that feeling that one should not bear. It always wallowed and did what one could, instead. Make the point, signal something having entered.

Something, not likely to be a man, as everyone knew not to enter; for such a reason was not paranoia by any means but pure common sense. Danger, even as what lay within it could damage but a man’s mind. It could provoke such unfathomable thoughts such as the like which would incline him to consider suicide. Indeed they were ever pushing, ever-ahead, even after the initial hold it held on him. No matter what he could not be spared otherwise of what were to come, dread came to nobody's heart.

The men approached, pulling out a flash-light out of their pockets.

'If it looks nasty enough now, just imagine what would happen if we were to leave this be for a few months. I wager they could grow and drag the whole structure down.'

'I think so too, you know?

You can never be too certain with these kinds of things.'

He spared him for what was worth, of whichever, though that might've crossed his mind just then. Another snap, their joints were cracked. And for a while, they were both of one mind.

'I think it's but a creature now, of fat and little of it is left.'

'No doubt about it, I think so too. We should both be weary of it in any case, you know what could happen if you touched it.'

Indirectly so, the man only came closer when needed. Otherwise, he could not look anywhere else, undefeated and felt. So much closer, he wanted to know, just when. And for how long.'

'Someone was here before us.'

'How can you tell?'

'I don't know, but I can see it, I know I can, just look at it now. Touch it, it's filthy I think.'

There were signs, nothing vulgar, blood in the vulva, an imitation of a far worse thing. It drew in from its wild surroundings and seems likely to have spread everywhere where touch could feel its way.

'Forge, we need to go.'

Company responded as well as he could, with all that he should do now, being, leave this place. It was just what he could do and just as much as he would miss it. Always of a mind as he was, there was a reason to think there was something standing between the two of them. In the long corridor back, both considered.

'The living quarters are filled with these kind of things.'

'I was expecting as much.'

'We ought to report it.'

'I don't know, maybe we should slip this off this time?'

'It's your call.'

Clicks and clings of chains dragged back, a bell was missed, something snapped.

Both Company and Forge followed on the trails left by sound and appeared in the proximity of the door, they entered. As quickly as they could come back, they snapped two fingers, looked about. There was only but an apparent change which happened and it was almost missed on by the looks of it. Always in the same place, always in the same direction, something was taking their breath through.

‘Someone was here a few seconds ago, I know it, look.’

He pointed at the calf-fattened leg and only noticed how much of the growth had occurred in the first place. The leg attached to the machine was cut, and pretty deeply as well, as one would be brought to know.

Something had its way with her, it was obvious. There was too much going on for either of them to ignore, always placed in the wrong spots, always in the wrong directions. They were almost done here.

‘Something took a bite out of it.’

He looked again.

Company only saw it now. Barely, but it was undeniably shaped in the same way a piece of a pie would be taken from it. The resemblance was uncanny. It was bore through, missing. Something snapped from it. Black-blooded insects shoving themselves through the stacked black meat, they popped then threw themselves at them. Flying through, then pissed about. Right around the corner followed.

‘Don’t let them get away. We need to see where they’re headed towards.’

That much wasn’t allowed, not any longer, no more touched. No longer messed about. Always there, rope-eyes appeared as well, but they were trickier for some reason. For the same thing could not be said about anything any longer. It looked way too thorough, always so.

Sockets were wrapped like beads inside the ropes, dragged along as if to show that they were always watched, while, at the same time they were always one step behind, always lagging behind the line. Teeth as swollen, Siamese-twins around, the stoppers.

‘There’s no passing past this point, you need to go around and move a joint.’

Despite not being a completely secluded dead end as one would endear himself to appear into, they were, brought by force and made to watch. Fear inlaid in their eyes.

There was no answer to be gotten, where the insect’s flight had gotten there. Here and there, always near to something, but no answer.

‘Come on Forge, we’ll find another way through, don’t make a fuss now.’

Started again, it would start again before long.

With everything in mind they grasped the first piece of ground and turned. Without looking, they made it to an upturned room where they stood the lounge and waited.

‘Release the light, I need to look around for a few minutes.’

‘Here, have at it. I think this should be easy enough.’

Another thing, too enclosed.

Chamber-in, there came the Chamberlain.

His manner of walk was strange and peculiar. All-calloused around their heads, it just happened for two of them to be there, plain of heads and barely seeing what was going on around them. It was a matter of time until they could make sense out of it.

‘What was the matter with the insects?’

‘I don’t know but we were lead right in.

I think we ought to turn and leave.’

‘Nay, I don’t think that’s. I don’t.’

He saw through it, even without the lights. They were walking on even foot, right ahead, then to the right. Everything look blander, a filter on their eyes with one exception, there was that. And there was no other reason they could look around.

Back in front of that room, looking at an even blander line they formed. So much for them being touched now. They looked to deranged to even be spat on.

‘I don’t see any cut anywhere.’

‘I don’t see it either. Maybe we should go back?’

‘That’s a tad late, isn’t it? I don’t think there’s anything we could do about it any longer.’

Far stretched and ragged walls, all plainly dropping before them, leaving nothing behind.

‘That’s one of the nests, come on.’

‘No, wait, damn it Forge, slow down.’

‘See you there.’

‘I told you to wait, Forge, damn it!’

He followed through. It was filthy, even more than the floors ought to have been or looked like. For the same reason he refused to step aside. His arms were swollen, from pints and bolts which entered, lain in mind. This was it, Forge was gone.

Company was struck by it, as he had no reason to advance any further without making too much noise there. He felt like a machine with a lighter in its hand, trying to trail on the footsteps of the man. But he was gone and in no way would he be allowed.

‘Damn it. Rope-mouth, damn it.

Open up, open up already!’

Few meters off abashed, there was but a large plate standing in both directions, too far ahead, all covered. No gap, no heap, no hole, no way in or anything, just that overly wrought stretch.

Plain of Curve

It was there, anywhere, two of them cut, and in fear of what might come out of its way and grasp them. And they were tied, and better lied to, as they could feel no satisfaction. It was the left-over of a short disaster, short-lives as the many plains, the lands parchments were filled with them, all wrought in the bodies of ten distinct beings, all wrapped as if molded into cages. Cave-depth even which held the victims in for the executions to occur. Although there was little to it and little more, daft in the neck and darted with skin, poured through holes made in their heads and torture. It would bring little to no satisfaction to the concoction that force them so.

‘We have gathered abound to look upon them as we hear them shout elated.

Pain shall force them to see the true liberty that lays outside the peer-shape of form.’

They were but set in machines of gore that bore their saws, spinning through their floating lords that would oversee their makings being wrought about each corner brought. Through some malign and wild depressions, in which they pushed and lay; larger drops where some of them sunken, little more could there remain. But a few attempts, superseded, largely abandoned, made to lay. Below the piles of men and women, there lay children on their way. To what they seemed to be paradise, they dug, in their attempt to reach and shout, bloody fingers, missing nails, nothing that would allow them to stay.

‘Oh, I see and wonder, what you’ve done to your children, there’s no wonder any longer. I see. You’ve forfeited their right, ever so near to be called.

You’ve given in and let them push, and through their bodies, I should see them crush and lay, as dead men to stay and satiate the blood with which only drowning shall covey.’

Painless as it appeared to be for now, they were wrought in the bodies of animals and wild gods, symbolizing both sacrifice and those to serve. Unnervingly they would not mourn for whom was dead and whom was passed around. There was no doubt that they would die eventually if they were allowed to breathe in this condition. Wildly exposed as well, four of them had begged, no wonder, before, not fire, but the drought was on its way.

From beneath, but the springs, heated as to boil and melt them into mounds of spoiled meat, all trapped. Between diseased bars of iron, at their feet now lay the children of their bones. Those who were wrought in and would to be skinned were left there to be wrought as wild diseased.

‘Ah, another partitioned sacrifice, I wager.’

‘You’ve done well, Deffen, you’ve done well, I would be largely inclined to think that you ought to.’

Always the filth put into bubbles and into small phials.

They put tiny valves and formed pseudo-sinks in order to draw from the mounds and fill them in.

One man would draw near. He was part of their gathering, peculiar man in look, untainted.

All the gurgling would have to end.

‘Your insatiable thirst will never end, do you not understand it yet? I can see no hope for either of you if you choose to continue getting through it.’

He said, and as he said so, he opened his throat and reveled, nothing. No foam, no gurgling, no blood to fill him so.

It ought to have been known, wherever one might be and looked upon a near horizon. There were things a man could endure, drinking from the phial was not one of them. Of long-decay and chance uncanny, it came too sweetly and would bode well, whom to tell of what went through their heads then?

Always too convenient, everything happening on one place.

Hard to account for every face which would be dragged down and made it through the holes that lead through piles and other parts of the great system leading beneath the earth.

Blood was anything but drained uncannily.

And sworn to preservation as they were, nothing would outlast them by any means. Carefully preserved here and there, making a thorough thing.

‘I can see it all clear from blow the earth.

In some way, I think it looks like a circle, a great device, an anathema of some kind or intersected symbols made out of pure light.

Standing, floating on a sky of dark gray, though it is dark, I can see it.

Though the way ahead is covered in mist, I can see plainly fine, in some way. I know it to be so. Inscriptions placed, of various kinds, unfathomable visions, all set in mind.

But they are projected from my side.’

‘How? And what happened? How did you reach that conclusion?’

‘It happened, ever since I managed to get back at her.

Indeed, since the court of my peers had deemed me unlawfully a man of guilt, I had to seek justice of my own. In a just world, I would’ve walked freely, without having to resort to it.

But I have done it and that night will forever be in mind, stored, embed in it, since it was the reasons for the symbols came.’

‘What did you do your wife?’

‘I set her on the side, and put her down, then with a pair of scissors, I slowly gouged her eyes. And I felt well, as I’ve done it. There was something right in me doing so.

I could still feel her struggle after pinning her down. How hard she wailed and screamed as I forced it down her eye. And I would do it once again.

Only to feel her struggle again and again, as that gave me a more thorough satisfaction than the likes of which you will never know. Even though she did not die from the initial force, I know she would’ve enjoyed watching the lights with me. Together, as we ought to be now.

I can still feel her there.’

‘And you don’t feel guilty for doing so?

After all, she wasn’t of their kind. She wasn’t a lesser human being like the ones we punished, and she were of a mind unlike any other.’

‘All worth it for what I’ve seen. I think so in any case. If you were to ask me the same, once and forlorn and anywhere else, I would’ve kindly dismissed you.

For that I can only look upon you with doubt, especially now since you would not understand why I’ve done it. Out of love for her, she had to pay for what she’s done.’

‘What did she do then?’

‘She chose to stay after giving her a chance to leave. She could’ve lived if she were not as stubborn as they are.

I gave freedom to her spirited winged trapped gully she had been dragged into, and what do you think she’s done to repay me?’

‘She stood.’

‘Indeed she had, and from the blood which sprang, the fountain came the sign, and I have looked upon it as I see it now, even in broad daylight and I know, she’s responsible for it. I know it to be so.

And I would kill her again and many others pure, just to look at what they stood for, the ones which designed these strange metallic traps.’

‘Tell us then.’

‘It’s clear that they felt the same. Some kind of repulsion which went a long way to make a man act.’

There was nothing purer than the feeling of being paid back. Not in the meaning of fortune, but through ever-be accounted for immorality. It was something that could not explain. It felt as if killing whores brought to mind some kind of ill-defined visions one would be inclined to pay heed to, for there was no possibility of there being any coincidence whatsoever for the kinds of actions they would adhere to. And the satisfaction that was brought by bashing their heads, defiling them, and making sure they would not walk again. Gushing with their uterus wide-open and left on the side, eaten by hyena-like creatures which the bodies of jellies that were stretched on an umbrella-like shape from which, at the back of, came, long-extensions of cartilage which dragged away the fat, forming lines of finger-lined segments upon which they formed pseudo-looking bird cages, long and tilted and largely deformed. Pushing in the back to a half-pointed cylindrical body that appeared to be pushed into some kind of largely deformed tail which bore eight sided facets upon which little humanoid shapes made of skin were chained to them, like embed figures, and poked out tiny men which had grown out of the facets organically. And they bore tiny one-horns that sprouted out of their foreheads which bore strange eyes connected to every junction and every segment that lay to it. Such a creature would sometimes sprout, from the back of its tail, large segmented spine-like curved blades used to pick upon on their breasts in the most uncanny fashion, hatred being liquefied through their insides, forcing the dead whorish bodies to be thrown around and used until they were brought to life only momentarily so. Breathing heavily through intense pain, shock revealing their intestines wrought. Painted in blue and green and some sinew being put on top of them.

Alabaster would be so pleased by what was going on here, he would most definitely split her open just to take a loon-like look inside of her.

Something must've happened that day, when her eyes got plowed into dirt, right before she was driven into a wall and left to rot in broad daylight.

'What an amazing thing you've done. You must be proud of yourself.'

'Truly so, I am quite proud of myself.'

'Not to be too lenient now, but you did have something on your mind with that knife, right?

And I don't think you're going to be allowed to leave by him.'

Turned around, the man looked at the floating Rat-entity which was full set, rotten instead in its guts, for a short plunge of broken lips.

'Control yourself, Amnesty, you're a Red man of Red-meat, you wager filthy will come and drown you unless you control yourself like you used to.'

He could not help it, for the likes of him was uncannily set, he would be dead before the mid-day came, and worst of all, he could not be, if anything, insufferably so. He was to be killed.

'Take the knife and plunge it in.

Or drink from the phial.'

'And that's how I came here.'

Forgery, in thought, it was strange, looking how the lights were out now.

'So, right, but have you seen another man on your way here by any chance?'

'No, I haven't, why?'

Company was set to return, now with the lighter as well. As strange as it seemed, there was no reason to call it. They both simply walked, out of it, as they left the man behind.

‘You’re not wearing a suit.’

‘Why would I be wearing one?’

‘Never the matter, never the matter, I think we should.’

I need to show you something and ask for advice.’

Again, walked around while tracing back the steps, it felt pitiful, having him around, since he was missing his lower stomach as well as everything else around his spine. But most importantly, he was not wearing a suit. It was all too filthy and broken. Waste, like the basket of entrails in his mind, which bore no face but bashed them around, uncannily worn out and looking. Off with two limbs, a cardiac disease with the eyes of filth. There was but one ruse which appeared to bare. He was out of it before he’d fare.

‘I think we need to embrace this place.’

Mold, there were the eyes that eternally floated about. Unlike those of them, these were shapely too small to be observed by any means, they were but of one piece after all, cut around each moth.

‘Moths now rule this place.’

Said the giant moth-shaped weird chasm that appeared to have hundreds of them put together, wrapped in chords which went deeper into their body wronged, filth expander. But they stole the low legs of men and walked on them in fear of what might be going on. Always, watching, always gathering about.

‘Mold-spare, mold-spare, you ate it, haven’t you?’

‘We have, just look around the lower sides of the room and you shall have found it out.’

There was a reason to point out what was going on. For the same reason they went through it, they lost, at a distance, their eyes were caught. Bloody things, like trinkets marking, small arousing holes and drops, hundred miles going below them, like archers striking them, the land to plow. Eaten pits that had been empty now lay on their sides.

‘We live in little holes now breeding.’

They were not moths, eternally surrounded, but looked dumbfounded nonetheless once they had encased themselves in the weird bodies that floated around, confessing.

In a room, between them, many database shafts as well as placement monitors and automated worn devices rested. Imitations were there, mold-men staring as well as a few other Skin-frames whom were floating as rightly as to looks as if they were but windows once again put inside invisible rooms, forcing the outsides to move ahead, drawing the bad air through.

A single little puddle of sinew appeared there. Somewhere else as well, followed through by what seemed to be a relic of a man well-suited.

He was apprehended and kept so by a few drones. They were watching carefully and almost stalked the man after some fashion that could not be explained by any means. Always going to him, always pacing around, making sure he would not display the slightest sign of life.

‘Your kind is dead.’

Said the Mold, but the mold creature couldn’t have been more wrong. For obvious reasons, it had kept the half man that was made of him partially alive, not entirely but close enough for it to go as well. There was a reason, after a fashion to make it so. Two fingers had been ripped apart, there, that would suffice.

‘See? Pure, red unadulterated blood, would that suffice for the two of you? Bloodthirsty things.

The wings of the moths were but powder-scum which were shaped like weird square-combined triangles to which the various faces of demonesque masks were set. Yet eyeless, and empty gaps left just as much to their wide-spread bodies, many of which having become skin-like grew, like tumor-hues struck. Two human hands came out of it then. Mmmoth approached.

For obvious reasons, it asked, solemnly for a chance to feel for itself, from which, if it could, it would do it without having to fare, any consequences that would make one stare at what was going through. It wanted to feel, and asked as much.

As soon as it would suffice for it to ask, the mask came off, thence it felt around both faces.

‘You truly are one of the lesser survivors. I am quite inclined to think it so. Impressive in some manner, I wrought your body into a scum-plot.’

Already? He’d worked fast but never faster. This was a disaster which could not begotten or thought off. But unbeknown to him, a few meters below, through some pheromones that fell as drops, the lesser servants came to be. And they had settled, lesser be.

Man with a Coat

It was unnecessary to believe everyone had to live. It was all too obvious in some way. Broken fingers crossing, always in the same spot, outside, a well, nearing it, close.

‘A man told me to deliver you this.’

‘Should’ve know you’d come.’

Two more envelopes, all emptily appeared, likely as they were, to make the whole building stand. We were there, always on the spot. Not listened to, not followed, but looked at. Children passing, dressed like adults, always singing in tune. Another stranger coming after, always trying to drive them off, fall into the pit of rails, when the station calling off the way. There were dark bushes in the north as well, in the lost woods as well as everywhere where it mattered, or whichever direction should amount for it. Red spots on every face, various days as well as, him, always trailing off his various stories.

‘You are the chief and I’m but the lower.’

‘Don’t worry, you’ll climb, you’ll do. Go inside of it, that room of fear and tell me what you see.’

A few steps took you a long way, a long while and everywhere else, when it didn’t matter at all. There were no perceptions any longer, all would be blind. A few men with antlers on their tops and strange women in wedding dresses always following them towards the wall of spikes, all joined and dragged back. Not only straight forward but down as if to fall flatly into the sea where they could not rise from any longer, singing for hope at times. Unable to comprehend how was it that so many of them remained alive for so long in the pools.

‘Man leaps.’

‘I don’t follow.’

‘I told the man to leap and he did as I said so. He seems to forget at times that it is I who is in charge and no other.

He appears to forget that I have cut just about everything from the messages he received in his envelopes to the accolades his long renowned for career seemed to have yearned for. He longs for a wife that’s left him for a man that’s now dead. He yearns for a family that’s not his and a child he’d like to bed. He is to be taken from society and thrown into a box. Years spent away from her twisted him into something no one should become.’

‘And what ought to be done with men like those?’

‘It is obvious, those who cannot wed women and start, what appears to be something natural to human life, need to be dealt with immediately, in the same way one ought to deal with an open gash.

Immediately sealed and thrown around, I seem to think. We need to cut it off like a cancer and put an end to him.’

‘But if the man is sick.’

‘There’s no such thing. Man cannot truly be sick, he yearns for something righteous or the vile. Whichever else might be, he falls into either one of those categories and nothing else, do you understand?

Man needs to follow through, or he might end up like him, a box with glue and put through spikes, and boiled alive and cut in pieces of which delight. He gets cut in half and drowned.’

‘But he is sick.’

The man repeated, but that would be uselessly undefeated, if it were not for it to be rehearsed.

‘All the while, you should’ve understood by now, the way ahead, where fear lay, the door he’s gone through, locked forever, for a life that might never end.’

‘He’s done nothing wrong yet. He’s guilty of no crime.’

‘No men are until proven so. Yet, only to be certain sometimes, better to have prevented a catastrophe from happening, one must take these inclinations of his into account, then start dealing with him before going on. It is only for the good of every party that he may be put down of a malady. As well as every other man alike.’

‘What of those whom feel the same of other men?’

‘Is It not obvious that they deserve to be put in the same place as well? You appear to be of another mind now, and that I understand. But you need be reminded that it is not a room he is in and those envelopes are not empty, from what I can tell you.

He sees, no, he chooses to see nothing in them because his mind is already made in the matter. He purposefully chooses to plainly ignore them since there are ways for him to seek refuge under the wings of those whom might protect him. And do you want to know why?’

‘I’d truly do. If only you could make some sense.’

‘Oh, but I am making as much sense as I ought to. You don’t truly understand much, do you, of how this world seems to work. The ones of whom he’s under the protection off, are culprits themselves. And one could never hope to get a jab at them by any means.’

‘So you’d only waste time with little pets instead?’

‘Everyone’s guilty in the part, as there’d but no side that’s ever in the right, or ever in the wrong, and they could never hope to make it so by any means.

We’ve all partaken into some kind of act, although it is not like theirs, in some way, we’re guilty of having killed. We’re guilty of having taken some down whom were willing to take the fall, only so others might continue. And worst of all we knew this before, or would’ve known.

For those who facilitate the blow are just as guilty for taking part into the curtain that blinds everyone along the way.’

‘You lost me again.’

‘But I can see that you’re seeing it just as clear as I thought you would. Think of me as an arm. I do not think as I just act. And I could be stopped at any moment. Yet they let me do as they please, for just a tiny fraction of a second. If he dies, and makes the news, they’ll ignore them for the greater ruse. I think it’s likely, ever so likely that no one would suspect it.

I have only thought of it now, after such a long time. Sentencing so many of them, giving them the antlers so they’ll leap, down there, you know, there are no children.’

‘And what are you hoping to accomplish here?’

‘I’d like to know it myself, but often find out that I am unable to do so.

I thought I were in control, what I was doing was rightfully so, the only moral thing to do.’

‘But now?’

‘I find myself unable to understand. Should I continue doing this or should I stay my hand? I cannot win, at best, I could only get a ration of what they’re throwing at me, knowing that I will never get to wrap my hands around their necks.

In some way, I’m but an executioner for those in charge. I do what they ask of me and only shake my head when asked to. I am a tool and nothing more. I know I’m doing something right, I’d like to think of that.’

‘You’re a vigilante.’

‘We’re way past that. There’s a circle, there’s a throat. I’m doing this because I know.’

‘And what if others knew as well? ‘

‘I’m certain that everyone knows this by know, but I am not in strength, nor in power to do any of that. I told you as much, I’m useless, it’s pointless, and I don’t know where I’m going after knowing.’

‘What if you were to forget about everything then? A blank sheet, just think about it, you’d never have to raise a finger after a while. You could simply making it, less inclined to worry about forcing your hand.’

‘You’d know that, wouldn’t you?’

Twenty days ahead, he thought, years passed, evenly in his mind. Always the same outcome, there’s no way to win, there’s no way through, always in the same place. Always the same conclusions, he’d reach them and he would stop. There’s no eloquence in the way they act, but someone on the lower scale, he’d have to fall yet again. Most of them kindly looking, always normal, on shooting block, they’d be scarce. There’s but little reason to ask of it yet. Whose pulling all strings and who’s behind them, always please to wrap a smaller fish.

‘The pond is filled with them. Everyone knows and everyone who’s rose through every account and every piece of evidence, whether or not you’d like them.’

‘Where was the last man you’ve wrapped your hands around sent to?’

‘On a bridge, on the ledge, on top of a building, a wild stretch with a hollow spot, you name it so. They’re always promised the same kind of treatment I’m willing to move on with.’

‘And why aren’t you giving them a chance to turn themselves in?’

‘It’s clear they’d get out just as quickly as I were inclined to think, you simply know their type and how they mind themselves being surrounded by similar people, all the usual names as well. No need for eloquence but a sly hand, a silver tongue and they will walk freely again. You must know how it works now. There’s no verbiage and no end to it, they’re always getting away, regardless of how you look at them.’

Always of a mind, stalked one during the night, tried doing it in the open. Stopped and beaten in outdoors, as the splashes moved on. How many of them had done it before caught? How many more for every moment that passed? It was part of everything and fortune tied in, as well as their prolific nature tied into their connection fallacy.

‘There’s here, they’re there, with them, protected. They know what to hear and what to say, when to play cool and when to feed in what they’ve been fed with since they joined their industries.’

‘Always?’

‘Everywhere on all accounts, they’re shared and passed around.’

Another issue, after a while, no longer would one become as docile as to wane away. Or stay too long as if to waste and stay. There were plenty of stops, and reasons to fall. There were close calls when one might think of wrongly placing, just a tiny set of pictures wasting. Only but a plant, framed, just so he could stay amongst them; but not when they were aware, how useful he could be if stayed, as he would do to punish. Make sure everyone and just about the place, vanished.

There were other walks and similar places, and vibrantly similar behaviors that only appeared to tie in. Always of a mind, asking, never delivered a letter and never got one.

‘I’ve been through Europe, amongst the States, throughout Asia as well as South and East of Africa, it’s never the same, but always remains.’

‘You’re not telling me much.’

‘I am. They act the same. It may appear as if they shake hands and discuss behind your back but that’s not so, it’s simply not so.

I don’t think it’s man alone, but something else pushing him to do so. And I can’t point it in any direction, but I know that’s it. He’s not ill, he’s never ill, but acting on a similar accord. Perhaps some people do worse cooperating, as I can’t see any reason and can spare no possible explanation for what’s going on.’

‘What are you going to do after we’re done?’

‘I’ll head back home, alone with my gun.’

‘I cannot let you go then.’

‘You will because here everything. I resign knowing there’s no other copy out there, and you would happen to be aware of that as well. I’ve been tracked, watched, and although I may appear as if I am paranoid, I’ve been documenting them for the longest while. Every picture and every frame is there. As you will be able to see, everything’s been well documented.

Certainly there won’t be any complain any longer. I long to keep on going but I’m tired knowing what I’ll do would only compliment them instead of doing what I ought to.’

‘How do you know I won’t simply burn the evidence?’

‘I know it so, it’s been planned long before you were in the employ. I think my life just like theirs and everything else has always been, as they say, in hand beyond ours.

We were never in control.'

'The door was never locked. You could've walked at any point out. And you can still grab everything.'

'Not afraid of being recorded? I would've definitely liked you so. But I'm afraid I'm going to leave no, without offence, my time is thin now.'

He left, just as he came.

There was no one who heard anything about the man or his whereabouts, no account of what he's lived or done and no relatives he might be inclined to speak about. Can't do the right thing, there's no such thing where men go.

Odd Place

It was a peculiar thing being there for a long period of time.

'I can't forget it any longer. At least I know, at least I have a reason not to forget, at least I have a reason to understand.'

Rampant voice caught in a pair of mechanical-looking yet made of weird animal-like fat tissue.

He came out of nowhere, looked normal at first, until he noticed the building-sized half head of a deformed Microcephalic-looking filth which was attached to his body, chambered eyed as well as long half a tube-mouth that was attached to nothing in particular. As a matter of fact, the body appeared to be dead whilst being dragged along, while the Half-side seemed rotten.

They worshipped it

All of the while, they feared its approach. The city lay still during the rain. Its shacks but gothic looking castle pillbug-shaped, but melted black-wax, green-grayish with each bolt of light.

There was but something left and largely loathsome, as life hid.

For all but stood where nothing shook upon but a block of iron. Widely stretched, un-floating but kept above the air. On top reflections, without protection, it stood above buildings inverse. Yet the circle stood uncannily, without a shadow to insatiate.

Grain taken and dragged along, a few of them seemed flat.

A leap from above, the fall; ever-encompassing around the area, where a crater of dust stood beneath it, whereas nowhere near could it be seen this way, the sight of a moon on earth turned to a dark gray. Beneath it kept by the rising pedestal of iron, keeping it still. All the murky water drawn in as to be slowly delivered through the grates and the impetuous metal depths that lead beneath the ground. Moisture was benign but thirst was yet to come for the growing suckers trapped inside.

They hid beneath and would sink beneath otherwise. Streets lay exposed; little to no one came out. There were plenty of other riders who made it everywhere around. Standing still as they would ask of it, then and there, hidden beneath retractable pill-shaped roofs, but one stranger came too quickly yet approached. His mild looking face was benign and twisted, he wore a coat. Like everyone else around him, ever thinking of what might happen if he were to be caught. A murky ripples all across every brick that lay around seemed to be, without a reason, he went forth, always asking.

‘Who’s going to take care of us there?’

Who’ll inherit the place if we leave or stay our hands?’

There was as much that he didn’t know. Each drop only made the floor and ever since a few years standing, a few inches protruding and always counting themselves over, always dragging aside. There were fewer men that had survived since the calling and they could but abide.

‘I hear what you say. I wager. We need to make it to the highest corners and hid though but entranced by the Leigher.’

He came out of nowhere and could freely walk on streets despite the sunken things they threw around. Not even the rocks they threw stood there for long, even the lights from the lamps were somewhat repressed and could do without. There was as much as it could. No one asked, and none to see.

He came out of his way, the Leigher, whom was but anything if a stranger to their ways.

A small bag, erupted from his scalped fingers and the knuckle-dames came through. Though they bore around their collar-bones small x’s, breathing in and out, around squared, tiny buttons that pushed inside, none could be believed to have made it through in part. They were but asking around whom might fathom taking them out.

‘Do not approach, I haven’t come here for you, to take or claim you home.

I may speak but with a man and one alone, I say.’

He pulled out but a small device, a fruit-thing, wrapped in chitin, long as an arm, with the same texture of the pillbug that wrapped everything around. Somehow like a rifle, acted, but no shot after being pressed, enacted as it did, but a small pool which floated and fell within his touch. What he pulled from beneath him raised itself like a stand upon the like of whom they looked. Black-glass, skin craves. The head of a man on top of it as well. From beneath, as if from a pool, the body came out and with a swoon hugged the pillar which stole his way. It was sparse, nothing remained. There was but one thing they shoved and dead. Likely as it were, he would not leave him be, there was something filthy about it, for all to see and watch aside. Useless drops became spirals sometimes in the air, tiny black holes which drew in everything and would’ve been unfairly pushed through the lay.

‘Here, I brought you the bugs, these should keep you of a mind.’

‘What do you want in exchange?’

‘I want but to spend the night.’

‘Then enter and behave.’

He came with a strange glow, from his chest, he pulled, as the likes of a globe. Green tainted from the likes of his, he pulled it aside and would not see anything else, eye to eye. A normal place. He embrace the vileness that was encased in every wall and every object there, if there was anything at all he’d touch upon. It was the broken feet they all bore. Worn-out shoes that cracked and pushed towards their legs and everywhere their bodies crept. At time so weary as to move like slugs, or fat-snakes that could not move or set aside what they were doing. Always foaming out below, he ordered but a liquor.

‘It’s made out of the leaves, have fallen, from what seems to be the shallowness that lay in air.’

Farther in the distance, a spruce of which darkness would fade, with every leave but to be encompassed, and kept behind the practice saying. It was all too quarrelsome, trying to bite on it. As they were smashing through the most uncanny lashes that were pulled through, little as it were but the shimmering lure.

A man had droned around the place, he ran and leap towards the street, embraced by it. Soon he faded, as in a river fading and dragged below. One could see the skin turn as hallow as the colors of the bricks, broken apart, piece by piece as he was eaten.

They were merely being kept floating but the structures beneath them.

Although unknown, better for them as if should shatter any bond between, this mirror of solid depended on the circle that it may be kept still. Though the uncanny be contained within and never touch as if to break what kept them floating. It was simply something they could not stare, and wouldn’t dare look away from. Some kind of desire that was delirious. To see them grasp and move about. Mockery in disgust, disturbingly set aside. There was something in their eyes as well, as one could tell from dark embers that had been engulfed into beady pearls of cats.

‘We’ve brought you a lantern, Leigher. Good stay, good stay.’

For he hadn’t know what to expect either, just as his heart was along the way, put through each change, and wager, of which belt might wrap him in. It was ever harder not knowing what was missed, or even if they were real within the constant, or just a false mirror that floated within. No bird flew, just as well as none could reach the heights. Thenceforth it was little more than some wonderment, whether or not one were to see it in disgust.

Flowers blooming, blossoms of chrome, there lay but a symphony down there that could never be known.

Why, the look?

Of whom shook below as if melted? There lay frames, indicted and put on top, many of which were like cheese-gifted on as they had put aside any boundary they wore, until they formed utmost unnatural forms.

Malignantly they danced forlorn, always of something, worn out for gore. They started appearing after a while, uncouth as they could not for the likes of them help themselves.

Tail whacking, suited pet, bumped its head against a wall down there.

A group of Imitations going, one of them signing, singing, singing:

‘Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee,

Dee degoo de de daa dee.’

The dog is retarded. He kept humming. Drowned, less inclined to look about it now, they followed through, making sure to pin the dog down and see it through.

‘Put the dog down.’

‘I can’t see it, I can only hear it bark.’

Going around it in circles while no one was focusing on it, in part, someone got a paw, ripped apart, they got it through.

‘This but another one of us we’ve broken and tore apart.’

‘Indeed it is, I feel him so, but he was silent all the way we went through his body.’

Lo’

Still yet to sound humane and move around from interacting as they’d save, tiny fingers cut off, little

Rain drops, set outside, on a watercolor sky painted as a poor imitation of William Turner’s ‘Fishermen at Sea.’

Most buildings set away, they were but protected from the drops of which little lay would prevent them from falling off.

Leigher’s back looked like a hunchback’s trebuchet shaped formation of bones and skin with every gap in-between while the beam was attached to the back of his head and the two-stringed sling covered both of his eyes instead. They were set on trying to figure him out for some reason. It wasn’t there, it could never be there.

‘Stay the night and get some more.’

‘I won’t, I’m leaving the first. It’s too rubbery, I want another stake.’

‘We only have so many of them along the line, we fish the meat from the puddles, you know that?’

‘Of course I do. And you will do as I say until I’m pleased. Go on with it now.’

He didn’t have to repeat it. An hour gone, his pay was done, then around the streets. Absolutely no one could understand how he’s done it. Always in-between the steps, on the bricks and everywhere as well.

It was to be expected, he’d live through everything, the flask-shaped ship, of which anchors fell, across the heap of brick mounds arrived in the dead of night. Past a certain level, in the reflection one could see it for what it were and just exactly where it pushed the curl of the turning. And it slacked, through the mass, they cruelly at what appeared to be the dead wreckage points in air, of which puffs not even the freighters could maintain.

From the upheaval came membrane, and whence it stood they could convey but quiet. Some had followed, others stood, while they shouldn’t, some would intrude but around the coffers.

Jhonngundr and Ploy, Skintr, Pleggn, Rrhite and Ammrh were but the first to land on top the roofs, of which looks were but plain, some raincoats had still remained for their likes never left what appeared the sane touch, and no one laughed or called upon the sight.

‘We’ve run our due and gotten through.’

Ploy was the one, whom followed all in small basins, youthful but in silks or red blossom underneath the rain protector. Even he feared for the watch was set against each drop. They’d know very much likely, where the water ended and when the stoppers only came so.

‘I think we need to look behind, I see the line of drops, askew.’

Man of little words he were, he largely observed, as much as it were obscure, of little mind heeded.

The drops would drop as heavy as they would be sacks, and plainly pushing through the streets at last, going deeper as to fall, always pushing until there, in the middle of the rack they’d join the strange structure. Hollow inside, the buildings that lay mirrored both against the circle and against the strange platform upon which the pillbug-gothic stood.

Inside of them but straw-like protrusions guided all the water down. Although it could barely be seen, again, when looked upon, by the time it had reach the circle, it would’ve already began to form to steam. Heeded onto but never thinned by what came after it. There they lay, much deranged, never looked at, back again.

Rain drops scourging the place. Falling, dropped along the clouds, as they carried on, pushing through, hardened by the likes of it, in a scene, all of the crew men fell to their knees, parts missing, bleeding, one of them should’ve known better than that. Than to step outside, where it was more dangerous than breathing through this unfathomable acre of pain. Alpine-looking without the reins, worsened than the likes of acid rains, the fall began.

More so, Pleggn was the only man who survived so, looking at other men as they were disemboweled, soap-men kneeling, lost of gray. Where rosary-colored entrails became darkened as they bounced between the domes between the floored cranes. Between each building fell a man, but only he remained, as he tripped and almost lost his feet upon the streets. Falling upon a web-looking side, many placed surroundings, almost wrought to be placed in mind. Of what was going there, only a blimp would've been seen as to be aware.

Leigher was there as well, as he arrived. He saw the man grasped in it and almost float to the side as if not to have fallen through. He made it, but missed but a cue, all to ask. Too much so, he would've missed another step and gotten himself rid off without even fathoming but a return to the place he had been rid.

‘Why have you come here?’

‘The whip had fallen on my back, I’m but lost and a coward for cordiality.

My hands are dirty, and I’ve become but another man that’s trapped.’

‘Follow me then, I think I know of some way you might still get through without being lost and without daring to be put to suffer.’

‘I shall prove myself of great use.’

‘We’ll just have to see, won’t we?’

And that much had been settled as much as he could not complain. He was of little reins and walked but thoroughly with Pleggn on his back, a smaller version of the web inclined, of the junks that made it. Pipes and screws and bolts still the weight of a feather-light. The man simply grabbed and held, seeing how the cartilages were but something else, left for him alone to grasp on. There was no possible way for him to complain any longer since he had but barely touched on it as well.

‘Break the glass and enter it.’

Not abandoned, but a short family lived through, sutured below their ankles, where they cut and managed to rip off a few centimeters off their legs, but seeing how they were eating, busily aware, this would be allowed for now. And naught and lesser, not to be inclined to ask. Always a few feet standing, they approached at last and asked the man.

‘Where you come from?’

‘That would be a bother such as you’d never understand.

I’m here now aren’t I?’

‘But you broke through and you’ve intruded upon us and upon our own.’

He pointed at their family pet, which was a king in his right. Delightedly but a piece of stolen Basil-plate, a pantomime which made out little metals put aside and sculpted, made to put everything through, and put them to the side as to listen to what was going on. All too skinny-looking, thinned after it. Bloody mouths which tried to eat metal when all other provisions ran by.

‘Is this the life inside nowadays?’

‘You’re but trying to get by with what you can?’

‘Some of us tried digging in, look. A hole, there’s a great fall below but I doubt any of us could make it. And there’s the spear-heads below just in case something might happen. In that case I can only fear what might come of my body if I were to be impaled down there.’

‘Then do not fall.’

They wished to stall, but seeing how time had passed, there were men outside, after a manner, all walking freely, recounting days they spent after, youthful, when it still became of them.

‘Long have I stood out there and walked.’

Below, they still lived out, or in, or were still shut. It was hard to tell. But up here, they were but bastardly put onto the rain, trying to keep everything on one side while the other was still trying them. As much as they would know, there was nowhere near as much wind as now came, when there was a reason to hope so. Many men wore but tight clothes which grew with them, battling to grow even fatter, yonder as they made it so. Most of them eat but the meat that was hid inside the bricks, which was only connected, after the stories they shoved, between each other, to a great flying creature whose back was ever stronger, as it reached every stone. For every brick was trying to eat for its own and carry, as much of the cemetery they had become, trying to grasp at it as it suffered.

‘Oh, I see it now.’

But they didn’t know. There was no meat growing and no dirt but those of theirs, what they were eating ever after, were those who did not make it, then. A few more years passed and only one who was incredibly deranged would finally pass an eye at the surroundings. It was there, hidden in plain sight, always doing what they were not inclined to believe, or even worse, they could not see it. But the shapes of the buildings changed, sometimes moved and sometimes they could not find themselves anywhere. Many disappeared in the nights, but at least they would, for the likes of them survive.

Though as Leigher touched, but the shoulder of the watch, he saw that the man was nowhere near, not so much. He was almost a phantom, or a relic from the past.

‘I ought to have known better than to have settled here.’

Yet he turned and yearned to look. And there was not a mirror, or a glass plane that hadn’t been smashed by him, either way. There would be, possibly no return to where he came from. No certainty of a future that could last. He feared but what the future promised to bring him, or what came at last.

‘The rain will eventually destroy this place.’

Below the level.

‘The mold and dreams will eventually have the living quarters decay.’

Even the boilers were incapable of preventing it from growing in the moisture, despite their endlessness and the endurance they displayed. There was something uncanny and something just as forlorn as it looked like. No way to return to how things used to be. No more touching and no more feeling, but there.

A broken lock and a Woman-Head whose brought but many white rats along the way.

Pesticide had made it through, incapable of seeing, as a square-line was missing off his face, while put through so much abuse, he was but a rounded thing, a fat as to the likes of which, he could not help it any longer but be brought to knees and felt as it never to be, but put in place. Another disgrace that had emerged in a way it would've been done with.

It was all relative, just like a disease. Trying to settle down, how he pleased.

Blinded, now, as he emerged, there was no way to track him down, in verse. For he walked like an uncanny thing. Unable to set forth, of no better sink than what lay down; they were surrounded but would not be touched by any mean. Not to get out of the way.

The Imitations gathered but only felt something move ahead. Sometimes they heard, other times they only listened, some would stare, despite a lack of eyes being there. But most importantly, they despaired. As little of them knew what it meant to act human. It was settled that they would observe, somewhat shocked, if that was in their nature, of what was worth to see. And what else to be? If not looked upon and carried away. Archer or not, but a man, who felt like it, as ill-inclined to be both ways, such a liar, but whom saw it fit. Unable to adhere to any kind of retrospective, whom found himself limping around each edge of grass, there was none there, but it felt natural.

As a man followed a beast whom would not struggle, allowing him simply to move at his own pace, knowing there would be no way to drag it in. No bow extended, but a few arms held on a long shafted arrow-head, somehow forcing himself to bleed. To feel it gain, and make it seem as if he'd wreathe again, when it could not be helped. That's what life was about.

Seeing that life fade through; each step was but wasted. Tiny fingers, long detested stopped moving, curling instead, dragging on the front-walk, endangered as any species would. Pushing through a pile of Imitations, whom attempted to act so.

'My dear good friend but where you're going? I think we were talking about our game on top of a drink.'

'But I'm but here and you have lost me.'

'You seriously underestimate what's wrong with me.'

'How could I be wrong today, it's Saturday.'

And they kept on nonsensically, until one of them decided it was about the rightful time to stop this aberration which was their mouths. They still followed, by some kind of atrocious thing, repeating after a while.

'I'm gonna go along the way.'

'I'm gonna go along the way and follow.'

But the Archer felt it in his soul, there would be no tomorrow for either of them. Both being inclined to set themselves to despair down. Long-secluded and after a while, saddened, by nothing else and nothing other than this life, which was unfathomably shallow. Even pain had hurt him too softly, right around his heart. There was nothing forcing him to move along, other than convenience and the thought of doing this so. It was, as a matter of fact, a somewhat close to be, useless stalk. He did not feel it, all blind but always stuck by it.

‘This is what my ancestors used to do.

Always stalking their pray, always one foot behind another, in an attempt to get their way in. But now that I’m here again. ‘

Many a foot had sunken through, only to follow where they shouldn’t have, been struck and stuck through. Her head was but a mile on, yet still could hear, every lie on top the slightly hints of dark cockroaches and bat-fragments she would spat behind. Time and time again, never asking; always masked by something that got nearer to him.

‘I’ll only ask this then. Allow me to have a cut, I’ve never done this before.’

White rats.

‘I think I’m going to enjoy this.’

Followed through.

But he refused to make so much so, ever so clear a noise. It was all too shallow, seeing the emptiness contort. Mold was nowhere to be seen but he was a man of his own, whom suffered less than he should’ve, always taken for a fool. Always beaten and put through so much.

There was no doubt, of such incompetence.

‘You grabbed him the wrong way. If you let go of him now, he will simply escape.

A strange thing, as it were, near the Archer came a Skin-Frame. It looked down on the man as if there was nothing shared and nothing else to say between the two of them. For what was fair, and what came then, with little to no doubt to it, there was but no reaction.

Only freckles on the sky, but holes. Rain never made it this far and they could never be soaked in no fire or no kind of mirth.

‘I see.

What do you want from me?’

‘Let him be.

It’s pointless getting through with it. I know it too.’

‘What then?’

‘There’s still a chamber blocked, somewhere, down there, I can hear it.’

And they listened, as they walked.

Small pebbles, almost too busily left so.

They but followed. Them but through.

‘It’s down there?’

‘A few more steps down the way.’

Guided the Skin-Frame towards the batch of meat, which encrusted its own corner.

It should’ve served kindly enough as some kind of reminder that things had to move, whether they were cogs or fingers or most peculiar terms that entered his head. He called them, after some fashion, weirdly deranged contrasts between what he wanted to do and whom he wanted to strangle. They were out of it in some manner, always floating through the malady inside his head. Always pondering.

‘What have I done to the Rat?’

The Skin-Frame stopped, the Woman-Head approached. Both of which were just as inclined to pay attention to his as they were, set aside and put through, always listening and being there as well. There was no way to make it seem like they were walking.

No one Folds in these Halls

Not the likes, the carpets were nice, as were the barrels, with everything thoroughly made, reclined inside every hall and just about every spot inside. Too thorough, all that the servants were doing were standing. A hundred of them, in every room, carefully placed inside the Hall, they’d seethe, trying to foam and bring about the coming of the lost-rain. It was so peaceful, living there. Pleasant even, trying to drink while asking them.

‘Get back to work.’

The Landgrave said so. He was of a piece to ask them to be flayed for disobeying his orders, as he walked. Rightfully along with a butcher’s pin, and sunk within the first neck he’d ask of them.

‘Do you enjoy? Have I made myself be known and pleased?’

But such a tease as he were, he could not help it. Every room had to be checked and everyone inside had to be yelled for and asked for some kind of response. They were of a kind that should not be kept in mind or messed with for long. All men, to the lowest servant, in his peculiar hen bore royal blood in his veins, with no exception. He could simply not overdo it for more than a few reasons, that being. He could be visited if he had. Spilt too much blood and he would lick his lips, something he did not account for.

Ever going there, he was looked at.

He was inclined to believe that one of the servants turned on him, just then. As peculiar as this seemed, there in his house, too many walls were of a crimson-pink and blue diseased ilk which stretched as they took the draperies away. It was all too hardened on his poor heart to know. He was too inclined to think he did it so out of spite.

‘You know I can tell whether or not you’re all pretending, right?’

Dead faces, too many concussions were known to him. After the physicians had told him so, he would be more than aware of what went through, under the watch. If only he had made another cut, he could confirm it. But that was enough, too many of them turned. He didn’t know how to show it to her.

‘Lady, dear lady, I have called upon you with the help of a pigeon of my own hand, I wrapped the message, done myself.

But know this, as it shall not be the last of me that you shall hear. I fear that I am very much forlorn, I fear they will get me to turn around.

I don’t fancy much in this world but I need to know what’s going on.

I’ve eaten of joints and cut the lower groins, but nothing. I fear. There might come a time near where I won’t have a due, they’ll be coming after you if they’re done endearing me so. I do not know what I want.

But there I was.’

There and here, lower sides of my hold, where I hold the dear pantry with servants call upon the wine. I feel their side, I call upon the direst hours, when I may be listened to. They hold me company no longer, I stand and lean aside on top of their frozen bodies, lain upon them, waiting. Neither speak, nor move mouth, but I hear about it, every night. A voice not whispers, but dire approach. I am but waiting to confirm.

‘He moved, dear Lady, he moved.’

And he wanted all to be the same. All clean and barely placed, as much as stone and torches lain, the hold was widely spread. He wanted to run and scream and shout, but never minded of whom might be around to find him there. Of brooms and cleaning stacks, and tools, of heathens touching every star, he but dreamed of a forest paradise to lay. Somewhere past his servants waiting as well, once he’d thought about the fire.

All written under ink, and sired.

‘I have no sons and have considered taking their lives.

Fire should but claim my hold, if I cannot be listened to, nor would I be called for to do as I’m told and said after the matter. My blood but years to be release from what I recall, being called, the latter.

As she will have arrived, I will have lowered the bridge.’

Pan upon in, looked and winced. It was ever such a curious thing, just being there, harnessing but a wheel, as one would dare to look the chains years another way. To be called upon.

I shall be absolved of all sin thence.

Enter thee, into my fortress called.

Enter thee, the Lady called.

‘I have listened to your claim and have come to see it for myself for what remains in there, I’m little known to it.’

‘I see.’

He welcomed her, as she almost lay abashed. From whence she looked, there was but little a while she could come to mind and ask what went on, as it was plain to see.

Of pond, there was a well. Of court, there was but empty. Of men there were just many standing, but still no answered, moved but forth. Kitchens were plain, cisterns of boils, a chapel empty and a ‘donjon’, uppers keeps and food stored, in plain of keys and many more. Many great halls interconnected, all dissected but a few would dare to look after. For what seemed to be a great while yonder. There came none.

The Lady was but a sag.

‘Since when have they come to be this way?’

‘But listen, but listen, come and see, come and see.

There’s nothing wrong with me, oh Lady, oh Lady, you’re but of a horn.’

He seethed, as the lady recounted, her likes dressed like a whore, Chamberlain’s daughter, a Harlot. Of fire rose and her spilt froze, upon seeing but the turn. Her hands but put, and she but shook upon wondering.

‘What had happened to him?’

‘I do not know, I do not claim to, but he turned, of all. He turned to see me.’

And as if recalled, but another one, in mounted shaped, as if hardened by the stay, had come to, a cozy hall but with the fire; Landgrave and the Lady sitting on the spot.

Late at night, especially under candle light, they waited. Though there was little left to share between the two of them, both knew what to expect and what might happen, just when to look and out withdrawn to them. And their alike.

‘There’s that and that, and that. I know I saw it.’

‘You’re dreaming again, in the night.’

‘What else ought a man to do during such a prestigious time, if not dream of a time where he’s being yearned for and turned about as he is made.

A mockery of his gaze, there, there, look, he moved again.’

As he had pointed long after and long before. There was no shortage of which he should know or be made aware off, as it was merely there after a while, always making it benign. Always there, and always turning. During nights where the candles blowing, by themselves, he didn’t know how to explain that, as by to no means could he be certain of what happened. Again, it moved again and at every hour of the night he woke her up again. Only to ask the Lady, in bed up-turned.

‘Have you seen him move now? I swear I have, I could wager the likes of my very throne on it.’

‘Then stay awoken and face madness to no end until you’ll have been gotten rid of. I’m telling you, either this is a foul thing they play of thee, or you are face by a mental malady.’

Sunken as his eyes became, he did not dare question her, for more.

Plain it were but cut around. He turned her shoulder, her head was gone. But stretched around the ceiling watching.

Asked of her but just in doubt, watching.

‘Wretch, now you see all servants in my room, tell me, which one of them shook and who’s the culprit who’s still making a mockery of me while moving? I know it to be so. And he knows that I know, I expect it to be so.’

But her lips were but as ill inclined. Largely benign, rubbery and sealed. She was but like a sink-wallet, made of skin, opening her mouth as she would release all of the eel-lengthy fat-baboon pieces that had filled the room. Bloodied as they were they but splashed the walls as well as the strange swoon everyone was in that day. They were still a long way from showing any kind of emotion as well. All to set on eating but never moving.

Today.

Landgrave was but sealed in hay. Standing nowhere else but watching, trying his hands but always rancid, he could not expect, for the likes of him. It was his bones, hinder, where he stood, pastry-kitchen all but swoon in, lunged about as he ate it raw. Too many days had passed without him thinking or let alone consider what might’ve happened if he was near and he stood and chanced.

‘But whom about oh, be damned, why is this to happen? And where am I?’

He wasn’t mad but thinking of the life. Of nefarious vileness that came about, what will I do if they recede and rot? Whom shall I hire and cover the loss?

And thence and ever in-between he thought of what would be, the most important thing. Not to allow, or let lay. Not to make his blood get spilt and let flow along the way.

‘I cannot let ruin fall upon the royal blood, it must be gone. Either or, it shall be mine, or wasted before my time has come.’

Thence he grabbed but a long stretch a blade, a knife whose edge but begged to be used just so he could take a huge gander off his soul and take it. Not to be mistaken with what his heart would tell. He wanted but to take it through and miss his thought and come about her. Oh, please, oh please, oh please.

‘Lady, answer, I can see it so.

I’ve made all preparations so it would snow around the room with blood, not that of yours, be gone. But I need to know, has he turned yet?’

‘I do not know.’

‘Finally spoken, oh sweet embrace. Tell me yet again, has he stood still but at every moment and each time?’

I say.

‘Please oh lady, satisfy, whatever you may be inclined to think.’

But he had realized, though it may’ve become quite late enough, he knew it to be so. Her body stood in the same way as theirs had, without an exception to be known. And latter, as they wasted, they tasted through food like baboons. He but lifted but a limb at a time for her, making sure she knew.

‘All the while I ought to have known, you’ve got a taste for meat and a butcher’s feet and son would grow.’

For there, in the back, inside the walls it was so. He head had become a giant block of meat, not to be seen which drew in the back as if it was but a cut through blimp, drooling liquid filth into the body of a child, hardened. Both deformed and never watched as he was being kept and prevented from falling into the lowest corner he could be abandoned and put through, as the defecation would disturb her not. She was one to watch others rotting. Desperate in some young a days.

But never such a thing had she lay aside.

As standing in the same frozen manner like the servants, knowing.

‘You’ve done something to me just then.’

‘I couldn’t help it, I know you’re the daughter of a Chamberlain, you would’ve invited me to do so in any other possible circumstance and that I know myself, don’t ask.’

‘But you will have felt him by now, if only you watched.’

Sweet distraction, oh what you take of me, he turned. Landgrave but did not know what to expect but there it was standing straight, looking at him, his eyes would glaze with so much as to cower.

‘I am worship, you’re obey.

I claim your soul and you shall stay.'

'I cannot be forced here against my will, not while there is still some stone left for me to chew. If you don't like it, you may as well leave.'

'That I cannot do as I'm well enough inclined to stay. I need to hear where I might may.'

'And who'll help you then?'

'I don't know, I wish I knew but unfortunately, I can't. I'm all so lonesome as I'm but here, stranded, waiting for them to finally come to life and strangle me before my sleep.

Only so I may lay eternally but in this blasted heap.

It's what I want, it's what I need.'

He feared that he should be heard, or that someone might hear.

There was a village nearby by where they salvaged whores. They hanged them on hooks and made them rest rotting outside every door.

'I think I might be inclined to choose, and take what is mine, rightfully, on this truce of ours.'

Indeed, it was hard after a while, just thinking. The man had his throat slit one night, body went missing during one of those delightful trances. He was but split in half and went without a banging clouds and little pebbles being thrown about the place. It was convenient, trying to get him to behave.

A man would come and yearn for more, always trying to get himself off.

'I have been hiding in this chamber for years. Now I yearn release.'

He said.

Now that Landgrave was dead in thought, in spirit while his body could not do, the man took over. He had lived on little rats.

And acted on the backs of filtered bats which were but eaten through dust-mice in the air. On little timers always blinded, sanitary motions were but taken from them, it could not be. And all the while, they were put through so much abuse, as one to see that they were unable to control. The moments were but their own, yet not even he could answer the question.

'What happened here?'

He ventured forth and asked. As there was but little he could do to yolk and blast upon the cast that was left behind.

The Lady entertained the Wall-Brat, as he ought to have been called because of his dire youth. Yet he would not be entirely remorseless for what went through was but his fault. Of mind he was but to ask, alas, there was but a need, as he would see it again and again almost at his feet, always there in the distance they were approaching. For some reason they would not just do, without getting through and be waited.

‘But what are you thinking about, you Brat?’

The master of this house may be gone but there are other forces here at work. You may not simply go away and work your hands on here and yonder.

I grow ever strong and soon this fort and every chamber shall belong to none other than the Chamberlain.’

Of whose heart was but as wickedly set as that of his daughter, whom would spend no other second and recede not a finger to the stronger of them both. After all, he was there, between her and that piece of the fallen, brokenly standing chandelier, where his body wasted, but ever asked.

‘What has he done?’

‘Nothing but ask. Why is everyone this way? You seem to be immune, after some fashion only you may know of and only you might know how to repay.’

‘Whom?’

‘The house, for it shall inherit everything, even the life of my father, the Chamberlain. It’s way too clear, as I fear that he shall not be stopped in search, and he shall find me, of verse.

In my current state, of which, if I inquire so, I will be incapable of moving through and let alone my bone shone as was the reason for your coming.’

‘I thought I saw the light and wondered, whether there had been but a fire set, something that would take all and lay claim upon the bodies I saw froze.’

‘I see, but I may not stop thee just as I may not stop my father in his turn.

Know that, you’re trapped and soon you shall love your head or your mind.’

Already a limb was benign, it was ever so clear that the Brat had not only lost his appeal but one of his lower legs disappeared, as for him to stay but on top of one.

There, in that moment it happened again, something not even he could help it anyway. As if on cue but waited and made to be felt, he was unaware of it and would’ve lost it all if it weren’t for the fairness he displayed. On a knee, he begged but statues of spare.

Many turned this time around, and they were but set at sound.

Blue curtains after some fashion and stone that was perfectly cut. There were other things that came apart, and were but made but the rooms were but fashioned for their blood. Even in the suits they bore one could see that they reflected, as to appear as if they were undeterred and would never have appeared, fended, or made to leave, to come apart and so seethe; that much had to have been known. At times, to wonder, when would it show?’

It was hard to look at, even worse, as they were worn out with every step from which they rose. And there were reasons that could be and nothing else to get them after. Or to drag them, and pull them at the sound of reins, a leprous thing had followed their reins as it would seem as if the Chamberlain.

He'd entered no house but a dungeon like that of a chasm. Somehow he was lost himself, unable to dictate where his likes would drag him after the manner, always trying himself wherever he went stronger, in the depths to see, what trap had been, most repulsive. Though who had set it? Hard to know? Since no one moved, it was hard to show and little while. He walked alone and could only hear his daughter.

'Father, oh, father, oh dear father, the Chamberlain. I miss you thus that you may know now that even the servants you brought are now dead.'

And there they lay behind, where he turned, and it couldn't have been worse of a show as he had come to the realization that his heart but froze. To an inch of his life, he almost saw the figure. No gargoyle thing in sight but the formation of a riddle that refused to be set. He could not move them no matter how hard an attempt but followed. Always but a piece unmet and never asked of.

'Where are you, my dear Lady?

Your father beckons you to return to him as soon as you can.

I mourn your passing and I wish you bed, and finely clothed in my house instead.'

Of broken eye he asked for less. He was but wandering now, none to impress and neither asking. Never meeting that one of promise, as she has simply but refused to address the presence of her father.

What he'd Seen Above

Moving through some crowd, shouldn't be that hard at first, seeing how they would come to shine their lights upon their highest peaks and heads and lay of stones. Every brick turned and waiting as they were meant to be pressed in the same way buttons were. Large gray people, all well covered, no face but oculars and all of the reminded us of father.

'Follow through, there's another coat dropping.'

It felt through, a metallic encasing thing which only appeared once every now and then. Then it disappeared after being grabbed by a few despots' trails around. Thrown about the place in the most unnatural manners, like pigeons flying chained, with stomping mouth and chopping their pains off as they ate what they could. The city but a shadow, melted my each drop, yet not in the way of individual ones, but giant ones that were not there or hadn't made it through, or demolition balls, crushing past, and putting past what couldn't be seen inside, whence dark covered all.

In there they lay but no one. And none should live, each had to go after a while and it would not do to go unpleased. Always after a manner and always condescending, the noise would shatter every wait. Of each deranged problem they would have to be put to wait. To wait, to wait, they stood. Children stopped following as they looked at the prints, or the drawn out carpets upon which the signs still felt like they were but missed. All too thorough, looked down, he approached. The master of the night, and with his arrival, there would be none other to pray upon him.

Upon the place he stood, from which no shrine emerged and no petty throne, but his waiting pit from where he seethed for, oh, so very long until someone finally came to watch him.

He was but dressed in rags, but wouldn't matter. Since they were wrought in metal, but ever hallow. What he carried in his back were but other rags, another chance, of crystal wrought in colors lighted. Much delighted as he were, by the presence of youth, he was very much aware that none of them would make it through. They were not there with a purpose but to lay his sight and convey what he had missed when he was but a child himself.

'I claim all whom walk, and past the gate, there will be no paradise, remain!'

The Master spoke to no one in particular but he was but of a part, they looked about and saw no servant. It was just how it ought to be, he was them, he was nothing. And every face upon the children's shone, from the matches they bore was akin to a sub-fashioned soul, something that ought never to be put through sight. They were not alive, or at least never looked as if they ever were. All too distressed, and always aware, reminded, even by their likes. They left too much behind to be called again.

Walked in pain, but the streets were empty after the hour. And whom had stayed and whom remained? There was no point in looking after.

Two brothers, two sisters, all in doubt, they could not help it, but brought, of blur uncanny, what lay there.

He had but yet to greet them and meet where lay. As they were split, of face, conveyed but through the pricks in their cheeks, of what remained of their limbs as well as teeth. Barely could they speak either, yet they watched with most dire eyes while wretched.

The Master came, he but leapt but felt no pain whatsoever and nothing would do him unwell, or as to harm him, as much as he could tell it so.

'I am pained to hear you chose to stay.

Do you not understand that your conviction might as well portray stubbornness than deceit? Do not open your mouth yet child, I know why you came here to begin with. And I shall do everything in my power to harm you so, knowing that you're already broke, it shall be done as well as I can sow.'

It was to him, there and then, not to be called or pushed from anywhere. Some were listening, the workers who had but prevented themselves from heading on the streets. It was an obsession, seeing them through while being incapable of making it, rue. To them was but a play. Many joined and watched, not matches but candles. Too much attention was drawn, and for someone who thought himself to breathe and act as if he were but a living thing, he took his eyes, the globes away.

‘I asked for silence.’

But he himself had yelled. The Master had little patience for anyone, especially since he could not help himself no longer, as he was defiled, he was but of another time, when mankind hid. In caves they’d heed the warnings. Yet to be even mocked by children was something he could not deal with, let alone come to accept. He was but a champion of where they lay. In the darkest throngs where fear lay and waiting, but to know if anyone might make it so through the night.

‘Say, child, why is that you want to live in this manner? Can you not see that the further they come, from yet above and beyond, you shall disappear and last not even the slightest, your home is but the kindest spot of memories, all of which die within a shortened lifespan of grit falling from the sky.’

‘You said yourself Master, how can you yet be so blind, as to yet refuse to understand?’

We’re tied to it, our memories. We’re tied to the one that pleased us for many a year to live in. And what of it if our hearts last, in a place not meant to suffice the cast in your realm of dampness?’

‘Does he truly mean to cast us away?’

The girl but stood beside her brother, while the others looked but like a couple. In an utmost unexpected thing, he’d almost seen as someone that’d think that he could lay it so, to even think that he could, perhaps reveal it, though. Master was but pointlessly bland, his heart was nothing to shriek about, tainted as it were, he grabbed a hold and dragged behind.

‘If you should know what lays everywhere around, see it with your own eyes and don’t complain to me no longer; but to be certain you should look behind. Know your city before you refuse to stand in line.’

What he managed to show them was but a sight of the city neither of them had seen before. It was uncanny, looking but they knew it to be so. Something from another world, all to broken, yet abandoned by likes of which neither of them would’ve thought it to be possibly so. Ever touched or made to fear, of some kind of ill hand or a lost appeal by no man. Everything was lost to them. No birds to sing, no drinks outside by lonesome old spirits past their prime, no men to fight across the country, no children’s lies. The truth was spoken by an utmost uncanny person, that being the Master of the night.

It was always meant to go that way, never to be cherished by any either way.

They did not put on any kind of fight, not likely that any of it would suffice, as all fours, hearts throbbing for there being more could but just stop for a moment, knowing and laying where they shouldn’t.

‘What shall we do now?’

‘Is it too late to leave?’

‘What of our house and what of your friends? You said we would keep them safe.’

‘All will leave one way or another. But stay here and you shall be forgotten.’

With the rest of your memories perishing with you as well, you know that very well, yet you choose to stand and do something you’ll most likely regret. How does that bode with you?

Can you not understand what I'm showing you?'

The Master stood but with a wing, wrought about as if pushed in. Always drawing near like a curtain, taking, something from life itself, but always disappearing in the making of what was wrought around them; that much could just be said. They were merely trying their empty hands, never to touch anything again.

'You'd better run and search for some secluded place in which to hide. I will see that there'll be some kind of compensation past the gates. What do you think of that?

Do you believe we could settle on something like it, perhaps?

A family, the four of you, of what remains, though you may not function again. Although I might not even hold my word as to ensure you will live the pass, I recall.

That the last person who was enthralled enough to make this his home had but perished long before you.'

'What should we do? Stay and we will fade away.'

'There's a chance for us at least out there.'

'Not for me.'

One of the boys had said so, and from the looks of which he had but understood what his chances were and where he stood and simply what would shake of him to make it so. It would not happen anywhere, none to know of what had happened. What his story was and what wrought him to become alike, to a scene of a lost battle, in a war where the tides advanced. Too soon, it was all too soon and it felt likely that his life would swoon away.

The child went out his minds too young. He hadn't even dared to be something of his own, wrought about and made to be.

Before they could follow him, the children had been stopped, and he shoved himself with another curtain, ever presently forlorn. Standing a few feet over them like a tower which could not have shone darker if it tried. He had attempted, if anything to put them back into the like telling.

'He will not make it and children's eyes ought not to watch or think about what might happen.

I could not bear, seethe of despair, for what might happen after.

Strangely unexplainable, after a while, they were but of a mind of their own, twisted and turned as they were made to follow, yet yearned to be set around.

On the other side of the gate, but a few than miles long stray.

It was what counted, best inclined. There were but steps taken along, but a single broaching young but beaten, stepped aside.

'Ah, I see, there were but few things placed around the garden. You had to make sure that every single one of them would have to eat.'

‘I know, I’m aware of the repercussions there, but you must know that I could not help myself. It’s far too obvious.

It’s how they are. I tried setting them all aside but they would simply come popping right in. Something’s happening below the earth.’

‘You may want to rethink it, before you find out something you ought not to.’

‘Perhaps it’s for the better that I may.’

Thence he walked and started digging through. Worst feeling came out of staring at the nails over a long period of time, how their tinted.

Making it past what was left of the plot was hard enough. He recalled looking back on it over once he had made it to the tulips, irises stared intensely at him. Even from the shade, the shape of the eye was grazed and grained. All worsened and little more than should it be called, there were some things popping out, there other things, scents that did not belong there, set in part, descending from the earth itself. Then gone as it taken in the nostrils. Things that were not touched upon and ever-since long put through hands that were worn out on every side of the spear-fence that had them on, largely encased and coated in metal yet always in the same place, trying themselves through.

Without a reason to make any noise, there was also, the standing ghoulish men whom long surrounded every stretch along the way, trying themselves through but to no avail. There was no reason to delay what was going on there as it had been but a matter of time until time would come to drag them down from whence they came from. Out of place, like ancient men, in ways to look at and little more than could be conveyed there, from where, as it happened, a stranger arose, and amongst them he stood as if a rose had cut through the tulips. Yet on the other side, with all of them still inclined and put through to face, what happened. In a matter of a few seconds, they were almost gone by the looks of which. It might just happen yet again.

‘Why have you come here?’

‘I seem to have lost my way again, I’ve come to ask something of you.’

As soon as he could help, it pushed every single ghoulish figure out of the way, immediately realizing that there was no better thing to look at. Standing as they both were, facing one another with little along the way, and a tiny more of hurt, he’d settle, for this scene of disaster would yet to come and move along. It was always here that he wanted to come, though time waned and took away, whatever youth had once taken him, whence to pay his stay delighted. He had but a fire, stomped out of his very lighter.

‘You’ve come here several times already and I’ve always driven you out. Have you not gotten the message yet? Perhaps you’re in need to tire yourself again while waiting?’

‘I’m but inclined to return, but please don’t be as rash as to push me again, as I have made it way too clear, I’ve no intention to make a mockery of your pass. I wish I knew what the reason was for my return.

My advent into your empty hold, but I can see that your house is ancient and dilapidated.

And I've always thought of asking but a stay.'

'You may not be allowed to enter through the gates, none might happen to come along the way. None can be allowed on this side and I think you've known it for a while, although you keep finding yourself in the same place.

I keep seeing the same face that's trying to get something out of me.'

'I want to stay. I want to take care of you and the strange other figure you're housing in during my lay. Is there too much to ask now? Have I been too rash before? There could be something I could ask for more if you were so inclined to answer me.

Where might I go from this point on? Tell me where I want to be so I may be gone from your sight and never be met around the fence, beyond it, surrounded by unspoken figures.'

Whom were just as inclined to wait in silence and do nothing as part of their strange, forbidden game. It was all dark, as well as it could be accounted for, still fallen like everything else, as even the flowers were of a morbid stance unlike no other and they could not be, yet felt aside, or made to grow anywhere else, for it was dangerous out there and even the gardener was aware of it. He'd spoken.

'Then you may be allowed to stay for a night and only for a night, if I might wager, nothing more than that, as I will not be satisfied knowing that something may have gone missing because of you.'

'Oh, but you're but one to show remorse for this kind.

I'm little if not belittled to know that I am of a fealty that shall never take your blind off away.

I am Albert.'

And I am Aldo, then you shall join both of us but you shall not be made aware of her name and nonce shall you be told or see her during your stay.

Not to touch but where they lay, not a single step of gray, but silver stones and stay away from the moldering dirt, I wager you could be swallowed each and ever so sooner than it should be allowed. And I'm inclined to think that you're of an ear that might take away from me each and every fragment that might be recalled. I shall call you when you're needed, but until then.'

Aldo was aware of the dangers that had lain to be, with opening and seeing them seep in, even for the duration of a second as they'd scourge the land. Be too dangerous as to have lain and be pushed to shroud. There was something of their and something to be aware, as he dragged the stranger, nuisance of some kind. He was not blind but inclined to look through a man and see a liar where to stand.

It was somewhat expected of him.

Some strange thing about those who lived amongst mold

They were of a different kind, of little mind, in part of what went on or how might it happen for them to be. It was senseless how every road lead back there, in the boiler room, where an utmost important thing had happened, birth. Of little worth but it signaled the coming of their dirt and of their spread and everything which could come after it when the time had ended and they might please themselves with what came after. A disease of the mind would make one lesser, much less stronger than he ought to be.

Floating everywhere around, particles were being shoved to side by every stream and every sudden puff of steam.

The Bathhouse was not safe. If anything, this was the most deranged spot to be in. As it was clear enough for those that feared. Below it, at the rear of the ground, lay. But a single thing that would convey, utmost peculiarity.

There lay but a monument they built.

A few years, so determined.

Everyone feared going to the land, out of their insatiable anger which would be shared if not destroyed if put to test. There was not enough time any longer as the bravest workers would fear for their lives. What they created, hand in hand, wrought in, was a lie. The foundation of reality, built upon it, stranded upon a shore meant to die.

‘Unnatural it’s what it is. There’s no hope to drag one within or away from it, we must stop this before it’s claimed.’

‘But who might live here and who might stay?’

If we stay in this hall.’

Orange-dust and weird mechanical-compliers that had living citizens wreathed in as they formed the gaps between the stones and the other unused materials that had been thrown around or hope to have been used for some reason, there was little left and little more than necessary to be looked upon. Not only was there no culprit, but what they’ve done there was a built upon which all would fall.

‘Eventually, when enough weight would amass upon these, the structural integrity will make it as to fall apart, and this corner of the world will be dragged down.

There shall be no survivors.’

‘Then let them die, I think It’s only fit that we allow them to take something from themselves and accept the inevitability of what we’ve done for them.’

‘And what have we done for them exactly? I see no reason we can’t admit it already.

We failed them, everyone, for the sake of what?

A lie will not hold the world.’

‘But truth will have it all abandoned, and what’s the point of all the work then if it’s left to die?’

‘There’s still a chance we might rebuilt it or find a way to stabilize everything before someone finds out, isn’t there?’

‘No, there isn’t, I’m afraid that any attempt to mingle with the pre-existing built would only destabilize it further. We are set on it now, there’s no chance we might be able to recreate what we’ve lost. And most importantly, it’s done.

It’s settled and if anyone finds out.’

‘We stand to lose it.’

‘As I’ve said it before.’

‘Wait, wait wait a minute at least, I cannot be the only one who sees reason now, can I?

We cannot gamble with their lives now, it’s beyond reason, it’s senseless, it’s mad, it’s downright criminal.’

‘There’s no other place to go for anyone, the world outside is broken.

Either death comes from above, or it shall drag its subjects below, swallowing all of them before they’re given a chance to spare.’

‘Some could leave and some could stay.’

‘But who would be mad enough to stay afterwards? And what of the parties that head out? What of them? DO you think something as hard as finding a new zone that could hold millions of people in just lays somewhere thrown around?’

‘The old towns, they’re still out there.’

‘Largely contaminated at the very least.’

‘As if this place isn’t.’

‘As if we’re not. I think we all know where we’re headed here, aren’t we?

I think It’s clear that we must set something off, in order to cut some of the losses.’

‘What have you in mind then?’

‘What if we don’t want them to survive? Think about it for a while.

Simply think about it. If we were to somehow, plan the fall, we could move the weight in one direction.’

‘You idiot, that’s not how it works, that’s not even close, don’t you understand?

It’s a domino effect that shall affect every existing corner until nothing will be left standing. There is definitely no such thing as any hope left for it. Either we come out with the truth or the entire circle will be buried beneath a hollow black spot. A pit that shall never be touched upon after, it will all be destroyed upon a graveyard made by our own.'

'Then what do you want us to do?'

'We could spare a while and.

We could.'

'It's pointless, let them die, eventually we'll all have to deal with it.'

'Or we could march on while there's still time. After all, the amount of weight that should suffice for everything to be dragged below the earth is nigh-indeterminable. It shouldn't happen within our lifetime.'

'But there's still time to save the future generations if we try it hard enough. We could only spare so much and hope in the meantime.'

A wheel of cold

Outside the city burnt. There lay the remains and little dead, sitting entrails. It was a nuisance, trying to keep everything in before being bastardly thrown away. Standing there, upon the sight of the fire were but a few children, whom had started it.

A man dressed in cardboard and various bushes appeared to have taken a liking to fashioning small spears out of branches, drenched in them. Should've known better.

'I have repaid my debt.'

He spoke to his old man, who looked back from atop his horde den, the small grotto that was being fused to all the riders and the peculiar horse-line he was on top. While looking behind he realized how much of an ill-soul his son had become.

'Tell me this, son, why have you done it?'

'You asked me to seek the culprit, of rue.'

'But I have not called upon you to take the lives of the innocent.'

'Yet I had to come through somehow, father. You know there was no other way. Leaving them so.'

'I do not care, you're banished from this point on.'

Thence he walked into the dark entrails, their bastardly men-formed upon the seats of wood had shone lights out of the lanterns implanted in their brains. A briar he walked upon, then was asked.

'Leave or toll.'

‘I shall stay.’

With yellow blood coming from atop, and red from below, the others refused to talk or admit him in the rue. Cruel thing he was, by some uncanny way, he couldn’t understand what entered his mind then.

‘I wish I understood what’s going on, there’s a cloud of darkness in my mind now, which is made of spiders.’

Their greatest crowd, of the arachnid, was but a kingdom in his skull, where both lobes were at war, constant disease and planet shaped eggs, but darkened as dirt, unable to rise from the depths in which they suddenly receded. There was something him, but a pin. He managed to be blind-sight as the Vile-man-culprit appeared, with a bat of nails.

Battered away, barfed, with snails there being. He was washed away after. So many oaks were last, after the man had risen from their thrones and cast him. To go quiet and lesser. For his betters knew better than to listen to what he had to say. Marks of gray, he had painted but every trail. They followed and knew where he’d go.

At least the spiders were drowned. But he, lost. Look upon a shroud and came in to find something out there. Where a beacon might be, prayed upon it, he might see something, even if he could hope it. But unspoken, there were strange. Too many of them, webs, across each lay of eye, serpentine, the sounds of owls. Whichever followed after would’ve found a dead end, past the shroud.

Into a deep ravine at the cost of following in, but smokes stopped coming out. In cold, but he had sutured, clouds, feeling no longer cold, but a warmth that was not his wont. To do and waste, it should remain. As clear as he might say.

His father had taken him in after hard years, within. Tined with steps that were, be. And he had not known what to see in his turn.

‘I know that you’re old, but I cannot find a better one.’

More than enough remained, and more letters he painted in darks and grays, until the time had come to burn, and hurry he alerted them in turn. Their hunt and trail had but no end. He knew them after a while, and what he spared. Nowhere to lay and not to think, he had but saw no reason in.

Entered the lay and wait there, without a say. He had been uncovered, taken through. Left there, now in through.

Other men were just as stolid, and would’ve felt it, after rabid. Always hunted and as if to know themselves, they shone. Upon them, in which they hid, right before the snow. Other village youth had but to bring but dirt and root, always thawing there, in part. Where it happened for them to look into, fell apart. No breaths out-going but those of cold. Peered after, called in, home.

Warmth had settled, long were days. Upon a poignant mid-summer to look after, none could stay, or satiate the going. Upon the lays of walls, and prays. They had but stood the nights, out in lay. Many of the town, and little even more about. All which gathered, twists, and put their fists and firsts on. Gathered upon to breathe, and warmed, finally, breathe.

It was that how it started and how watched. Father of their calling, at least one, yet how could he know? In an act of show, he waited so, and thence he lay. But Heor would be forgotten so.

There was but his brother Therg, of limp. He was but the only one, a man as a limp, would happen and match streets. Followed after, his feet. But were they listening and the stay? He was not taken by, but made to pay. A heed of tax, and brought about each morn.

He was but a man that could not count right, saw them missing, shelves were twisted and in there. Father than he would've had it, yet to know, nowhere, away. He was but uninterested of what they had to say. Calloused but in part, he'd shout.

'Leave me about and never see in loud.'

But morn and ever more he woke. And walked upon and seethe would York. Upon the country, looking fair, and of hand asked yet. But a lichen around head, and one for his dead, and bedded, always of a heart his own, flocks would've earned him song.

And he was cherished, young and sired. Made to be around, for he had mire. Taken them when they were blind, with help, of youth and grind, from whence he made a powder, facing. But coal became as they were dancing. Ever covered and less and so, he was but to wonder, who did show?

It was but signs, of less inclined, to see it for what seemed to be a while. They had but come, and on his own, out of home. But for the drought, of Rhine about, what could but make up, in wooden stoves. Prized of what remained, and put on top his head, would have it. But, there was he and would not brought it. In a miss, at their feet, but the ones that were but dear they protected. It was due that they would lend it. Not to be said so.

Of worthy news and what they brought, as little of theirs, and set aback. What pained them to see him sparing. Of worthiness the weary, it was just so that in case, to know, they would not settle anywhere.

What a bore there was Living there, at last, without hearing the noise, without being entranced by what was going on and what ought to be, in makings. Of the heeded thing which rose for its little sake, there'd be, of someone missing of the gutless spree that was but metal-filthy, rocks, below. None would know of them, let alone be aware that where they stood, there would be no night to show them peace of lighter. Alabaster.

'We should kill to our heart's content!'

'Now you're talking my language. I want it so.'

Thence they pillaged the first thing that came to mind, looking aside, they entered the threshold and entered the village, heeding no mind. For, first house entered, children put down, with their women in doubt, asked for then undressed, would to be used in front of their dead men. No one was spared the due and would to be, they were put through, as much as it could be held. Little more than but a yell was heard, in the heart of loss. But to be content, of what went on. Through minds, but they killed their horses and pulled their manes, which were spiked and dark as if lines of centipedes of desert-tanned scorpions, they drew below them, open-guts and wore their intestines. And walked around.

‘It was joyous day, was it not?’

‘If here, I heed and hear what I say.

I think we should repeat this feeling and feel it, every single day.’

And walked around, as if uncalled, there was little and little less the two of them could not take down. As one were to be lead to believe, they didn’t exist, or they were after a piece to know. Shone upon them, filth was trouble. There was but an escapee who came forth. Years passed but let it be known. He had a knife on him and thrice the arrows in his throat. Behave, thought the man, then spoke it.

‘Behave, I tell you, child.’

In mind to listen to elders, as if he were of no mind of his own, he but settled to listen and do what he was told. Not to cry and chatter as one like him would do after, he was but inclined to be, an elbow shattered, then all the shafts down his throttle.

‘We cannot be stopped.’

‘Certainly this world shall be ours one day, Pilgmesh.’

‘Kintaresh, by brother siding, you must know that I’ve gone out of my way there, out of mind and let be these bindings stopped so.

I’m listening and see no reason. I’m trying myself and see a feather bison.’

Somewhere, through their flock, to yield, through their small encased little to no little more appeal, to senses, they would do. There was a rue to them, and deep sinew. Their herd was touched, they could not watch, but there, one was caught behind and open through. They entered the ship of guts and appeared to set themselves in flight, there yonder. Though bones were levers, there was something ill. Some glorious red appeal, a glowing puck they entered through. Walked upon a green land of bile and plight, and much less-light than they would know it so to be true. For they had now killed many alike, but only their heads as their bodies were wrought and made of many a limb. All barely stitched together as to remind them that their time was running out and soon they would be devoured if not become strange. In mind, they were bug bit, by strange malformations that would bring defeat and were dressed in various robes uncanny that they were making them appeared to be horned in the front. Glory about their days, nothing to convey, therefore they only went on and listened to no one speak. A giant malign tool which was creating rippling in the sky, behind this dark machination which was wrought upwards like an warped, or pulled up factory, there seemed to be a gaseous nausea. Looks of which were green and dark pox, and little specks of skin which was dark and wreathed in disease about the place.

Worshipped by them, once they stopped attacking, along the way.

Pilgmesh was yet but joined, another brother that had come. Oigamesh who was but there, he was but of limbs and anatomically unfit, but still lived and settled in.

‘I shall aid you so.’

‘That is the only acceptable thing to do.’

‘Indeed it is. I think we should stop it.’

But they joined the inner courts and were met by strange things that were surrounding them, everywhere around and little more than it should be allowed, they saw it. And there were graves out there, black ponds and weird iliac-strange peculiar flies. Which bore no wings but little rods that connected their bodies to small pox-fat things that made them fly, which appeared to draw from their innards, little more than to know, little specks and little flower-like eyes that were encompassed in tiny bodies that were coming out of them, die. That was unexpected but it was the general feeling they appeared to bear. For whoever looked into the gaze would know that the whites in their eyes were not meant to become men. Let alone try cutting in line and become part of the land which was conjoined and would never be turned and twisted, as to be looked up more.

Many weird plants, long and twisted, like little tornadoes or vortexes which were split in halves then allowed to spread aside as to give the impression that they were sheets with long fingers on every side. From which they spat that poisonous air, the toxin which would remain in their sides. Would to be cut through and better be caught off guard.

Flying machines marching in cutout-shapes on every corner; she was peaking, there. In her strange flowering form, which got all of their eyes, as they could but help themselves no longer, always trashing in order to see, nowhere else to be but the uncanny thing which was the strange ecstasy in terms of annoyance it produced. Such an unfathomable annoying voice only entered and came along as she could not stop.

Her beauty and peculiar form, attached from the lower body to the strange flight, would only be no longer met.

‘What do you want of me?’

‘We heard you talk already, we seek only absence from you, leave.’

Kintaresh would never know. He’d not expect it, better show than in the quiet making. So much static noise everywhere where rose. And dark antipathy which entered them there.

A crook like voice shook the vales and everywhere they stood upon, the veils would lift, invisible yet to be transparent plants, appearing and disappearing, as they would be in trance. And long and there and more so everywhere, when never looked at, during the times. They were but of a strange thing, a yet-to be benign matter.

Once the quiet settled they could feel her scent and as to know.

Oigamesh but had to come.

Gun-like pins of cacti shapes would shoot. Many would bother them but would not take away as they should. Malignantly looking strange-to be. There was nowhere near, where they would want to feel company for what was so.

‘There are whorish realms out there.’

In strange a ports where those malicious things were but dissected, in a place where vivisections never ended, nor would they be approved off, not to be let alone inclined to be lost. As well as they could fare at last, there was but an end. There was no way to know it yet. But there had been, after a while, a way to see, that trail benign. On, in the sky.

Pilgmesh spat some blood, then normal spittle and he had done it so on his hand, rubbing it on his side to hide it. Was he mad?

He’s done it before. His shirt and trousers, of worn, behold, all stained to be after the cold. He had but a knife and stared death right in its eyes. But death was peculiar and would to be killed if it tried anything.

They spoke to the lady nonetheless, not trying to impress her, but to spit in her face now.

But whence there, in the distance happened?

He was but a man bred and made for kill. And slaughter was what made him ill. He killed himself, hanged by a church which was floating, then and gone.

‘I smell blood.’

‘Jacob, shut your mouth.’

‘But I can feel it.’

‘Oh.’

‘I’m going to follow the trail and find it out. I know I can, it’s only a matter of time until I will become it and I will bring destruction upon the ground and I shall rinse it all with what I can up to the front, where I shall become something of my own.’

And he took a robe and wore a skull and walked around the woods, kidnapping what he could, until was caught. In a single home, where shone the light, and faded, he was distraught as his insecticide upon which he fended all the evil thoughts ran out. For he had a house of blood and bone treasure and his pride were those he killed alas.

A bunch of men covered in fur, and long trenches of dirt, they shook but might head of giants, upon their tiny shoulders they could not help but stay and be quiet as they were being munched upon. It was too soon to give in but they would know of it while walking back. There were various peculiar days, where they stood and would not stay a thing, always going into wild directions, despite having caught him, they remained there for too long and none of them could discern what was going on.

Before long, they followed false trails, always lost, unable to stay.

‘Still you feet men.’

But many had their shins cut and heads as well, rolling as they dragged behind, their bodies were but crushed. Light had become a dome, from the tops of which, a reverse ground shook but figures that were walking on the ceiling, never watched for their sudden puffs of blood, as they would suddenly explode in the air, leave traceless holes through which the acid-galaxies came through, as sour black clouds that peered and would be peered upon. Planets that were shaped liked wasp-like vehicles of skin that pushed out from their forehead, twenty meters on. Various cylindrical figures that would bear many bodies that were wrapped around as they would continue to grow, diverging into eighteen direction as a knight’s lance that was split and torn apart. Pushing onward until it could not be controlled any longer, creating various unfathomable creatures made out of the weird bodily thing which was their wasp’s embodiment of a vision it bore in the future. OF these planets little could be known, but they all shone and would creature terrible things that were but fake imagery and senseless in some way, as in no way could they achieve premonition, thenceforth, this could be drawn forth.

This twisted imagery was but an attempt at trickery, as they approached and would eat from inside the heads that lay on the ground, instead, trying to nest themselves in, they would have no doubt as to why they carved themselves through and why the need for hives when heeded. And why the heads, upheaval, there was no sense in this at all. Would they be inclined to eat from their insides? There was but only one way to know and only one way to find out, where shone the last vestige of blood, inside their insides. Entrails were benign.

But many of these planets made little houses out of the heads, while ripping out their corpses off and living inside of them. It was pleasant inside, although they had employed a kind of malignant trickery. Since there was not enough space, despite the size of the heads, in length, to be more precise, as the hollow leftovers had enough depth in them; making them inclined to do as such.

They sliced the head in halves with the weird body lances, then they merely spat from various body-growths which formed around, clay-like substances made out of their skin, which allowed them to extend the heads until they seemed, within the limits, to look like wagons, or hard lumped head-centipedes that would home their spears. All long as they would appear to home their needs and breathe within. There was something malign in every mind, it was not to be spoken of, but everyone ought to die.

Again with the thought, it could not be brought again.

A small hold was established, as they even extended one of the heads into a wall, which would surround their small plot as to allow no one at all to enter in. That way, they would be safe and there would be but little to no way for anyone to convey. Or seethe about, or lump through sound and eavesdrop. Life was perfect there. Disease was plants, or the embodiment of it, which resembled growths of corpses made in the image of people who died during the bubonic plague.

Little rodents would be chased around. And most of them would not be allowed, not too far now. Always leaped upon, for the highest of echoes, they would not gather to sound alarms or waste away. They would be caught in ashtrays in the boxes that were to satiate what went on. Of her mind there was but little to ask.

But she had done it so, without remorse, of little mind, had she been.

‘Enter the disease, the factory and go through it on the other side, it’s what you must do, you hear?’

Kintaresh but stood and listened, he was not one to be ordered by a dame, but since there was little more he could look around now, would he not stay his arms to satiate this curiosity now?

As for calling on them both, would he wreath and of old, there’d be no question. Any longer, would he be of little mind and walk yonder if not for them? They could but not listen while walking along their way. But there, they went, out instead, and appeared to be met, from the highest point, like an old telescope looked from up-front inside the visor, they saw, but the iron-darkened red insides that lead upon the twisted stairs, benign, towards the puff. And smoke was in there, of some kind. But puffs of disease would not do, as they but did little and settled to follow through.

‘What a strange thing, we’ve lived in here for far too long, I think we ought to have known better than to have placed ourselves on the side and joined to be and jointed.’

The rain would satiate the creed-distress while putting an end to the mirror as one would confess, rain was to be the one which would shatter. Eventually, most would have to go as well, as they chose to stay and let along convey, whatever they could. Nor should they be of such a mind as to let themselves be caught by the antics which would better be hid, inside their peculiar heaps and never-to be pushed on wreathing diseased. They were incapable, after all to understand or to come to a realization of their own.

But with the moisture coming from above, the dome of replicated buildings would fall, and through the water, ended through the ceiling. Entered through and battered as to be felt, they would deal with it again, up-heaving what little strength there was there. Thence there was but little more, and little understanding of the things in which they’d breed and bore. Here was but little they could swim in, and little more than the pool wreathing.

Earemesh had followed through. Although he had been outside, waiting and not making a delight a hue, he would totter around for hours whilst to wait. And see for himself whether or not someone ought to come and satiate. He was but in run, set a blur. Unable to look whence he came from and would to be. Other than to see, seeing how he was left alone.

He continued on his own. With little heed to justice or the land, he came to accept what appeared to be beseeched upon, and take a blade. And take an axe as well, something of a reign, while to ride on the bridge of Myrth and Plume and come upon their carriage as to enter the trough, be carried away. Abandoning the horse along the way, he was joined in drink, hiding with him, underneath the secret compartment as to say. He was but unable to think, straight away, of wit he lacked, but he was anchored to the fellow, enough. Not to push too soon, he had no idea what had swooned or what had entered him for some reason he could not have seen. It was his prick he that had entered his arm, he had been stabbed by his rapier but felt lo’ no pain but wonder. How was it that he pulled away my skin? Is he stronger? Was it heated? But like a web, it only got pulled and dragged and made to swap some of the flies around as they were but faced by bumps in the road. Always but a hop, the shakings.

Then the stopping, the nightly waking.

‘What are you going to do now? What are your intentions? I need to know before you do something. Come on, tell me, I need to know before something happens.’

I have to, I have to, before my toes are cut.'

They could find both of them out. If too much noise was made, if too much, let so be the deranged man in front of him. Of eyes but strange, and peculiar clothes remained, a fashion of weird segments of metal, no wonder he would not be touched. It had to be, to be latched upon, as a tiny thing, a sucking wasp that had made him see. Everywhere around, there was but a strand that kept everything from falling, preventing him from asking and dreading to go away. Yet there was a walk, after they were found and kicked out. He still wore the rapier at his shoulder but at least they would not have their fingers and toes cut off. It was a miracle, seeing the bottom of the ravine. And they would see it, where it stood and whine within a mark.

'Twenty more for stay, drink and lay, eight more or you'll be on your way.'

Stood there, where one should, and ask about what happened, as it happened for a beast of yonder, to have come and passed. Little of it had they seen but they could all remember what it cast. For eight feet taller on a man of eight it had, and bore the limbs extended, wrists were had but an unseen wipe had cut through them. With an openly deformed mouth, bore the giant vase the mirror that was shape around and pushed as if a costume worn, until it pushed out of the top, from the hole, a small fountain of peculiar rake-like men who asked for more. Their front worn crowns were barely to be seen, but from the likes of them they would ever see them for what they seemed. Always of a piece, through their eyes, their bodies but pieces of his game, from which, the innards of his bones were set aside.

And he carried all in back, kidnapped a few. Mostly the dames, where the men were unable and unaccountable for the remains, of whom might talk and need it be called so. The fore-front row looked like a butcher's work which none may call it so. It was hunted but had no legs.

'I remember it, it wore a strange mill-wheel upon which it walked so.'

Set it flight and levitating, his arms extended on every side, from the looks of which it bore strings of skin attached to the wheel, yet never were they seen rotating, despite the wheel's contemplating motion. He would but ask of it but fell behind.

Asked the fellow that he might help him set aside, whichever rude feud between the two of them, might be, they could settle it later, but search for it, to its layer, they had seen. But nowhere, as there was no forest and everything was flat and blank. This village alone stood like a beacon on the road, and to see. There in the distance It was, but a figure of dark, swollen around and still floating.

'I think they come yonder to devour.'

'They come?'

'I see some more.'

Pointed in the wild direction, many of their bodies tilted and coming forth; as one could see them floating ever closer with their peculiar strings and giant arms extended, more. So, they still bore the bulk. Drawn from below, the body of a wild mill if it wore its wings above the rooftop, while covered in the most unnatural looking fur they could see.

The widened mouth prolapsed, even more so opening. It spat from inside and would do as such. From that peculiarly shaped vase which was of the ones It stole alas, they wanted more. There was no one, absolutely no one which was safe from the grasp it would take or bear aside what came to be.

‘We need to flee and hide in the village.’

But every time they looked back, the earth beneath the village and the area, called so. Would only rise a few feet above the ground, ever to be looked upon; there were a few more feet above the ground and ever the pressure followed. Dissected in his eye, the rapier, he pulled away some of it, then wallowed.

‘Will you stop that?’

He had come to ask, but knowingly, Earemesh was watched. It was hard to account for him, but ask of such, and might receive. What was his name? The stranger said it so, Plume, I am, but you need not known. His lips were perched, although not to say, he did not reveal anything and would stab him if he looked at him the wrong way. It was just what they did in those times and would to call.

Battered upon a door and entered. Then spent the night; without fear.

‘The beast never enters for it fears it ought to pay.

That’s why it’s avoiding entering and let alone stay.’

‘What a peculiar thing, if it’s intending on killing all of you, why would it pay as such?’

‘I don’t know. Why don’t you go and ask it?’

‘There are more?’

At the signal of which, many other men had followed with their ears.

It was a strange thing, a fix to their wails, but they would not ask of it, nonetheless, it would be settled one way or another. They looked out of the way and went through the night, in the midst of a calling father, whom asked them as such.

‘They killed my child in front of my eyes.’

‘Need for vengeance?’

‘No, I just liked watching.’

Thence they left and would but follow. Swimming through the dirt as if there was but a hollow folly down the earth, where they might not get into if they cherished their lives, for earth was scum and would murmur about, a hymn of ages.

Met along the way but by disease magician, each of them was peculiar and would appear out of nowhere. Yet the pits from which they came out off could be found. Laughed about and pitted against bears, they fought, in their youth.

Hardened by the looks of it, but they bore strange hats which shook the world, when misunderstood.

‘I am great Althing, fear me not for I have come to give you something.’

He gave Earemesh but a stab. His gut was pulled out, began inflating itself and became a giant flying pair of bubbling tubes that started growing and flying away. Not he was left with a pair of holes in his chest through which he would have to be content with.

‘How will this help me?’

‘The ones you seek cannot see you without your guts. Trust me.’

‘Are you certain about that?’

‘I can stab you in your eyes as well if you want to.’

‘No, leave.’

Then he left.

Followed by another man whose robe was gray but bore stars on it which were made of decay, deformation, knish but puckers, they looked disgusting and appeared to constantly give birth to small pentagons made out of insects sutured together. And each pentagon figure bore an eye. This one was blind and they were his malignant dogs with which he’d cross the whiles.

Plume never actually got to ask, how come he wasn’t stabbed out of the two of them? It was quite a queer thing after all, having himself be spared of this benign treatment while the man would only come to endure and to as he pleased while they were but on a swoon. They walked, closer as the gap was cut between the two of them. One asked, then another.

‘See, I’m going to rip off one of your eyes and part of your skull and replace it with this pentagon.’

‘Is this truly necessary?’

‘Of course it is. Now do as I please, and do not dare question it.

It’s important.’

‘If you say so, then I shall do it.’

How odd. Again, Plume was spared of this treatment and by the looks of it, one of the creatures had began taking notice of them, running along, as he could but not be stopped then.

‘You should leave now, I’m only trying to give you a piece of advice now, fellow, this is for your own sake. Don’t do something you might come to regret afterwards.’

For he disappeared after, leaving him to do as he pleased.

Earemesh stood, now with the block and eye inside his skull. It was mightily displeasing. How he was frozen and confused. But he had no doubt that they were not liars, as the beast had clearly avoided him and went for Plume. Of which he had known just as little and would not say a thing he shouldn’t.

‘I will meet you in the village once I’m done.’

He yelled. And some of the beasts were alerted as well. As much as it would be known, all ran past him and would just ignore, following the other man instead. It was quite a pleasing stare, to see. And even better, more to be called, he had but wondered, what the poor man had done to deserve it.

Greeted by the two more, these ones came in pairs, they were but Siamese, and their heads were missing. Constantly spewing blood; splattered on the ground. There was no sun in the sky, it never existed in the first place. And the ground was of a peculiar shade of brown which was lighter, then darker, then got even more darker, a few shades lighter, then dark again, then it became black, then scorched, then it appeared to be green, then yellow, then it was made out of face, then it came back to it reverted to its formal sight. What a marvelous day this was. He felt like he had achieved much.

Then he returned back to the village, passing the beasts who flew back into their places and this was never spoken off again.

In a few years worth, everyone in that village died of hunger and of thirst. Earemesh died of an infection, yet his body continued living with the help of the pentagon which had been shoved inside his head.

Hospital

Sitting around the house, unevenly set, there were deranged organs, all of whom belong to a prolonged extended dead. It was the nursery room, of which inclined, all sobers stood by their side. High-raised beds, all interconnected with serpent-filled devoured body filled liked arms which blocked the way around. Fat-people always dying in the room, always of a mind to ask when was the time come, for them to be shook.

‘We need another shot, come on, or I will break the cabinet open myself.’

He was built like a recliner. The chief assistant Oshot called again.

‘Break it open and bring me a few more of your antibiotics or I will have to do it myself. And I do not like that.’

He had to repeat it again until it entered his small, tiny head. A lot depended on him as well, he couldn’t fuck up this time around. His fingers had been swollen, and put through the grinder. Always of a piece, he couldn’t mind her. She who was of bricks, but reeling in, as she was but become to wall, melted in.

‘Pull another brick out. Right around her gut, until she talks.’

Brim was the man with the screwdriver. It was what he had. Brick by brick he pulled her out of there, seeing a strange concoction of cement and blood spurt out. It was not a sight he enjoyed seeing let alone would he enjoy approaching her there and then. Always of a mind to ask of her.

‘What happened?’

‘I do not know.’

‘What happened?’

‘Why do you keep asking me that?’

And the blurt of blots could not be stopped. Always growing, their coils could not be stopped from proceeding back and forth, always of no better scope than to get their sight. In that one moment they could not help themselves but ask but happened.

‘Again, no one in this room knows.’

The hospital was but in shambles and they were but a mind to ask.

First, every man in their beds despite being rooted along their so-elongated heads and arms, bore, on top of their chest through some peculiar skin-cartilage grates, torsos kept ever so near, on top of which bloomed peculiar willow-flower that appeared to emulate statuesque heads, made of the same organic material. Horned on every side as crowns; each of them bore tiny thin starved arms that were grasping around whatever they could wrap themselves around. Most importantly, there was something there as well. Gulps being taken, arms that would act like throats. The woman in the wall and most importantly the doctor.

He kept asking for shots.

‘Pyrroute, here, I broke the cabinet.’

‘Right in time for me to begin; you should take a few steps back and make sure you’ve readied yourself as well as the others.’

‘What’s happening?’

The room shook, right before he started. Darted from one side to the other, lights were taken, largely departed. From a side to another, they’d missed the chance and would’ve done so. If it weren’t for the slightest thing, an eye ripped, a nail’s worth on the floor.

‘It’s done.’

He’s administered it. His heart had beckoned, yet content.

Sleeping on it by the looks of it.

‘Are you insane? Are you seriously, completely, utterly!’

He stopped, bled a little, still of a mind. He could not understand why was it. Open windows blushing in his eyes. He was not into it. Bleeding off but missing the eye, that had disturbed him way too much to be able to rebound himself; below his waist a train. Only a young man drew on and started trailing his finger off him. Merely tasted the mercury before he spat.

‘That’s enough already, stand aside child.’

‘How come you haven’t passed off yet.’

The sound and the jerking from the beds stopped. It looked like the upper trunks, the blooming things and the faces rested flaccidly on the side.

They were not getting it. Always of a mind, always speaking about something they didn’t understand what was going on.

‘Don’t touch that, don’t touch it.

I’m going to make it as clear as possible now. There’s nothing wrong with me. It’s merely, nothing, I’m not saying I’m.

I’m hurt but I will make it through.’

‘You’re missing an eye and a part of your face; there’s a hollow spot.’

‘Forget it, leave the room if you don’t like looking at this face.’

‘Here.’

Came Brim, after he stopped working on her, he went ahead and pulled a roll around his head. Wrapping it carefully before he pulling it off. There was something that fell off distracted them.

Would she simply shut her mouth?

An echo could not be heard by either of them, it would be too disturbing and would take away their whiff if they went on. Again, it came in like an echo from around every annoying hole inside the wall, the ceiling and the carpet. That insatiable thing was but paranoia. No one is diseased in there. No one stands to die just yet, shut your filthy mouth off or I will do it.

But neither of them heard that. They should’ve, but they hadn’t. It went to waste, it would not be heard again. Too cold, always but a snow outside, or they burned the last calendar. Some dates had been off anyway.

‘Here, I’m done.’

The Doctor wore a patch of robes, he had been sutured, like a man who had destroyed the last supplies of lab-coats. It was peculiar, seeing how every arm-length surrounded him. They thought that, eventually the hands would come out of their hiding, even setting themselves off as they entered through his waist, dragging him in the afterlife. Worst of wear, he’d done to it himself if he chose to remain. There was no question about it any longer, he was tired.

Too many turns.

They had to deal with her first.

‘Pick a few bricks off her head and she will die, she’s not really there, you realize that, right?’

But Brim checked a brick. She was not flat, but stacked within every little block as if compartments put her on. Through one's speck of an eye, he'd see it, yet missed what seemed to be but a benign trap her fingers came in. Her brain was in a brick, part of her heart, and the lower you went, formations. Peculiar formations, giant world in which she had but shaped her children out of planets in order to hold her in fractioned wombs, here and there, deformed astrals and cherubs, trying to preserve her soul. No matter how horribly deformed each planet and each iteration of her had become. All but infantile, pocket dimensions that would be shattered if one were to drop the brick, then blow in a giant sea of large remains. Where she lied away, her eye would stay and look but through.

Not to give Brim too much time to look and see.

For a normal person looking in the brick, if he were to carefully split it in half, he'd see only the meat-insides of chewing-gum matter covering for a womb-egg with no umbilical egg left. It was inside of it that the world was made. Kind of empty, as if it were but a projection of the world, but at the exact innate moment of a second cut, made against this thing, he would not and could not fathom, hearing or heaving it after. Too quick for the touch, her soul would explode, as would her children. As if wanting for the gore to end.

A brick just rushed and flew away in the back and in the hollow, through the empty frame which surrounded her, shallow.

'Damn it, I missed one.'

Well, that's looks like trouble.'

'Let her be then, she won't be touched by them in any case. And the sedatives will run out only.'

The doctor stopped. Only for a second now; again, drawn to him, untrustworthy. He must've taken twenty shots himself, and he hasn't even started using the ones from the cabinet either. It was the sound of the cabaret coming from the outside. He but wanted to be sure no one was dead. He was but at a loss, trying to not lose a finger, when the others could not understand, just what went through his head then? After taking so many of them, he feared as much as everyone.

'All right, as soon as they wake up, there will be a lot of noise. We should have enough time, to make it out of this chaos while they're drawn to it.'

'Then let's go.'

Door opened, door closed. Door rose and appeared like they froze. They looked behind, the door was off, as if ripped away from its hinges. Moving by itself, while making all the squall settle and put through, and every bile along the way asking.

'What's going on there?'

'I told you we shouldn't lock it.'

'We haven't, what are you talking about?'

'I have.'

Stallen, the man with a curved spine and eight clothes on, all of which had been ripped to shred, and seemed to keep, hidden as they were merely placed to his chest, tiny explosive devices he hid from everyone. It was hard to see in any case.

Why was everyone dressed this way? Weird, Ophelia Chegouh wore strange sandals and weirdly patterned VHS-colored, hammered in by nails, painted red two-shaped dresses. They had to make it through the cold, there were no coats, but one of them bore the body of a man as well as some peculiarly fractured eye-snow. There were weird walls there.

A patch of fur was moving around the floor. It was time to leave this place and watch what happened from the distance. Once they kept it fading, they but stood and longed for to approach.

‘I see, there’s something happening, I think.’

Long line, no long-distance communication device between them, only this strange system of whispers-shared, a few centimeters along the way, always but put together. They were but handling this as hard as they could. It would not be easy to put it bluntly. This stunt would only last for a few more hours.

‘Ah, I see, something pulled it already. We can leave now.’

‘How do we know you’re not lying.’

Crouching, a few feet away from one another, all of them barely kept a distance of some meters, at least two between each. And they did not understand how it happened. It hardly mattered, though, it would not last. They were sweating and refused to look back until the man in the front gave them the answer.

‘I don’t know. Can’t you move a few centimeters away to the left and look for yourselves?’

‘They’ll see us.’

‘They’ll see us.’

‘They’ll see us.’

They carried through, the longer messages were but shrewd to pieces by the time they go through a corner and went to the other. It was ever so pleasant being there, die.

That had to stop.

‘I see.’

There was the smell of Alabaster as well, somewhere, out there, in the tall booth outside the hospital.

‘We should make it past the static noise and, there it rose.’

‘Look, I cannot look, I cannot prove the door was pulled away.

I could be lying.’

‘Make It shorter. Don’t speak much.’

There was some noise coming out of it already, some moans reaching an utmost peculiar magnitude which could not be inclined again. Sweating, thoroughly, they were but set to their knees, almost reclined, begging.

‘Please, let’s just so, even if it’s locked, there’s still the noise.’

Ophelia was the first one to stand up and bring forth reason.

‘I cannot wait here any longer, I’m starting to feel nauseated by what’s going on. There must be something we could do to get go around and leave.’

‘Then we will do it, if that’s what’s necessary, let’s go.’

The doctor was the farthest one in the back, or would’ve been. He had been one of the first to leave, thinking he could simply get away.

It had never dawned on him how cruel it seemed, leaving them to die off, but that was simply, the way it had to be. There was no way out and he could but spare no reason for what seemed to be the passing of a few hours.

Barely being joined there, he had met cruelty before, and was almost done.

By the time they were done running, they were met by him standing, by the side, looking inside a room from which a light came out. His shadow on the back wall; whereas he but extended his left arm as if to stop them.

‘You don’t want to see this.

Go around, I’ll join you in a few minutes.’

‘Now wait a minute, I think we had enough of your charades now. You can’t just take a leave now for a few hours and disappear like that. It’s just.’

‘Enough, I said I’m going to join you in a few minutes, now leave. It’s for your own good and I think you know it. Don’t make me do something you may come to regret later.’

‘And what would that be?’

Brim, his assistant chimes in. He’s silent but holds a strange wrangler, a strange tool he carried around his pocket tool-box. And he has a phantom drawn on his strange star-catcher which bears the face of a mentally ill defiled man who had been flayed alive but stands on a strange grinder that’s made of teeth as well of some peculiar beacons of light which shoot in both directions. Beneath it there’s an unreadable furniture broken apart as if it’s made to look like some stylized signature. Standing on the furniture there’s, what might come to be believed as to be the figures of the artists, either of the band of whose the logo seems to belong, or to the artist. It was hard to notice. He was the only one who wasn’t wearing an extra set of clothes, only his coat, given to him by his mother. Of which he thought just now, he thought about her mournful soul. And what she might think of her child now, in such a dire moment. It was hard being so far away from her.

Brim had missed her so much. So, direful much that he forgot what he was doing and merely put back the weird tool he had in his mouth. He had put in his mouth as well, it was so filthy and covered in his drool. Of which he bore no spittle but some of the cement he had suckled on. There was also the weird fixation he had. He didn't tell anyone but once he removed the bricks with the screwdriver, he used the wrangled to store some of the cement into its hole for later tasting. It drove him wild, but he was mildly inclined now. Because both this peculiar thing he did and this strange conundrum he found himself in found him thinking of her.

As much as he hoped to do something that might redeem him somewhat, he was indisposed. No emotion, no connection. They turned.

There's also the importance, of.

Well, they left.

And the doctor was still there.

'Getting rid of the evidence.'

It was the time and the room. It shook upon his boot.

First he looked at what to share. A transcript of skin, a parchment upon which he but noted every dead and every man that's been used and use to be and knowing. Of but little known and little worth. Lo and there, he approached and read. Upon the filthy look and seethe, he had settled upon it and looked as if it were but a strange receipt, or dead scrolls which spoke to him, for every man torn apart had known, at last of what had cast. Upon a watch and dreaded cast, their names had spoke of future lost. Upon the dead seas they walked, through the uncanny mists that were pushed through pressure. And atoms of diseased through the broken atmosphere, that'd be.

What appeared to be a tear in the sky, whence but the largest and the highest buds would grow to be. Lumped together, holding one another, as if they made, but a peculiar structure, as rounded as the dome on top of a Castilian Church, torn for gaps and let alone, missing gaps. Held by strange a stone, and would to be wreathing out of the pliant cones which entered it. There was no end to see. And this was but a man's plight, for he had seen in, walked alone. Entered the structure upon a single throat-a-leg, his body largely warped and absorbed then given form on top the hollows, where he wasted away. He had been Anthony Chissao.

The next name on the list, had been but Thesse Offyolke, who had been stopped, an appointment were not for his eyes. He's been taken around and would see no lust, been taken away. And arms but wrapped around and would to be away if it were not for what was dragging him. For what he had seen, or what would've been was but the light which constantly poked into his eyes, leaving but a largely flattened tuba-gut, of hardened touch underneath the small cone of flat ground he could look upon, the dark strides were just as much revealed. Before he neared but a stretch, which drew around him, but a broken lobe instead would torn the sides. He would stare at two cliffs on every side, as they only grounded, many-steel like grasps had torn the teeth that were the land, inwardly as if he was to be chained by their tips and torn apart by wild horses. And they were just as bloated, fatter by the likes. Through them he had finally saw it. The missing link and would be benign. Once the light had settled down, they revealed themselves as soft, then of a mind, they spat from inside of them.

Out their guts and then around, would. Organs hidden, they should. Spat but the primate-shapes and would be brought to a gist that was lost.

The doctor asked for another name. It was at this point that he was being fed them, thought he could not explain what went on through his head when asking, or whether listened to.

Or the table bathing in what appeared to be steam.

He'd seen her vision, and would pierce chimes, and flat a long-bridge. Stretched but the many grates, of strange-circular heaters, and those whom were dead, beneath them, always in heaps. Always trying to reach the light, and see the winds and clouds within reach. She was but facing a figure, one made of gray patches, put on top a human but at long last cast out and watched as they but spread around him, would to be aware that they would pop. Inside that invisible hold his face started floating away, every other part as well until they rotated and would become just as the patched, parts being refurbished as it created, that pole, erected and misguided. Shot out there, in the sky where a small box would stand and cry. And in it there were the lesser ones taken from below. As the Alma Shread forgot to look yet, she was a cloud.

Bastard thing the other saw, a patch of black, like smoke of puffs. Drawing near in a carriage, ended. On top of it, he but satiated the twists of many umbrellas intertwined with the heads of giant skinned wolves which were alive and ever breathing. Would to turn, they stopped to mourn. As they spat but children dreamed by roses, pink and mourned for red. Crimson within their eyes as they skin had become skin, taken inside a ground that was but pulling up and dragging down the murk. Fellicity Imson, she also dreamed of such peculiar formations, pillar-altars, which shot in every direction as if entered a grave. Upon the heads of which men of flowers would cover the wounds with dirt so beetles and worms would have what to eat once they were gone.

A freighter only in the bottom shape, upon a frozen solid sea of murk, and dirt had cast but many thorns in the surrounding areas, which gripped the lower half. From the top but a solid berg, of which ice had been contorted and twisted until it was one of them. In his side there would be at least a heart which grew aside, beating in and out, then to be sure, it lead to four adjacent holes in the area encompassed by this little bubble of orange-gray they were in. At the tip four malignant whips erected, postulating on top the open basins. Rains would pour out, largely inverted, as it would rain but black within. Though his body was spared, living inside was what worn him out as well. He could but not wait his due, Thomas Beacon had but lost his head in that realm and just his feet as well as his gun.

Only a trunk and a half an arm remained on one side, the other parts missing, which only became even more suspicious as the doctor missed him.

'You're the only one who checks out Thomas.

I think that's you.'

Pyrroute said it. Though he was taking his well endowed time; this would very much be a failure if he missed or cast his insides out on a whim. 'I hope there's no such thing as resentment in the after-life, especially for those who harmed you. I'd like to feel that.

I think we met before. I think I worked on you as well. I think I fixed you.'

But he could hardly imagine what his head looked like, or any of the missing parts. There was no mess and there was no mass there. It looked like it was but a fashioned marble painted on slab. He could not do this alone now, yet, his eyes, beyond the glasses looked vaguely empty, his pupils dilated, not at the first touch of a scalpel as one would expect but thinking.

He had but done wrong by him. And there was no way to get back at the man. This fresh strand of guilt did not belong to a doctor, nor would it have anything to do with him. He had but made it clear ever since he started, what he was, what he'd do. Here it was, standing in front of him, with little more than an ear to him, listened to in silence.

'I think we're both here to blame, Thomas.

No offence, but I think you're the greatest company I've had for a while. My time may be running out, but I still think we got a connection, somehow, I could fix you.

If I was given the time, and the means, you'd never be alive by any means, but I concede no point and I shall take no part in your further slaughter.'

He had but made a cut made sure the blood looked fresh. There was none inside of him. Only the white dust of marble resting upon his broken scalpel and nothing more; which made him of the idea that there was nothing more to hid any longer. He'd already slit some of the names off the list, just so he could make sure no one would come to know them, or realize they were more. Truth be told, they were all there, in the cabinet, and the desk and his hidden safe. But those would have to stay, for further preservation. It was a conflicting thing in his mind, his pride in a way. How much he wanted to keep his prize yet destroy it completely. To make sure none of it would be traced to him.

But then again, who was out there? Was there anyone left past the cold? There was certainly no way to check or even hear about it. And they've already been given a head-start to find out about it on the radio. It was always too awkward for him to understand or see past his head. He was but, thinking. Where were the dead? Why was no one talking about them?

Conflicting information; first radio message said.

'Radio listener, of the FM Broadcast Bold-Caroooo!

We sadly come to the final days of the podcast now as we came to the realization that there will be no world out there.

Everyone will be dead. No one will make it past the cold. We're being met by a new Ice age from which there will be no survivors.

The military and the environmental reports as well as the ever so conflicting weather predicaments and hard winds further confirm the fact that neither one of us will survive.

But there is still time to donate as much as you can, as, for the last days of your existence ought to be spent listening to perhaps what may as well be the last voice of humanity.'

Second radio message, twenty days later. This happened.

'Good god, we survived the initial hard-winter come-around, dear listeners.

We can now proudly announce that our survival tactics so far have been successful by every possible account that may be. With that said, there's dire news along the way.

Unfortunately for you, dear listeners, most of the television access has been finely restricted and highly censored in order to prevent another anarchy Renaissance that might instill chaos among the still secluded homes that have yet to be resupplied along neighborhoods.'

Large break followed with the names.

'Where was I? Oh, right, all channels have been replaced by strict, short replays of military announcement and further safety concern instructions that should serve the less fortunate in their endeavors to survive.

With that out of the way, while you spend the actual last days of what seems to be the last moments humanity seems to bear with; dear listener, how about some mesmerizing grooves from the seventies to further warm your soul while your outsides gets encased in a tomb of cold stone?'

It was hard to tell whether or not they were selling snake-oil to profit or whether or not there was any confirmed death. The hospital was not out of reach either. It was stuck in a constant loop of supply receival while also getting a new influx of patients who somehow found their way there. Always, without a break and without a second being taken off the clock while doing so.

Leprous stench, it seemed likely to have drawn from wherever it could, always of a mind of its own, the scent was null, foul and full of itself. Always coming on through reeds, always edifying what it could before coming in. They were drawn then, at the moment, when they sounded the alarm. And various shouts emerged before he had gotten there, only to be able remember but naught. For what was going there, always of a mind to spare, there were lost dreams that could not be; wouldn't belong to them.

A few men approached at first, briskly cutting the corner. It was evenly set, whomever walked but dead and would go forth, the strongest. They had been avoided, yet along the way. Twenty more steps, not to say.

'Come in already, stop slacking doc.'

Brim was the first one to greet him. But most importantly Dock was of a mind that didn't make any sense. He was but cut around the finger and wouldn't understand why they were there. Hiding in the one place they'd look, the supply room.

'Listen, I don't like this either, doc. You know me as one who suffers of claustrophobia, but.'

He stopped in order to listen to the sounds.

White pavement locks on the floor, they elevated the second one and pushed around unfathomable gore-boxes until, at the end of the storage room there seemed. Within their grasp and reach, to open; then entered the façade of a door; but came to see, within eye-to eye the reach, he bore.

But a strange device, the end of a land-mower, in his chest, pushed around, with many tongues a haughty, they were but drawn to this singers of which faced was lances, cut-through paper trails of ruddy skin that melted. A heap on the beck of its chest, he but managed to drawn then in as well.

‘Come to see already of my wrong-doing?’

‘What have you done so far?’

‘I’ve but listened to the fading sound around the tracks. There’s a light down there.’

But he only pointed at a hole with a ladder, leading to a single candle light.

‘You need to go down there, I promise, you’ll be safe.’

Although neither of them could listen to it speak for more than it was necessary, let alone, would their hearts shine through it and be lost. He had drawn them there such as the likes of a Faustian pact, a such. But the soul in exchange for safety from what would last. Denied by one another, ever so, one touched upon the subject, as Dock would know.

‘You cannot expect us to trust you, right? Look at you, deformed, inhumane creature, look-a-like and swollen, dead thing that snores in fiddles.

I cut, I could but bloat the sounds if I were forced down there, but I couldn’t deal with everyone else being so near me.’

For he feared being trapped and having to listen to them for more than was needed had never crossed his mind.

‘Interesting, why do you suppose we’re here then?’

‘I don’t know, but I suppose you’re supposed to have a clue, isn’t that so?’

‘Maybe, maybe not; but either way, that fiend is not to be trusted.’

‘Then neither of us will go down the ladder then.’

‘Very well, it’s settled.’

Enough was said that it shouldn’t matter whether they went in one direction or another, or settled there, foaming, with the brick in sight. It looked as if it followed through.

‘Careful, Brim, don’t go near it. You know what happens when you do. And I wouldn’t like being the one, who, you know, touches it.’

‘Bad things happen when you touch the brick, Brim, listen to the doctor.’

No one else joined in. It was only Dock and. Hard to see. Hardly mattered in any case. They were neither there for pleasure nor for business, and either one of them, in his place would’ve smashed the brick with a jack-hammer if they were so closely inclined to do so. It was that initial mindlessness which pushed them to ask.

‘Who was watching him?’

The creature disappeared and, as bizarre as it sounded, it look both its ladder and its candle. Though it was still dim-lit around the place, as if this were, but, as strange as it was peculiar, a surgery-room light above their heads. It would impede any progress through, as if they were but close to being dead or paid a mind that wasn’t theirs. Days went by that way, or they could go. Unless someone shoved a foot up the door-frame, a few grams around each elation, they were but a happily married couple, all of them. If that made any sense.

‘So it’s unanimous then. We all agree that we need to stamp it out and leave.’

‘Why isn’t the brick moving?’

Can it even hear us?’

‘Silence, everyone!’

Thus spoke Pyrroute, he had but a minute mind that would’ve made him leave if they hadn’t learned of him as to mind. Now he was being constantly watched. It wasn’t helpful, but it had to be so.

‘I think, I think we have a greater problem here, listen.’

They all partook in this strange ritual he asked them to be a part off. It was sudden and in some way, senseless. It didn’t make much of a difference.

It was some kind of adhesive he noticed. Before everyone else could even put their eyes on it, he saw it first. An inorganic thing, not the cement or the peculiar bubbling thing that came out of the brick but something else; a new addition that was there for no reason whatsoever, wailing even. Confusing pores and tiny bubbling bulbs appeared to be barely noticeable.

‘It’s as if I thought, they entered through the brick-house, most likely broke through her as well.’

‘Damn brick-woman sold us off, doc.’

‘Calm down Brim, it’s still too early to draw any kind of conclusion, you know that. Now, breathe in and listen to me.

All of you, take a few steps back. I think it’s safe to say that we’re in a dangerous spot. Yet, the safest.’

‘How is that so?’

‘The way I see it, if we head outside, we’re going to be followed around like they are, the men who were rushing through the halls from the outside with the newly brought in patients. They’re not aware of their presence yet.

Which leaves us in a tightly locked supply room that’s but bare of ration and in-between both sides, which means that we’d be sitting ducks waiting to be flanked from both sides.’

‘You don’t know that.’

Ophelia said, she looked at the doctor’s eyes. Still dilated.

‘Plus.’ She continued, now vaguely unnerved as well. Both of her arms were interlocked, then released, suddenly. ‘We’re in the open now, aren’t you?’

‘And?’

‘And, as I was thinking, that means that sooner or later, something like this could happen, that thing, whatever it was. It could appear again. That never happened outside.’

‘What about the nursery?’

‘That’s different, that’s different, those weren’t human to begin with.’

‘I think she does rise a good point.’

The doctor said. ‘But, we’ll have to take our chances here, do you understand? Otherwise, who knows what might happen next. I stand to think we’re truly running out of options if we wait. Either there or here, so.’

‘What then?’

They thought. Judging from the general direction from which the brick came. If someone were to look at the emergency plans, the brick must’ve come from the north-eastern corner, going straight ahead north-west, at the middle of which it began turning south whereas it went straight down where they currently rested. But if that was so, it meant that the front of the room the doctor was, on which slab lay the body, the missing head would point towards the general direction in which the supply room was. And as they had initially entered, their right arms would point right back at the throat, upon the entry, without having considered the fact that they may’ve turned around. That direction also being, further than the south, then a straight stretch up-front towards the western side, where the exit was as well as where the patients and the men came out off.

Regardless of it, there was something else the matter. They were there for some reason or another, of wont.

‘We’re going to have to move along the lines.’

There were no insides, or inner frames behind the structure.

As it happened, they merely walked through the dim-lit barely traversable rooms that were out of power. There was no need to refer to anything else but the hollow.

Out in the open, different side, a little flock was moving around, without understanding what went on through their heads. Always missing and always dead.

‘Why must we spend our time here then?’

‘Here, my screwdriver. I don’t have.’

‘I think I got a light.’

They walked on foot, under the light of matches.’

Something wrong about the hospital, and the hospice rancid, rooms unlit, they walked on their feet and crawled like babies. One at a time, with Pyrroute in the middle, at this point, out of everyone, Brim was the only one who managed to get his hands on what he wanted. The brick was there, as opposed to it being anywhere else.

It had to be said, eventually. The voice from the radio never came from the radio, it was divine. Every radio in the hospital was broken. Every hospital in the world was just as broken as the radio. There was no voice. And it seemed likely that everyone bore an implant beneath their ears, which came through, with the snail-long eye tail behind their drums, into their guts, forming smaller fetus-plants with the face of deformed flies bearing small helmets of bone-cartilage. They were the ones speaking, always.

Doctor Pyrroute knew that. He had extracted his and managed to use a small knife to put an end to him. A scar was left on his chest, going as far as to cross his side and get around his throat as well as his face. They were walking, still. Another thing, one of the Ones that were inside the room, they’ve already acquired the patients on the bed. As a matter of fact, they were an off-shot, on the side from being dead. And they looked like it. For all intensive purposes, they were caught by their ankles and moving with a strange convulsion. Flat blobs beneath beating the corpses on top, marching in weird formations, crossing bridge-fat people who allowed themselves to be walked on. And all of this happened in the dark.

They bore multiple eyes that absorbed the dark in, constantly, yet they could not take it away. That’s how they knew where to go and what to avoid. Seeing these strange vacuum illusions in the dark appear. Out of nowhere, a their feet, they’d near something close, the clog. Inside their guts, they’d know it. Eventually they’d come. Within the coming of a step, Jonathan Culprit suddenly rose, not by his choice, but he was forced to do so in the air. His chest had wreathed out, he was pulled inside that dark cloud, and pulled in as if he were in outer-space, but stopped. What he did to him. In the likes. Was but take the bulk of his chest which hid the dark of his insides. While in that tiny area where there was a gap, where a peculiar incision mark was done, everything was pulled in, as a raisin.

His head had bobbed, his skull and brain, his heart, and everything else started reeling in until he was withdrawn by the dark itself, whom grabbed what it could when ripped the pieces apart.

‘Don’t go near it.’

‘He’s killed our friend.’

‘He was disposable, now move.’

‘We’re going to die.’

‘And we will do it unless you shut your filthy mouth.’

Now leave, go on, slowly.’

They were but for an eye’s worth not trying to get into it. They lost the upper hand, they couldn’t see them but felt their long arms extend and grasp everywhere around them.’

‘Relax, they’re flaccid, numb. I can still feel the effects of the sedative having taken place. There’s no certain way they’ll be able to make it through this.’

‘You sure about it?’

‘Deadly certain.’

Or at least that’s what he hoped for. He was in for teeth and bit in, then spat. They all saw it. They all moved a step again, as to distance themselves as quickly as they should. Neither of them was able to make it. Nor would they understand how to decipher what he said.

His mouth looked reeled in like a slice of meat. Mean arcs could be seen on it, projected, like tiny blots of mockery, teeth were gone but still jittering around as if they were but little spirits of their own. They were tired, it was too tiresome to accept, especially since there was no reason yet to accept it.

‘We’ll be dead within the hour.’

Outside the hallway, the dim-lit, highly colored lights of awe, where they kept the other patients. Every new-comer, many, child, pregnant-woman were tied to a giant box-like carnival- hope, darkened by black foam as its edges were crisp and bubble-like, slightly enfolded in the most peculiar seething blends. They were there, in part, in head, in eye and fingers which were made inside of them. The foam only stretched, there was no point in seeing the wheel turn around but keep them yet sunken. Some of them were worn as well, they could be seen by their eyes. Drawn away, they could but dream in silence.

‘We have another cargo, at least eighty of them, today.’

‘Put them in the same place. I think, eventually they’ll settle in. We could eat after.’

They put spoons in their peculiar-square beds. On top of every single one but wax-statuesque cysts, so they could spread on top of them. The wheel of the carnival was pleased. It sang disease. At times it wouldn’t do to spare. They could but rip away a foot.

‘Saw it, we need to feed the children of the walls.’

As soon as he opened his mouth and referred to them, they came out. With strange platform like organic receding flatness, they were put down and lowered as if on lichen antlers-curved oil extractors, which were attached to their backs like wrapped around the web insects eaten in part, their heads but came out, every single time, but hung out as if they were but the heads of suits, revealing nastily elongated thing fingers which picked off from the distance, lunging at the human parts. Eaten what they were given, while in fear of what the men might do if they were caught.

‘Don’t overextend, you hear? Just because you’re children, that doesn’t mean I won’t go hard on you. I shall be elated ever so more if I were to chop parts of you and put you so.’

Back into the hole and throng of agony where disgust was but a bloated trap, iron-wrap, on one of their backpacks, the Hospital guards were armed. They bore radio-waves. In this case, they very much existed and kept the leprous-brains from falling off. A lobe was chipped off, but the brute didn’t notice. He was not fair skinned but a dark-dead cold purple gray which only lead to one eye that was read and one that was white. This applied to every guard in sight.

Eventually they would lose their sight in one of them, since the coagulation would eventually blind even the best man who could not prevent that from happening. Always, and always lock the doors. They turned but could not understand. For what was, moreover to be called, a bore of trunks-solid disappearing hollows in the ceiling, being caused by the wind, they finally shut the door up and saw the children weep out of pain and the deranged act which took away everything from them. This was undeserved. They spat everything they could and hid inside the nerves of the air-shafts, slowly dragging through the absent dark, the ceiling almost gone, where they lay now, pulled in part. Stuck on their way out.

‘You should’ve. Nevermind.

At least be glad everyone here is fine. I can’t think of any better day to put this on, but.’

He took another pill.

‘Are you all right Clerk? Still haven’t got used to the job, have you?’

‘Never, I will never be able to do it; I can’t think of any better day. I think I’m missing something, I think it’s my hands, you understand?’

Of course he couldn’t. He was washed-up. All too swollen around the arms, the saw had entered him and did not cut. That was a bag sign. He could already see the body-scans detecting it, having been absorbed by him, within his molecules being iron, or some kind of malignant unidentifiable alloy that would tear him to shreds. It was ever-so near him now. Always to his mind, he wore his skull out and his face, half on a shoulder, half on the other, like a part, from which there came out his half-nose, his teeth froze and part of the jaw. Yet he didn’t mind the way he looked. Now.

To deal with them.

‘Say, Clerk, since you’re the guest of honor, what can we do to them?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘Do we put them out of their misery or can we hope the carnival will take them home.’

Where, on the other side they would be hanged, and made to dance erect as the lower throats would be removed, and bodies thin but grow roots channels from the top, spread and filled with malignant blood vessels that float, blimps which bear the faces of the carnival servants and those who rose inside them.

For no one would attend the carnival, they were not there to entertain a thing. But look upon the wheel fiend off which spines were but the cylinder which pushed them in, bodies very much impaled. Praying that the forests stopped moving, as they did, through the fence and through them, as if they were never to be stopped, always moving, then disappearing as if on command.

Where the sky was but a giant sun, of which light stopped being produced but was being slowly eaten as if in part. From it they would constantly seek satisfaction as they'd see the various pits formed in. Wept by the cherubs dancing, the buildings of disease falling in. Of which plot was but no land. Fall would be destruction, if they made it that far, before crumbling from the pressure.

There was a lightless hope that followed through, it managed to flow through them, and seep inside their thinner troughs.

'We cannot allow them to get past that point. We already lost twenty of them, at the back of the cradles.'

'They're not fish and we're not on top of a fishing boat.'

Yet the patients were tied on nest and would await for something to happen so. And as such they but listened to the walls, which told them, if anything at all, don't try a thing, don't break a wind and careful. They will see you every move, even your slightest wink.

'Well, I concede then.

You take charge.'

Clerk would not be denied, nor could he understand how was it that they refused to say anything at all. He was taken of a notice then pushed around to leave the room.

'Think about it.

And lock the damn door on your way out, do you understand?'

'Good morning, I love you.'

Sweet lord, she was there. Right next to the door, his face was bare, and barren, seeing his wife. But she was but a single leper, on the body of a moving rock of strange contorted beings that were merely settling inside her vivacious nest. As she finally spread her arms, like the sight of a bubonic death, the angle of a deathless haze, had suffered no less than to throw the mask from on top its face. Despite the distance being ever-so near, it threw a speck of dust across its body, which was thrown across the floor until nobody found him after.

Clerk was but drawn to it, the strange rooted speck of a spear, which had squashed the heads, inside its nest, of every being, only to draw it here, at the head-point to be. Where it speared away the body of Clerk, before he could see.

They were left in there, to decide.

'This should count as a deicide. I cannot be thrown down there, I cannot, I am, but a.'

His voice was lost, instead he'd spare.

Back into the dark they moved. This was an authorized area they shook and entered through. It was such a hard desire they felt, being drawn there. Ahead of them, lay but a click. It was revealed, they were in.

'Does no one lock their doors any longer?'

'How do you suppose we've come to this in the first place?'

Radio announcement? At this hour? No, it wasn't that, it was a codified message, that was placed under the desk, they pulled out the lamp only to see a name embed on.

No, not a name, miss-sight.

'Let me see this, Ophelia, I'm trying.

It's not a name, woman, it's a number.'

That was the reason for the confusion, the first initials ASN. Eight-six-four-zero-zero-zero-three-five-eight-four-eight-one-one, it was read out loud. They didn't know the meaning yet, but it was that sudden hinge which was suspicious.

'How did you know it was going to be there, Ophelia?

IT was the first thing you thought off checking.'

They were unaware of it year, closing off the second city, closing the eight one, closing every major city out of cold. Collage-bones put through her. Large dead-cold, everywhere around, years spent in death, always there. Tiny schools blocked, no partitioned world, but voices dead spoken at last. Homes being broken, unwashed clothes and a mark on every man and torn child, a man feared for his wife, his child, ever so-called through by the hospital. But every time they called back, dead-ends. Madison was near-death, pneumonia stuffed inside her bed. Various discussing men, always talking of the possibilities of a fire-den.

The woman tired on her back, sipping on a block of coffee, stop. The first set of confusing weeks took a toll on every one's mental toll. Every car blocked, walked around, old people dead, spoken to. Always taking the lead, walking like heard out of on their feet in order to spare. Resources were sparse, swearing. Potatoes-supplies being spread; old lady put around in a small fence, and put through with her head it, stomped, into the gutter, head-first. Lost value for every mark; entered ten million dead-first to be heard of.

Everyone had to eat, everyone was a despot. Heaviness on the fridges, unable to breathe, they begged and worshipped them, if only they would start spreading heat. Feet and food until a week's worth was gone. No one could go far, past the walls of icicles and touched for scum-plots. No one could understand what happened through. Or where they went around and what to do.

Winds were but spreading on, and each time they begged for something to come. It wasn't winter yet, but it would go colder. Wild men carrying their motorcycles in, trying themselves as they would put the fire canisters out, on a whim, against the open stoves, looking with pride, at flower-pots, broken to side, by little pebbles as they played around to pass the time.

‘One of these days, I’ll ride on a patch of fire.’

‘That’s not snow.’

‘What?’

‘It’s not ice, it’s not snow, I don’t think you understand the situation we’re in.’

‘Straight, on, get down.’

A single tiny rock had almost broken down the window. At a sound, they looked, a bullet, shot right through it. On both sides.

‘You saved me.’

‘Only by chance, I was startled. It went on by itself.’

They stared at it, inside the shattered window, the cracked rock, there stood two bullets that were met and blocked.

‘We won’t have to fix the building anymore.’

‘That’s great, at least we’re getting somewhere, I think.’

Of all the days this couldn’t have been worse.

Inside the doctor’s office, various edifices on every book and every single thing placed around and placed on top the mannequin, the knighted armor, the anatomy model, the man who was as soulless as he seemed, but very much alive and schizophrenic, the statue, and the drawn human on the wall. All of whom were but looking around, while trying to eat what they could before their time had come, and let alone approached.

It was a strange cocoon sight, like statuesque-larvae embryos erected from the ground, upon which texture stretched the ground and hands and arm, the man and every object in the room as well. Their eyes were but out of air. They were out of reach. The sky was out of their stretched fingers and on to them, always watching how they pushed and wreathed. Every object in the room floating immediately as to make it past them, while, through their weird projections, fingers would wrap. Everyone veered towards the floating lamp.

Before the watch, every statue and every man, every mannequin and every figure was but not affected, split instead, they stood like giants surrounding the cocoons, trying their hands as to wrap and fashion them around in order to be through. Formed, and looming ever closer, they but made to stay. A hand remained and would’ve come their way to crush and touch. Better watch what appeared to be, their head split off, they wanted. But to destroy the lamp before they darted towards the numbers.

‘Memorize then, we need to memorize then.’

An echo rose, and was heard through every curve and small head-hill which pushed around. No one wanted to see it happen, how they gutted, their surroundings stop it. Dock thought, this needs to stop.

‘I can’t stand it.’

His sight deformed and it commenced. They were slowly drawn together, making the head-leap before they reached it. All but trapped, like bitter lice-leeches, inside the bodies then.

But he was out, with the lamp in his hand, they jeered then, and hardly spared, not a single second would go to waste without them struggling as hard as they could, shaking off the feeling that they should not be there.

‘Perfect, I think nothing could’ve come as close to this. No, it couldn’t have. I’m glad we stumbled upon this room. Now I can perform my experiments on you.’

‘We helped you.’

‘By slowing me down.’

‘You cannot do that to us, you’re not a monster.’

‘As most bodies I seem to work up end up becoming marble. Therefore, I do not think either of you is alive.’

I need a confirmation.’

‘Start with me, sick-o!’

‘I was going to start working on you Brim and for that reason, I had you prepared. If you were to spare a sight and look below your belt, above it and right around the chest, as well as the pest that is on top your shoulder, you’ll see it.’

Ah, he noticed. Pyrroute had already implanted a metallic cartilage inside his chest. It started growing on multiple sides already, or mightily spread more likely. He had been, unkindly set on trying to ask and wagered something would happen if he only pulled him off it.

‘It’s like a tiny life-support machine, I think. Don’t think too much about it now, I’m simply going to pull it.’

Before they could protest, the wraps came around their mouths as if wrongly put and spaced, as they entered through their gums, digging even deeper inside until they forced the mandible out. Their insides jack-o-lanterns by the looks of it, at least a carved-in top of roof of their mouths, formed as the weeping scum-tumor of a sound-making machine which started forming in the area of their nostrils, cranial-space and the mouth, connected with the ear implant. Only the fetuses would talk.

Ophelia-child spoke first.

‘I must apologize for interrupting you for this is the Radio talking.’

But we’ve come upon a strange realization.’

‘You’re breaking off, you broke character.’

‘It doesn’t matter any longer, Pyrroute will listen either way.

As I was saying, this is the Radio talking. You may be inclined to stop what you’re doing there and wait for a little while.’

‘What for? I’m the lord of the mundane, I shall go on with this as I please.’

‘All right. You may think that now, although in a few hours, you will regret killing everyone in this room. Look around you.’

‘I know what you’re trying to do, Ophelia, Radio, whatever it is. This isn’t going to work. That thing about being caught between two flanks, It was merely a bluff.’

‘You’re sweating.’

‘I’m not.’

Yet he looked at them. He wasn’t as sure of his safety as he had been before. Since, it appeared like the split statues were, still barely put together on both sides. They were close to falling off at any second now. And it didn’t serve much to worry about them getting off since he realized how inevitable it really was.

‘I could kill them, then leave. Neither of them is going to trust me from this point on.’

‘We never have.’

Ham Stowe said, he was but unaffected by that little thing inside the side of his gut. He appeared to completely ignore it after that.

‘A few more pushes and we’re off. We’re not your enemies.

Listen, open the door and make a run for it. After they break through, there will be a haze and nothing more. You need to understand that there’s no other chance for you to make it. Kill our hosts, we’ll shout.’

‘And bring on what?’

‘Don’t you know?’

‘I’d rather not.

I’d rather not talk about it now. I don’t think I like it here, fine, you’ve got yourselves a deal. We’ll shake it through.’

‘Only when we see each other again.’

‘Lock the door.’

On the way out, not more than it should take them, there were the pyre-structures, enfolded and encrusted, floating up and down like spores. One of them was there, waiting for him. It opened, he went in. There was a seat-with worm-like needles. He took the pain while they entered in. Bleeding only when asked to, there.

Then came the walking out, on the centrifugal force being thrust again the wall inside their guts and hearts; incapable of hearing, they were but made out of a piece and refused to understand what went on.

Two men were in a room, there was supposed to be a doctor in.

Farther than this, farther, surrounded by eight dim-lit un-powered doors, forgetful of what was going on. A man with a watch attached to his gut passed the hour. He was there, unable to think of anything else. His tongue was ripped. He pulled away, and would see whether or not her life still poured out.

‘I don’t know what to say.’

‘Check her pulse again. I think she should be checked.’

‘Then you check her then, I’m too tired.’

‘Blasted buffoon, did you forget the reason behind us being here?’

‘No, have you?’

He pulled a gun, aimed at the patient, unloaded it, only a slug remained. Splashes away against one of the documents attesting for the MD, his face being taken away, they didn’t know what to do.

‘I won’t leave this room.’

His soul and body deteriorated then. They were both of one piece, struck together as it seemed unlikely for either, or. Put on a charade, played with themselves, before the clock spanned eight. It was time to decide. What was to be done about her, now that her eyes were open and she came to move on.

‘I don’t think it’s going to happen.’

She was still there, listening, becoming the trough, as if on a planet, turned around, her body but a jelly, of a cut. With many slices everywhere around, as her body became tiny long-thin legs. She moved around the room for a while, drawing every object she could, seeing it dwarfed by the strange weight the room forced on top of them, it pushed itself down. Only but a few meters in. They were desperate to get a word in but would not listen.

‘Ah, I see, there must be a reason for either of you to be here, shouldn’t there?’

‘Who’s that?’

Bump on the shoulder, his hand wrapped on the pad, he pointed not at the strange pirouette, but at the conflated eyes and mouth and crow’s nest head which drew from the wall as if from pudding. Its eyes were split and from inside rose smaller feet, like hers. Extending ever closer as she was being taken home.

‘Thank you for returning my child. You must be blessed. I bless you.’

‘Well, you don’t need to thank us.’

Woman still bleeding off her forehead; it was pleasant looking, tasting her. It was so sudden. But each of them got a lick. Salt, like coins, or bags of sand, felt everywhere around her body before she was pulled back. Both of them only waved back at it as he was destined not to return. A cheerful match, the Hossgrd tried shooting the thing off the wall. Seeing stains of sand-like gut, pouring out slowly, it was not as expected. They would seethe in their place for a short period of time before it erected itself backwards and left to space.

‘I eat horses.’

He is but trying to pull off the wood-carpet and the curtain main while trying to expand. A room would be made in the dark. They but both realized that with her out of the way, there was time to fill out, somehow. But most importantly, they had to fill the other rooms with light.

‘You grab one end, I’ll grab the other.’

That is how they picked up the light, as they started carrying it over to the other room, slowly replacing the dark, until they had been done. Then.

Stay back.

All of the sudden he unleashed a spray and pray, and many to convey a bullets along the way between the walls, crushing them before he could even come upon them and stumble on his feet, at all. He didn’t understand how they came upon it. Always marching in wrong directions; they detested the reaction and would to be, not understand where they spent their times in. Little more.

‘On the right. I think that should do it.’

They were but messing with the switch now, once the wall had been remodeled, it was after all, an enclosed great structure. Made out of touches and put-together set-behind, wrapped round heads that ate what they could. In doubt they tried to advance through the dark once paranoid struck in. There was no good light surrounding them, touching, only the one that got infested by the such a long absence of light, that could not be dealt with. By no means were they prepared for what was about to happen there. Ripped apart, in shred and leg, without remembering who touched them yet. As for the bubbles that could not be seen, they were but theirs and pulled, but thin. Against a room, in the distance, the hit could be heard. It started bouncing around, hitting it, again and again until their bodies turned, and men detested, patients awakened, all in shambles. Peace brought to ruin. Before they could awake from what they were doing, chaos emerged.

Someone had also been present during this scene of disaster, a truck driven in through the hospital wall, ridden through as it managed to almost crush the pillars holding the second floor from running in. The dilapidated structure shook. A duck was sprawled upon the dust window-sill, the pane being barely removed. A pond in front of it and now, open lighters, held by rotten hands, and on the other side, skeleton. In the pond, the ducks were dressed in bodies of geese, determined to survive, despite having the head light pointed at them. Malignantly inclined to move out of the way, they almost shattered. No surroundings could deal with what was going on or what was the matter.

They were cut off the other side of lake, in it but poured something as falsely flat as but origami ducklings in a dissatisfied rake. Shapes were humble, but one of the men survived. He pulled off the lighters off and managed to pull himself back together, right from being ripped apart. He had but one wish, to go away. When the time had drawn near, he would not satiate but a single thirst to have him lay where he stood.

‘Damn it, damn it, damn it, come in.

Is there anyone here?’

Rolled up the windows on both sides, both dead-men on a seat, curtain-blinds, dark inside. A melon-doll with one bright head, it pointed to the right. And right ahead.

A knock on the window, two followed through, pushing against the small rear-view, with his chest, his leg on the other side, another one twenty miles ahead, standing. Fat, growing, deformed, contorted, pushing out, as it slowly revealed a small lighted sting inside of it, coming out, slowly. It dreamed, and from its dreams came a nightmare. Surrounded by a light, and a small pair of colored dots which presented themselves, thrown against the invisible walls surrounding it, the leg stood as if posed for a shot. Multiple photos being taken of it, until blood sang inside, where it started dashing over, with the pane of its surrounding dragged through, as a parachute would, all tied up. Dark specks, still forming, wild ones, shapes, blocks and inside of one a man arose. It wasn’t the same one but the one who planted his face in froze since he knew little of what was going on.

‘You’re free to leave at any time, no one’s stopping you.’

He said at last, but he made his mind, he wouldn’t open the door now. A few more steps in before it stopped. The fake painted wall but cut the man speaking. He wasn’t of a mind to spare anyone of what he was hearing. If he willed it so, the entire grand room would light itself on. As if on a flash, a bang and a lighter, then they’re done.

‘It’s the cafeteria.’

The man had noticed. And it was no different than what he expected it to be. A small light parchment of water coming out as drool, the truck was but struck again, it wouldn’t move. Twisted in the key, won’t start. He is not of a mind, his ear is gone.

‘I’m going to drive it into the wall. Don’t try anything.’

His hand was on but he refused to twist since he knew he would be closely looked onto, and he’d be put at peace. Sooner or later in any case.

There wasn’t much, there was lot. Empty tables, looks of inmates that weren’t there; he wondered just what kind of hospital this was. More likely, shattered hospice. All too kindly, always of a mind, blithely, impolitely he knocked on the door and asked for him to allow him but a single entry. His shoes were tied in head and the dead. Were there, always.

Two feet above, it was as much not, a thin space. Hardly able to crawl inside, moving through it, wild surroundings, parts sealed, on every single side. The spot that was looked for was that. Green door, or a small dome, where they all hid it, explosive started. Another piece fell off, this great one appeared to release a stairway somewhere in the attic-platter. The rounded-drop. The cylindrical-head. IT was had to explain. It looked like the drop of a single giant finger which suddenly curved its last segment over. Flipping off some of the stone off and pushing it deeper into one of the robed for people of the grave. Cement-dead, plenty of them, not a morgue entirely, but where they threw them. An open space, where they gathered. Placed on living bodies that moved about but had no head, instead machines worked them. Carrying the corpses on their backs, while being impaled by spikes.

And the entry leading to the spot was revealed by the explosion and the fall. This was nothing short of a displaced escalator, which pulled them near but never past it.

What appeared to be a large meeting spot was actually but the entry-way to the old-town, the old city, the hold hospital being only eight blocks stopped on top of one another. Flimsy looking.

All too much.

Noise turned them into deranged things, as their arms but pushes them to act. Turning around like turtles as they simply splashed their spines against the metal. There was but a constant reflux that entered and came. And little more armament spread between them. It was hardly some place to be. There was no one around seeing, since they were simply disjoined and pulled away from hardly seeing.

Ashes were put in jars down there, black jars with specks of words, notes and receipts hanging outside. At least twenty names for everyone who recently dies. They were jotted down by the Scribe. He was of a little mind and appeared to be worked on and pushed around. He was taken by throat. He was taken at home. He was one of the last inhabitants whom was spared by death only for it to be pulled in again on him. Beaten though and cut behind.

He heard it as well, the first sign of the truck. It kicked in, largely provoked. He could not see any hope for them being stopped, as they climbed on death-ropes. How else could they have arrived there?

Dumped from above, through a system of shafts whereas the grinders were stopped, they never knew what lay down there. No smell came out, no sign of any release. And as of yet, with this winter, or this sudden come of the cold, there was nothing they could do to prevent themselves from latching on.

‘There comes the first one.’

Of which he rose, the body of the Minister Jones was but still latched mostly obtuse. An arm entered through one spike, the other one was but lowered, his chest heaving up in a most benign manner. He could not see it. But the scribe felt something inside the man. A yellow murk that was brought by the Cleaner-Yher. There was no other thing he spoke about it. Madly sounding, the smokes were down. Then they climbed. Nothing stopped them, there would be nothing waiting for them in the front. Some stones had been stopped and made to be. Gutted out, hiding inside of them, as much could be seen.

That’s how the entered the Hospital.

They were in the room.

And bodies shattered, large in halves, but not the ones inside.

That included Brim who seemed to have forgotten about that probe inside his chest. It had a neck of hiding itself a few millimeters away while picking up whatever it could. That was but a testimony on how quick of blunt and little thought it were. Living on bread, it was just as well as one could do. Degradation touched music, there would no flutes, no pianos, not floorboards, no drum sets, no guitars, nothing, whistling consumed air and lungs, it ate them. And those who tried it spat blood. There was something blood. A telephone, an old firm that was old. Everyone in this building was old.

Regarding their stay inside, it was peculiar, waking up from this dream. Strange as it was, they could but stand on the side and listen to what went on, wondering, where was?

There was the vivisection and the large part of the Hospital which was cut while being reanimated. Parts of every single lifter, the side of the elevator, cabinets, some of the beds and a few other chairs had formed its ribs. Largely exposed as it were, there was but no question resting any longer, none that would come to mind.

Large steel valves worked the peculiar metallic long arms that wrapped themselves around it. The steel cutters were of a forge, yet they were brought there and put as if they were wrapped around a textile cutting band, plasma cutting machine slugs, all pushing down, forcing it to become naught. An outer cover, mainly wreathing, the ground splinted on every side. The door was ripped from the hinges and thrown about. Glorious thing that it were, a few cameras were destined to be put on it, while watching carefully.

How much it had wrought for itself, in that small frame of time it had been alive. With a tail formed at the end of the room, it managed to attach itself to the wall, actioning a crane-head with which it pulled a cargo door holding cell from below the ground. Many men stored in it, released as their prison was but pushed through the walls. Breaking itself apart, as the reanimated room could feel the pain, being ajar to everything, but the bolts that were pushing through her now.

And while this was but strange, sacrifices had to be made, as the cell released them as water tanks, floating through water until they finally came through between her and the slugs. They stopped advancing and but a single man managed to survive. Somehow, in a state of paralysis he could still move around and breathe, both his hands but ripping layers of skin with every grasp they took around.

Still moved by what appeared to be a knock in the distance. Within every beat, he could hear a truck outside. He died thinking someone was on their way.

But most importantly he died.

And he was the only man inside the cell that had a chance to think, without being instantly killed. Though he had suffered, he had failed to see whether or not there were other survivors. Most likely he would've thought of something, telling them. Run, towards the door. I can still see it, I think, come on.

Yet they it drew on above itself and would continue pushing on until there was but no way to stop it any longer, being drawn from the looks of it, to a special place, near which there was a nest-of colors many other reanimated rooms appeared to have flown towards, feeding on the small windows that were grown inside of it, which in turn would even further confirm that the size of the Hospital was enormous, wide-spread and would most likely house at least eighteen hundred million patients, if one were to fill every floor, every room and every level, including the long stretches which had been used to house some of the vehicles that were in need of storage. Some of them were still there, though their heads and lights were twisted and eating from the heads of the giant patients which were in the rooms.

It was a sight which was uncanny. Since their exposed skulls and lobes appeared more like the twists of rounded hills broken at the top, vehicles being stuck in an attempt to get over them, when the time around and the strange scent of dead-men came on. No one noticed this, since, instead of being locked, the doors were hermetically sealed, chained, barricaded and proof sealed for a small bomb that might come near and go through it, something was set in there.

It wasn't explosives.

Their guts were made, fashioned and wrapped around biological sacks that pushed around them. Carrying small drills, some of them started burying themselves down, and on a whim appeared to have killed a man on their way through the air shafts. Entered through until they couldn't be helped, but aroused by it they wallowed in pain, met by the safe.

Strange documents, broken through, some files were but hounded figures which wore robes. Not as small as they appeared but hundreds of them buried near. They flocked as soon as they felt its danger. Wallowed through its pain while gathering about it, as soon as they could but surround it, then they started chew through the metal pan.

Below them, the floor was almost gone, they stood but in a shack, a world war two looking, gone around disaster looming around.

Their hands exposed, long fingers, fat but rose. Wrapped around the vehicle but shred it, before they could get it over with, its guts stood out, burnt and embed. From their slumber, they had been aroused, by the bickering cry of a broken child.

'Ah, but a jest, I've taken the heart of an infant. Now he's dead.'

'But he's a machine, is it not? '

'Of course it is.'

Therefore was it brought nowhere else.

They were but exposed, wore long claws which rose, ripped the shell to shreds, kill it before it could lay a wheel on the safe, contorted its guts, covered the hole as they restored the room to its proper standing. Then there was a plain disease, they prayed to the safe for they put in ribs. A lot of them, but lied about there being documents.

All but bore small, dry lip-textures small heads, and weird features. And would kill anyone who looked at them for too long, hence why the hatred had become; such a peculiar thing it were.

'The frog leaps from one thing to another.

The frog is my mother.

So said the Radio.'

And the peculiar structure Pyrroule walked in was but crawling away in the distance like a little cry baby. Sworn to the roots that grew around and would to do something if it got in the way and would eat a part of him unlikely to be said; they followed but a scent once they had regained their senses. It was not time to act in a deprave manner. But Ophelia had ran away by herself, she could be surrounded by her lover, who was a man who had died in a bed, ripped off from her heart. Pushed away, as she could but not understand what went on.

There she lay alone. Her sleep was but a throne, but ailed by sleep. A tightly knit she but walked around of blind surroundings. She but had come to shake and walk away. Would not convey but what to say to him, as he appeared. Not a specter, but a wince. She had met him in clothes that were of borough-wings, of soul taking, ripped away. Her heart would shatter, but she would stay.

White turns to sun-colored, as winter but becomes a desert storm.

There was the laugh, shaken through hall and hall. Toxins, everywhere, pushed down people's throats. Worsened by the weather.

'Smell, breathe, open your mouth now, an incision's about to happen. Blink if you can, I won't repeat myself. The cut's about to be incredibly deep, enough to perforate your low jaw and possible some of your inner.'

Stopped, right in the act he could not understand what entered him. He'd always be on point when it came to surgeries and this was no normal man. He was manufactured, a human of export. Born in human trafficking boxes, then attached to a lower body in the factory-oratorium, ended up here because of a concussion he seemed to have suffered on the lower back side of his arch.

It was a given that he was but pulled out of it, then messed around. Pinned on the ground and made to feel everything for himself, but this was not the right time to talk about it, nor to see.

'He needs his vocal cord reattached.'

'Why isn't he under anesthesia?'

'Natural immunity to it, perhaps? I can't tell, but his antibodies react violently to everything we've set him on.'

No IV needle into him either. His vein looked charred.

It was empty, since he was old and worn out. And set in inside, he had a plume-ball, needed to be thrown, pushed around.

The other Wednesday, he lost a worked out organ that had grown to the side of his chin. The problem as that they cleaned his bowels, his chauffeur was there, present during the surgery. His car was but destroyed. No living relatives, behind the glass-pane, cone. Numbers were hot-ironed in the glass. He was too busy reading them to care about how the man was being torn apart and made to do with. It took only a few hours for him to kick back in the wheels and fully get it. A single thing. A dopamine pill, administered with a rack thrown against his head.

‘Theirs is no pill, only pain.’

It was plain to see that he was bleeding. Open-short sighted ends, everywhere. Frost of blinds, always he curtains.

‘I think we’re almost onto something here, attach the hooks.’

From each corner, they but pulled, as chains and pushed around the tombstones to which they were attached, dragging them over. It was warmer. Too warm, too dire, hot and cold around noon a clock. Always staring at it, half a page, a document tried on, reeled in. Watched for, and set. They were eating from inside of him, putting themselves on part with a quilt and a dead man who was drank from a star. He was dead, he was but a feet off, the trail, but looked benign.

‘Cut the pig already, I want to see some blood. I want to taste it now, I can feel it on my tongue.’

‘Long recede?’

There was no word on it just yet, they were trying themselves, but never appeared, not to be dead, or be called on them. They could not understand the intricacies of a surgery, yet they opened.

Where she was.

Ophelia thought for a few moments, she considered this and eventually saw a way out of it. Even where she neared, there was but little hope she could fear the gut-throngs she had to swim through to get to it. Around her there lay a transparent dome-like protrusion of glass-panes that formed the initial tunnel she went through. Large cacti-spike laced around throat-makers were around her, having their hands wrapped around it. Their arms were but giant-fish gripping things, which held one another by their teeth.

Peculiar head-trench, split on top as if a cannon had shot through it, leaving a trail where tears grew out of, eating what they could. It grew forth leading to the entrance to an offshoot from inside the open-side corridor pushing through one of the hospital wings.

Large platform leading to a tiny closed room, like the control chamber in an airport tower, where there is an elevator, going down a few floors, to the cargo area, in which there lay a plane covered in bloated growths of skin, spreading everywhere, within in, but the insides of a cave, leading deeper into a chasm-like tunnel that pushed down into an inner large stomach-like dirt-skin grand hall, where there’s an altar surrounded by a pool forming a ninety degree counter clockwise rotated c. Where the altar is beneath a canopy held by rib-like formation that appeared to force her into flight, she hadn’t walked there by choice but had merely levitated as she was being slowly disemboweled and reformed. A piece for every sworn for bobbling substance spectral-yellow gut-like Cain figure that entered her after.

She was but starting to recite, from every page, there were no words, but numbers, of the same kind like the ones that had been written underneath the lamp, some of which had been stolen from this and abandoned down the flight of the lightless hole she had flown through.

It was so, they had waited for her there, to absorb it all. For she was chosen, after all, of her background in mathematics and physics, be it obscure that much was known. Split apart, sunder by the minute figures spreading around her cornea as she was but trying to mess around with every pattern she could see until nothing could be stopped, the beings. Being what they were, but worn around, it was just how they saw the world through her. As they asked, to meet her equations and be met back; it was something that was almost called upon her, as a flower. Looming around to speak with them, almost instinctively drawn to them, not to lose a fraction of her mental power, but she was worn after all, used to call upon everything, nor should she. By anything else.

It was all uneven how she could not understand, and how everything worked against her before she was put in mind, to look out of the way. They would always be there, always of a piece. Always trying to get her to open her feet, which she did, the numbers called her action, but a reaction to their natural girth of putrescence, spread against the walls; ailed, the altar shattered, her body splattered but at least entered through the path. Broken through the drop itself, a cave unmade, through the control room and past the platform, in the tunnel gone, to satiate. Nothing but to stop or slow, a slough which would pierce as one would know. The distribution of diseased-nails, of skin wails, would to be heard. She still was made to rose, from the deeps of a truck, shattered and curled around as its skin emerged, and would hold her inside. As a child to be released, the others drew back, fearing, no longer to feed.

For the deity which had been released, of which form could barely be seen, only if it could mold everything in sight, to make up for everything it could grasp a hold on, not to be called after, they would be made to do, as this disaster. Had it been shallow?

It could not be so, but it had come for what it followed through and wanted to make it, before the sand had slickened in and would become but a red thing, as if the plains of Mars were become Earth.

There, the breaking of the infant shell, had release but Pyrroute as well, whom looked and was made to beg. For such a life as it had been observed, and as to make it so he understood, how close he'd been to make her shook. In plain of organs made to die. In the olfaction bore upon, the rules and laws; of every aspect of this world were made. And the radios were but the voices who called upon the veil which called him to come.

Be brought home to his world, upon which he had cast it all to whence it had been so. Buildings were but pulled to make the mass, and cover for what was lost, be put back in place as they had become him. And would to be, everything he had created were but his again. No longer trained by what appeared to be of man, edifying what could be as well. Torn to it but finally freed, and would to lose himself in the colors of Mars within.

Mars Ascalla then had spared the little man, the doctor, as would have him but regain, and others whom were but spared of the implants which were taken as well and were become. Specks of the red dust which had entered him and would become; look outside for those that joined. Walls of buildings and the courts, the castles and where they were worn, schools and camps but hospitals; yet there was only one doctor to be left alive, and this was but the single base humanity had during that time. Everything else had been raised down and destroyed. For every sea and every tree and every dirt and every more would-to be crafted in ever the more they brought in was done. Forlorn and saw'n through as the likes of which were not there.

He was the dust and would to be red, the planet was but a speck of blue underneath them.

Within the hour, she, awakened, but walked again and would to see eye to eye mistaken with drawings ripped out from inside the womb the canister bag being wrapped out her belligerent shroud, she wallowed, in flight but broken as she were the wings. It strung her to see how everyone would see. Through her wings the eyes and faces, one of a foaming frown with bore its teeth like strange octagons that were shattered and recorded after, with vivid images, the reflections of whose likes were forgotten.

And in her likes and which her wishes, stopped. The lights were turned around and would but come and take a shroud, revealed. As for everyone inside and for the likes of their appeal, never to have been made to be. Not to see anything, the cleaners were but stopped from butchering and be absorbed, cadaverous remains were but of little worth but thrown around instead, no more. In the advent of what had come, many of the Hospital-men who looked upon the patients then were freed of terror, ever so momentarily, for the time. Would come upon her fright to end and allow them to descent, alive.

She but followed through and finally seeing. Eye through a single brick that had come to life and begged to be release, from that uncanny thing, upon a crack, she rose, like a flowering malformation made to be what they called, a statuesque-froze. It was that way she would be preserved, despite the way she looked like, none could shatter what appeared to be swollen underneath, the poise. But numbers that would call upon the reminder that she existed in a time beyond their touch and lo', finally upon a call, she was there.

In front of the man, whom unaware, thought he looked upon a vision of the afterlife which had but met. Would to be and taken and claim his life but then. Would to be after, taken. Would to be forbidden from breathing, mistaken. Would to be, and there be slain. For he hadn't the time to figure out who the figure was and whence it asked for, then again.

'I ask of you to leave me be.

I don't think we met before.'

'I see that you forgot and have come to simply forfeit your life.'

'Why would I do that when I'm so close to finding.'

'What were you searching for?'

'A way out, I knew.'

'Don't shy away from me, I could slit a throat with but slit of my wing.'

And there were still remnants of the machine-gut she was splattered in. There was little more to her being after. She were no female but a husk, somewhere deeper in the hallow of her body, the real Ophelia rested without legs and arms, and a cunt which had grown across her chest and split her face, dead eyes and some skin rings around her throat, instead, eyes pushed around and travelling like tiny salamanders inside the reeks of hollowness that lay so.

And where they stood, where the infant shell had been broken over, it should've been dark. They were at the threshold between four rooms that were interlocked and put through so much pressure from the soil around them. It was unfathomably simple, trying to face the winds of admonition fading. In the tremor of a second, he attempted fading away by flight. He tried his best to run away and get out of sight. But he'd been stopped, solemnly so. As if a wind was put around there, leashes of the likes that put them through and through the ground and rose, only to have him there, beckoned through and begged for release; unfathomably at peace, in some way, but never allowed to convey the emotion that entered his brain.

They gathered.

She had waited and had called upon them. Though some of them were gutted, other released and others so. In the terms of the likes, they had approached.

Clerk was but one of the worst-looking offenders but he would not be as forlorn as if to know what had happened instead. He was but torn apart and walked upon bare-formations she had created to have filled the gaps. Which looked like statue-sides, half-masks, prosthetics, while being textured as desaturated yellow sacks with little spots of white and black, transparent, as to look as if they were covered in some kind of dirt-blot. Ripped apart, but never endowed to show any kind of thing that may be faded upon, the missing link between them being that wreathing tongues that pushed out.

Ham-Stowe, Brim, Dock and the others whom were there, all gathered to listen there, not by their likes but, strange.

‘Here, have these knives.

Give them the knives, doctor.’

Purroute was not allowed to think of the idea. He didn't have knives but a lot of scalpels wrapped around his chest by a belt. Worse than that, he feared what could follow after, if she asked them to do as he thought they'd follow through with. It was agony within the second and would to be called, and bore through, a second more. She could not face and faceless, would be the bare, and in him a spot not to spare until he was caught after by the cuts and bled. Like a pig thinking of himself naked on a place of dirt, where he stood along, chasing the bodies of beheaded and limbless women, he had often dreamed off. Peculiar sight and vulgar fading, such a sick mind, but always knowing of himself, ending.

‘I will not give you the satisfaction, as much as I please.’

And before either of them could stop him, and before she could wrap her wings around him, he had but split his belly open only to reveal.

‘You ruined yourself, don't you understand?’

The marble was him and he was but a statue then, with a number imprinted at the bottom of his standing pile of dirt, where he now remained.

‘What of us?’

Everyone else asked, as this Ophelia turned, a dark purple flower in the making. Her skin starting to change from the human fair pink, and but to fall within, she would eventually but come to waste.

‘I’ve come to the realization that there are many things I need to make way through. In order to release so many, I had but to cut him myself.

He will never be released from the number, nor would he be preserved any longer. Instead, like marble by the acid springs, he will have been destroyed and will find no peace wandering around. No body of his own but dust.

In my kindness, I were but to offer him a chance. He could’ve been there, held upon the ground just as he was. But he won’t think now, he won’t suffer either, he’ll be nothing.

After all, who’s deserving of the kindness I impart if not the worst of human kind? ‘

‘What will you do to us?’

Brim asked again, but of all, he had suffered no trail of mind. He didn’t realized how the others’ eyes were fading from the stare. Sooner or later they could be done for and wail. It was just something they could not suffer through, not to see eye to eye or be lost, for a moment’s, die.

‘I suppose I shall release the cleaners and you’ll be cleaned. The floors shall become you, I see.’

Good faith was hard to come by.

She simply flew out of sight and entered the plight which was being unaware of what happened around them. Ever since she has never been seen.

‘Pardon me.’

‘I thought you asked for a cigar.’

‘I thought so too.’

Standing near them the buffoon, in peril as well; shook but around him, standing. Little more than shed-skin around each tooth, he started calling off. He had a box where he kept the snuff. As soon as they asked, but a hand, every time, cousin asked of him that morning, brother of death, and a culprit whom killed the vase around the cracked window shell, where there stood the morbid lamp, the glowing sand erected red around a sing point where a bullet was shot. The war had long ago begun and it already drew to high-artillery being used on them before he could realize. Tiny feet; they were trying to eat them, always slicing what they could together, suturing tiny pebbles taken from one of the broken markets, the sand-stone melted now from the sight of an Iceberg to what appeared to be a great statue named to powder, which was as soon gone as they realized that the man had taken something from the back of the shed, as it were abandoned. Most of the fruits being taken for a lot already contaminated and looked as well inside, it seemed to be but made out of plied wood-with little dots of drawn on top by a child, she were left there with her mother, both of them molded together, life absent, as it checked out. So said the buffoon as he sat between the two of them, rolling another contraband; which only dragged their nibs on, he said. And then again, he said. He spoke of a nigger who made it and tried doing them. But luckily, he pulled a satchel, in which, he said. He hid but a few calibers, he said. And put the beast down, as the culprit but colored the girls’ drawings before she could get up. It looked like a seat of skin and she was but a plant, in a power strip, the two depressions in her mother were kind of deep, enough that she knew that her mother would only survive in her. Since the daughter's legs were become her organs and her organs, as she mixed that of her mother's as well. And if one were to see, the brain inside the woman was attached but by a funnel-worm-gut rounded about and looked at if extended, or her lobes being drunk by a frat party, where the tube curved and entered her daughter, leading to the point where both of their lower-bodies got welded together where a giant coin-like cylindrical, exactly strip-depressions lay. That's where the tube split in two and appeared to be connected to the openly curved two-deformed almost leg-like elongated stumps that came out of her daughter's chests. Which were open, might I say, and appeared to extend a few tiny flaccid thin-tongues of which rolled around the worm-insides surroundings she had in her tubes, in order to carry on the connection that she may live. Since it appeared that, she could only survive for a few hours without having her innards filled and connected with the rest of the pumping leftover broken half replicas of organs that were in her place. Yet, the child could not run and she only settled with doing some peculiar push-ups only to plug herself into her lower body and that of her mother when she felt threatened. As otherwise, their outsides appeared to be night indestructible, which was further confirmed by a few other shots that had been directed to her. The stand to which they stood had a few more fruits left there, which had been, frankly spared by the people who came before him. Yet, the one in the front, left side had been blown off with the top of the cradles which surrounded them, as well as a few of the on the right sides on which the body of the nigger rolled over, taking them with him. As he drew down, with his bloody arms, he managed to leave a trail of blood on both of them, the stand and the ground, a few fruits as well, which were not taken into account, while being completely covered by the peculiar, destructive red sand which crawled on top of him. He was being touched by strange formations of eyes that were being made by both the sand and the red globes which were to come out of the red tomatoes which had been splashed over. He died instantly or so it had appeared, without nearing the conclusion that neither of them could look down. It was hardly noticeable, seeing how the entire ground architecture allowed for enough space to lay beneath them that grow could be allowed to an almost unnatural thing, like an entire squared water fish tank, but instead of the water, a maze-like construction, like the deformed hive belonging to either ants or termites where their fingers appeared to crawl. But then again again, this could not be entirely be checked out. Since, it seemed evenly so, that they were not to allowed any sight beneath their skin-ropes which had extended from their chests and pushed 'round them, staring. They stared at the Buffoon for a while. Zlazlovz only wondered why he had taken this job as a jester, since it was but something nurturing for a dying breed of people whom were uncannily unable to comprehend what it felt like being shot in the head, as to commit suicide after being forced to listen to him talk. He had wondered whether or not the same effect would somehow appear to be set upon them, before he actually came to open his mouth, where he told the two men that the mother and the daughter stood there and listened for a long enough while that he might, actually come to, not understand, by any means why was it that she reminded him of his wife. He didn't have a daughter exactly and if she had, she would most likely not be as deformed as she were, because if she had been, by now he would've put her out of her misery. And as this thought occurred, he simply aimed both shafts at her, without any shame whatsoever and shot the child, only to be met by some resistance as the bullets were merely spat on the side. At the very least they made it half-way through but no damage could be seen. Luckily for him, her hands were short and that of her mother were but a part of her and unable to move forth. Since all of her girth appeared to have manifested inside the bowels of the earth which already moved in both direction as they grew peculiar incision-mole cradle-boarding elongated heads like that of natives, which were already added to the submarine shaped extensions of the underground maze, which made the finger-length mass appear like the pose of a dancer splitting his legs in both directions, pushing along until they went deep enough in the earth as if to make the submarine shaped-meat maze look like the trunk of two trees, from which sprouted mole-meat incisor roots which formed grand underground tunnels, which were fat, hollow on the insides and would act like a slide. Since in this act of defiance against this unnatural, well, nature in which both of them had become, Christine Cyst knew that there would be only way for her to save her daughter. That only way being, sending her through the sledge in an eternal slumber as her decaying corpse would fumble onto itself and cover the way as it would mix with dirt, creating fake paths or fake leads, in case there was ever a chance for excavators to come through and search for her. Only to have her drifting in a sea of dirt, where she might be safe from the evils of the world; that being furthermore confirmed by the fact that the Buffoon, Zlazlovz tried to kill her. But there was enough smoke for both of them to share, and would to become.

‘And that’s when I started thinking about my wife.

I could not think of anything else because she started talking again. Always I would always be reminded of the many times she opened her mouth.

She keeps talking about taking care of me, washing the laundry, how I dislike her. And the dog, why does she always talk about writing the dog off?

I can’t go to the one vet, and the first day of school our boy’s was supposed to have, and how disgusting the tea was and watering the plants as well. The windows being open and what not, and the air coming in. Well, then she kept standing nearing the library, and the room, talking to one of her friends on the phone all day, for all the hours of the world.

And most importantly she would distract me from what I’m doing because she keeps talking in a different language when I’m only trying to mind my own business. That’s what life used to be for us, every day and I can we can all understand that a line needs to be drawn. I wish I had filled a divorce sooner because sooner or later I would’ve killed myself. I had a good thing going for me and she just didn’t consider anything else but her own damn interests. I simply wish, I only asked for a single moment of peace and quiet and I cannot understand.

It’s unfathomable really, she won’t shut her mouth for one moment. I’m seeing her right now. As if she’s appeared from the other side of the grave, trying to screw me over, I wager. Worst of all, it’s the fact that she had this thing, it was her thing. Not out thing, it was something specific to her, because she knew it annoyed me. I could not handle listening to it. But she had this song she kept murmuring while in the shower, in the hall and just about every spot inside the house. And I cannot, for the likes of me take it out of my head any longer.

No one wants, me, it was something like that. Of course I can’t fully remember it, but what I do is that she always did it on purpose. And no one wants, and no one wants me, it’s. I wish there had been a stop button on her forehead, because I would’ve pressed it with an iron.’

Then he stopped. Once he was settled on that and there was peace and quiet, he went on to tell everyone how he started picking up some of the, relatively clean fruits, putting them in the sack, then going on it, then back again and then back at it, so on and so forth until he could finally relax, farther away than they were, since he appeared to be wearily creped out by them. Since, all of the sudden, every now and then he could see this peculiar chime-shaped absent spot in the gap of his eye, or in his iris, or floating in the sky.

He could not explain it why it was there in the air, moved by where he looked, instantly, even with the blinks having made the world disappeared, it was always there. And was but a key-hole like hole in the sky, a hole of darkness where there was no light inside the hole it was leading, or the room, or the foyer, yet he knew, somehow he could tell that there was nothing on the other side despite what he was seeing. As he started walking on stair-like formations of his own legs, it felt as if the seemingly steam-like transparency of a veil he entered through, only to stop and look down. He saw legs, hands, arms, torsos, a peculiar goop-like substance which was put between them. Tiny-microscopic beings swimming inside of them, unnatural eyes, as well as giant flees being drowned, but that's now the thing which got his sight. Instead, he looked at his pocket, where saw a hand cream, he picked up. With it, my forehead and face had finally gotten the exact treatment they begged for since there was some kind of radiation coming up from above that had to be dealt with since it turned skin into a purple cabbage cut-out formation, if one were to drive a knife through it. He was but mourning the curiosity of his cousin and his brother, who was not his real brother but his soul brother since he had taken a pair of scissors, a neck-pen, and a hose with spikes of in, a pair of knives and shove them all into his sockets in order to visit the crematorium, where the upper-half body of his wife had been abandoned in and bleed in her mouth. Her body was there. It was thrown around the room, hit, abused, wasted, beaten, chopped by a medieval axe, then left there. No one bothered to pick her up since the crematorium had been abandoned. And Zlazlovz's wife was dead, while she had not living relatives. He had to make sure of it in any case, not of the relatives but of his wife. That's why, every now and then, being the paranoid man he was, he brought with him a hand-canon and blew her insides out, then took the time to suture her gut. Every single time; it seemed unlikely, but he actually undressed her before she shot her. Dead and scum-blots, everywhere; after that he resumed walking, until he finally got to the point of him being but that hallow spot in the sky with the exception that he filled the sky for a few hours. A few people, such as Matthew saw him all the way, and it was hardly noticed and spoken off, because the kid reminded him of the son. He was a boy who had suffered brain damage from being drowned for two minutes. He constantly thought of tarantulas who wanted to get him and of being another person. Also, Zlazlovz started being even more paranoid, thinking the child had watched the TV, and learned about washing laundry, something he had never bothered himself to learn. From the side, then he started pulling himself off like a valve opening and pouring him out, where he exploded for a fraction of a second in a giant pop-balloon of guts, then was made whole below him. But in all this, as it happened, he simply realized something. The satchel he carried, filled with fruits and vegetables had been destroyed, thankfully, on his way back. Although, it needs to be said, that otherwise, he would've most likely avoided, by every possible mean. He would've avoided, venturing to the same spot, ever since he had made it so awkward between the three of them, having made a scene by not only shooting the nigger but also by trying to kill her daughter as well. And he didn't pay for anything, nor would he do it now. Then again, he came to apologize to the dames, picked up a few fruits that were left and that's when he joined the men, rolling up snuff in order to feed them cigars. It was a nice life he lived, it was swell and he loved spending his time calculating how many leaves of snuff he would need. Or specks of snuff dust. Or whatever snuff was made out of, into rolls. But it was not fire that started putting them through the abuse of colors that started infringing through his gut-robe, as he had done so with his pants. Having learned from the two statues, he had but never asked for anything else. He walked away soon after and entered the small booth they shared. Between the two of them, of whom he was supposed to take the shift from, he simply considered this. It was just not worth it, trying to find some peace when no one listened to him, especially in the death of days, when there was nothing else left to do either.

The Buffon had certainly, as opposed to them lived a good life, although.

One day, he was eating from a pack of seeds, one by one, salt in them, at lot. Too much, after a while, since he stared out in the distance, from the poached side view of the hung-down parrot-cattle, from the side-watch where he drank cheap beard and had accommodated with the in-drive through fallen head-globe attached to the small risen from below skin-ziggurat which had come from beneath the eaten side of the marches, whence it had been swollen and deepened as it pushed even deeper through. From there, he watched it become a strange globule of blood-cyst that opened from the constant stream of peculiar inorganic manner that came out from inside the ziggurat, with its flat-marches swollen around it, to a giant largely protruding head, as that of a canine which pushed out of it a few meters forward, facing him. Whereas he was on the side of the glass, trying to watch one of his favorite channels, on his right side, from below the ground, it rose, farther from the marched on the curved, end of a valley in which the neighborhood stood on, there being the first flat structured placed, tilted as to have one of its edges being placed close to the middle of the street if his house was placed on the right side on the last row as far as buildings went. But it was not just placed, the globular-head, it didn't levitate either, nor was it put on a pillar either. Instead it wore a peculiar pseudo-crown that had been wrapped around his temple as an encircling crown which pushed out of him, connecting to every corner of the smallest risen square. And, while one might see some features disappear because of that peculiar substance which had encompassed him, there was this one slight hint of the great eater having been birthed to the in ziggurat pool from which it emerged. Though this was but a strange opening itself which had been ripped open to create a tridimensional representation of a DNA-strand that pushed out of the point where the globular thing and its mid-open jaw merged, drawing forward until both ends of the strand connected, forming an elongated sub-machine like barrel that bore holes in it, and appeared to have little worm-like gas producers that were had attached themselves to every corner of the house as they began slowly crawling in. At the end of every worm-like head which had slowly crawled out of every barrel hole, they appeared to have stretched as long as there seemed to be a cartilage-clot formed PVC or a normal pipe-shaped holder for every worm, as they seemed to be the innards of the grand beast. For it was one as such. Through the attached crown as well as the little metallic wires that were pushed and attached to the ziggurat, in their hollowness, the globular head wore little blood-transmitters that had entered the structure, and grew up a small fat belly-formation of many exoskeletons that were protecting their master with the help of small parasitical tendons which were encased in little eye-locks made out of bolted muck, many bone bolts as well as many chains that were of a single piece as well as a seemingly endless chasm below the ziggurat where the creature had grown endlessly in the few seconds during its release. As it had been a small thing but a spat of a cyst before the structure rose and only now it had been given the chance to make something of itself, then it rose. Although there were many valleys in the grotto from which it came out off, or that fall beneath it. And its sudden growth may have forced it to impale itself into as many of the edges and corners as possible, which had internally caused the sudden bloating pool or spring to come out of it, since the pool was billions of miles below the growth itself. Not to be called on. But the mouth-formation appeared for no other reason that the eternal hunger the creature felt. It wanted, desperately desired that Buffoon's seeds. They had salt of then, they were tasty. Inexplicably so, although they hadn't any nutritional value whatsoever, they felt good, it felt nice eating them. A release of dopamine followed each bite. And he made a mess all around the couch. Yet from the elongated DNA-formation, which, upon seeing it looked more like two recoiling snakes that were incompatible with one another, a protrusion of needle-like stretches of straws made out of raw-meat-like beating nails were stopped then, by nothing else but that inhumane glass that protected him. Since these things were soft after all, there was no feasible way of stopping them further.

‘But oh, vile creature that it’s stopped here, along the way, you just simply do not understand, you can’t understand, how could you?’

It’s not for the taste that I delect myself with the seeds, no, that’s not it. But because of my empty gut, it is the shape of my gut that I cannot know. All that sodium being flushed through my veins and through my body, it is because of it that I must poison my body with it.

It is for that reason that I have so many packs stored, near at my feet. Because I cannot live without them; for the likes of me, I cannot give up on them, for my heart obeys no little than its gander. And I cannot live without it, yonder, knowing no less.’

He got up and simply pulled the curtain over, the buffoon being somewhat at a loss, being unable to recall the many times he had been put through dire things, that would call upon him there. In such a stance, that he’d have, every man around, asking for something, not just snuff. He’d gotten requests as the likes of scratching the four finger of a man’s long past since decayed form that had come out of a wall fifty years ago without having knowledge, or by any means being made aware that he had stumbled onto him in his youth. Such a request making little to no sense whatsoever, especially since, as he pointed out, he wasn’t there.

But asked for it, as to check, he revealed as much in his gut, as to say. There was the little head sticking out of the decayed form, which started eating from his hand, a pigeon would by reigns which but pushed around. He was but as estranged by this thing like everyone else, since he appeared to, not, for the sake of it, understand how was it that he opened its mouth; pulling out various gut-drenched filler that started drawing some of the men inside, contorting them as they were drawn in then eaten alone before it finally closed its mouth, wreathing slightly in pain, with all of them being pushed out. In the time he had started eating its fingers, in a concoction made of blood and of the tubes and the other men’s clothes which had been gulped by what had been the entire expansion of filthy mouth, they began riding away by foot, and would make it inside by the time the buffoon had followed through. Thinking himself unable to comprehend the secret code he had to introduce in order to get it, he turned and while in search for a back door he met a strange little woman with two split ends, dead-eye on-strike pointed cataracts, and cat-globules on top of her eye globules, leading to the full extension of the split, her lip.

‘I want something from you, but I need to ask of this in private.’

‘Where to then?’

He fashioned his back, they were lead by to the car and in turn. He had but rubbed his back finger in order to take it off so she wouldn’t see; having kept it there despite him breaking it off. Though he hadn’t the lightest desire, as for a slight touch and ruin his chance, he asked whether or not she had any idea where they were headed towards, to which she didn’t exactly answer. Nor did she understand. A few more days were spent in the solitude of the one little tall house, a thin pint of black wood raised in the middle of nowhere. Where they spend the next few years in, despite the lack of food, they ate their babies and drank from one another’s blood, which was connected to a neck tap coming out of a hole inside their private chamber, slightly pushed inside of them. He was done one day, committing a high-way robbery before he even realized he abandoned her, the Buffoon considered as much. The house was not empty. But her skin fell off and had strangely become just that, a splash on her nicely embroidered, hand-made designer build, quality Deschel-Nektar cut of a skin-man, as whom she ended up looking. With an exposed skull and a fallen over jaw, pinned with a few iron needles to the entire room; barbed wires placed around. Then the acoustic started, sounds of dead mice being splashed over and over again, until eventually one of the black wreathing long-wires but splintered one of the windows and made way for the red storm to make it through. Completely destroyed, the pint was but taken down and left with only a trace. What remained was a single black pair of connected spheres rotating on top of a wooden black square with a red hole in it; while the spheres were trading between one another, the guts of her and that of the mice and other inhabitants that were taken out. There was this also.

After a few days passed, only but a few arches began forming and contorting themselves around the spheres, holding them still before a connection was established, broken through. From the depths of the earth having erupted, a peculiar, tilted at various parts structure going as far as to look as if it had wreathed on both left and right, completely out of shape as it had only started wriggling about until it could not touch anything any longer. Within its grasp, a bunch of bubonic-filled, bubonic-shaped large breasts started heaving as they grew and put themselves against the large horned on top structure, which held the spheres from spreading. And from every side it almost spewed off like springs of hardened polished inter-connected arches, which connected in the ground. They were used only to direct the weight in a different direction, as to draw away from what appeared to be the final pull. Beneath it there, after it finally drove out, the arches revealed themselves as to be supporting pillars which held the bulk below, hardened as it were, it drenched the land beneath it, revealing but an unnatural set of orange ellipses of boils stacked upon boils, stacked upon boils through which and out of, in the middle as if through a black target hairs coming out which contorted to the exact middle point, as scorpion stings would, spraying one another with the substance in a most diabolical manner. As hanging by them, tiny globular pseudo-humanoid head-wrought homunculi-like orange detainers leaped like tiny goblins on a rack. Tying their faces off the hairs in order to stand; but most importantly, they waited.

Regardless of it, the Buffon had made it back and appeared to have made home of the Hospital yet, as he but entered it and walked just in time to stumble upon a most peculiar pair. There, in front of him, by the crossing stood Brim, Ham-Stowe, Dock and the others; whom were of little importance, yet they were present there, by him. Standing near the walls, as if hiding from something, he greeted them and was immediately liked. Without any complaint; pulling one on every single one of them.

‘You fancy yourself a joke?’

‘I don’t know? I don’t see anyone laughing.’

‘Think you could do one me?’

‘I suppose we’ll have to see that, won’t we?’

And both of them, Clerk, to be precise, which had almost been forgotten since he wasn’t human-like any more, and Zlaslov, pulled but high-pointed large racketed-guns stolen from corpses, either from outside or from inside; a pair of savages trying to perform a hoopla, by tying their hands on and ripped to shreds what appeared to be, a single thought.

To be certain about it; there was definitely no way to tell whether or not there was any means of survival any longer or whether or not such a strange thing might still be called a human planet. Since, with everything in doubt being considered, it was claimed. In the same way the Europeans people have claimed the plains of the Natives while the diseases they brought in appeared to have left a deadly mark which had put the browns in their early graves, something similar to it happened here. Although one even would have boundaries to such unnatural roots as to claim is as something which ought to have happened eventually, this was by no means a mistake of a side effect of one coming through. Indeed, it hadn't, but the symptoms having been there were merely exaggerated upon the final coming blow, which should've been foreseen a mile off before they even came to it. As it happened, there was no possible way to protect oneself from it, as the mere powers involved in the destruction of the planet could never be stopped. They were unpreventable, unfathomable and couldn't have been prepared for. It's quite obvious, that for that reason many of the so-called to do living compatriot in arms had taken refuge wherever they could, in hope that they could fight what came after them, only to have failed on their way out. But they were killed.

Scum gets killed because scum is weak and scum cannot be dealt with. Scum is not aware, of scum one should be ware and be weary next to, for scum drags one down with it. For it cannot be pushed or made to wait, or be reeducated or civilized, and for what remains after? Nothing, as it's merely a disease that eats itself, although that could not be said about humanity. Indeed, it couldn't. Despite what happened to it, by strange means, that human machine found a way to live a little longer, for a short time.

It should remain to be seen.

A box-ring lowered platform, second floor, rising slowly on a pair of rails, slowly leading to the four floor, where all of the cart-wheel-cartridges were set. A few remote old TV sets could be seen hanging around, surrounded by a few, little slits, where little feet walked.

Little feet, leaving little footprints around.

A little prince, and old boy came to his mother, she was trapped. Little prince coming next to her at that.

'When are you going to come back mother?'

But she was no queen.

'I can't break through, you know that, dear prince. I'm but stuck behind the fence. I'm caught, I do not know how to leap in on the other side. I'm lost.

Will you help me with a song, to hum? Will my little bird come closer?'

Yet only hid behind the box-set and never dared come out of it then. Thinking himself as someone who's been rifling with an old set while she wept and asked for him as well.

'Little prince, little prince, will you come back to your father?'

But Theodor but hadn't thought, was that his pop or was it another one who looked like him? Stopped there, he couldn't see without his glasses. That had been but a soldier trying to imitate the voice of a woman, with his rifle pointed at the kid without the trousers. He had but pulled the trigger the last time. And would've done so, if he hadn't needed him to open the gate from the other side; since that could trigger the alarm; while that being something he could not deal with any longer, nor could he spare a word, saying too much, he but placed his back against the door of the stall and simply rested his shoulders for the hour. Murmuring something on a piece of note; pulling his helmet off, then his head was gone.

Out came an entire body without head connected with its throat. They were but a pair and walked around and could not think any more. The child was safe. He died a few minutes after, having choked on a few unwrapped cartridge powder he purposefully ingested. Happier days were for him to come, but there were none as closer to him now.

In the physic ward, something closer; near closer, what to ask the clinician? This time around his eyes on the couch, then around, then pushed out. Always rotating, the people were trying themselves. Always but a single bread loaf, trying to eat; doctors on the first line, all out, eavesdropping, six-hundred thumbs on every wall. Trying to take the hill, perhaps getting the height, past the height, walking around, trying the woods, since there was a brick, he's beaten it against the wall. His feet were taken, ten miles an hour, with his long-car suspenders put on, and wrapped round. Then asking her, when was the list going to be released now? Am I at the top? Am I at the stop?

'Am I at the top yet?'

'You're never going to be put on the top. Believe or not, you're baby cold feet compared to the rest of them, kind. You're a rock, I'm cracking you slowly, but with them?

They're dirt-cement and I'm getting my shoes dirties and I'm afraid that sooner or later they'll drag me in the muck with them and that's bad, that's worse. You have no idea what's I'm going through with them.'

Then she rose, walked around, took a few books, read him a few excerpts from Reality fading, an Antiphony.

'As I were saying, the metaphysical realm is but a mere share of what's enwrapped into everything and the shareholders are but malignant gods that were shoving their fingers in our hears to block off the sounds that pass between hem having a laugh of how gullible we are. And we are indeed.'

'Saw your feet, I want to.'

'Control yourself.'

'I want to control myself, yes, that's what I want. I do want to control myself, I will control myself, I am in control.'

'See?'

Told you, as opposed to.'

'List?'

'Very well, I'm only doing this because you've always been one of my favorite. You're definitely a man I'd have if things were different and if you weren't mad.'

'But I'm not aggressive, you know that, as a matter of fact, I feel well, in the head I mean, the wind is still hardening.'

Neither of them knew.'

Just what were the doctors doing outside? It was hard to tell with so many of them standing in there and doing whatever they were doing. Or whatever they were getting off with. So many things, sand encrusted. That fucking sound.

He turned towards the side and looked through the wall. Something fell over.

'Dumbass, you almost gave us away. Put it back immediately before she finds us here.'

'Shut up already, I know, I am the master.

I am the master.

I.

Am the master. I am the master.'

He kept rubbing his couch as if it were a cat. He kept repeating it, always of a bile, he was the master, he was the master, he was the master. He was the master and there was no one else who'd be the master. And what he the master off?

'You sure you're not the one who should be in that room instead of the fellow?'

'You sure I'm not going to kill you?'

'I'm not.'

Someone will have to talk about it eventually. Not talking of it only brought the black thoughts in. Always of a mind, the blinders, encased and thrown away like Judas, he but did things. Darks, always, activities that were spread and singles, always were there.

'I think we need to talk about your childhood again, something there, I think, there's always been something that truly disturbed be, even before you did the, you know what? I'm going to lend something to you. It's my favorite.'

From under the desk, her hand rose in her other hand, kept.

A few old people can't write.

'Did you sign the waiver?'

'No.'

There were a few cuts around the fingers and were done, they were spoken to. A store-door was closed and would destroy just about everything, thrown inside, her eyes were shafted. There they closed her and made to walk into a closed basin. Not to check her again, she was settled onto something, would to be called yet.

'I think.'

‘What happened to your hand? ‘

‘A small cut, I apologize for that, but, you know?

Business calls, I need to unwrap something.’

Someone called, small puddle, telephone calling, the symptoms of hearing words spoken backwardly, while always talking a fall. There were dead ends in Lombardy. And would to be called, she spoke of them for a few seconds, thinking he would be spared. Of what was going on, for at least a few days, a drop would fall onto her. It was clear, she would have to beg him to look off the way. It wasn’t the bleeding, but the abandonment of the limb while talking.

‘Who’s on the other line?’

‘A living creature.’

‘Creature?’

‘I meant a man, I think it’s a man that’s not calling. He’s telling me he’s tired, and would tell me he’s tired. Please, I need your reassurance. Something’s not going right.’

‘He’s tired, I think. That man Is tired.’

‘He’s the sponsor, the private donor, he’s pulling the bills, it’s a bonus, he’s scoring the sum. He’s calculating how much he’s been paying us for the day. And we’re not producing enough.’

‘What do you mean by producing?’

‘He’s making men. And he’s putting them in the clever-desk, put inside of them like broom-sticks that are being melted, pants that are being thrown around. He’s hearing us talk.’

‘What did you call it again? ‘

‘A magazine?’

‘No, the thing on top.’

‘The dust.’

‘I’m angry every day.’

‘That’s good to hear, but I’m talking to someone on the door.’

‘On the door?’

‘No, on the desk, I mean on the phone. I can’t do this, you understand? ‘

Then he stopped understanding her. She spoke backwards, she heard backwards and this went on for the hour. Still couldn’t see where her hand disappeared. Go to the dormitory, get up on top of something, break the ladder, break the table and crawl underneath it. That’s where he stood shaking. It was another attack. The worst thing waited inside that room, underneath the bed, where everything inside his house was placed, a focal point for pollution. Always trying to figure out what was going on by himself, for himself and never asking for more. His fingers were red from rubbing one out while he wasn't looked out. And he knew when to stop. It was exactly when she stopped talking backwardly, that he realized she was there. Back turned away though, she didn't see. Or she saw it happen and only did this out of courtesy. As much as he could understand, she wanted him there.

‘All right, I think we’re done here for the day.’

‘But I haven’t found anything else about myself, and what of the list, what of my childhood?’

‘You’re all worn-out sport. It’s all slit-wrist treatment for you this day.’

‘You’re going to cut me?’

‘Butcher you, butcher your wrists, butcher your throat, whip your chest, pull your nails and worst of all.’

‘What’s worse than that? What could possibly be worst than that?’

‘I’m leaving you alone for an hour.’

‘You can’t do that, you promised you will look out after me, you can’t just abandon me that way.’

‘Well, I can, I will and I think there’s no other way to help you.’

‘Why?’

‘Because you’re not insane, that’s why, you’re only coming here because you want to skip class, kid.’

‘So what? The teacher’s a cow, and I will slaughter her.’

‘That’s why you’re always ending up in detention, kid. You’re going to drive you mom into an early grave.’

‘And if I don’t?’

Leave the light open, cue the next patient before he’s dead. She felt at the door, fleeing near, only to find herself unmet by anyone, as she peered on and saw, nothing. Her heart felt but the access of a lost soul. The acres were but held and honed, as something she’d never seen before. I swear I thought I saw someone here. But the doctors had disappeared, overly wrought in their ears encased, which had crawled upon the walls, chameleon colored away. Hid by sight, but eating words and sounds, it’s what they fed on.

‘Ah, well, I think no one’s about to come any earlier than four days later, kid, I think I could spear a few more hours for you.’

‘What do you want to do then?’

‘Well, since my schedule is clear, I could think of a few things.’

The door was locked.

Another part.

There were quite a few things spread about the place. Broken vases which were on cotton-fridge willows' laughter, beyond it there was such a thing as a tiny drop across each finger stopped across the world, echoes were but mundane and everything felt at home, sort of saying, it felt peaceful.

After the hour was done, the boy left.

The psychiatrist was left with a note he seemed to have forgotten on his way out. It went into detail; apparently this had been a class assignment of his.

Although it was the place and since there was the time, what better chance to spake about it than now? For there was no chance at retaliation since the world was but thrown into a chaos-filled trunk hole in which nothing could fit it. As to look upon it so, one would take this opportunity to talk about the nature of the woman, now that there is no better chance to approach such a creature as for the essence with invalidates humanity itself. A female being somewhat antagonistic to the human brain, she represent the insignificance of a little petty thing that has little to no grasp over any kind of abstract definable object or even those beyond it, as the average specimen only falls into the category of the mentally crippled. She if but fashioned in such a way that she ought to be looked at but not listened to. Since most of the information spewed out of her endless broken horn is but the excess of uselessness her compromised mental state appeared to be in. The woman being in a somewhat constant state of idiocy that appeared to somehow even out-do that of the likes of people that cannot even be considered to be human to begin with. Incapable of contemplating on her very own self, this little creature is but sutured to a grand stone that bequest of man to take claim and repair everything she's destroyed within the grasp of her infantile behavior. A woman is an idiot. That is what a woman in like throughout her entire life and it seems likely that there is no such thing as an exception from this rule. As even the greatest accomplishment fail to swerve underneath the weight of her being, that being filled with such filth as to destroy and trump over anything wrought by man in his eternal quest of putting everything that's wrong in the world back together.

For what is a woman if not someone who plays? And whom does she play with if not with herself and with other women as well as does she not mess with men on every occasion she gets? Is she not someone to be held under contempt as one would hold a child or a small animal in its place? Are the rules not set us such by her own being as her uselessness does not hold anyone else under contempt of their beings? But at the same time is she not gracious in the way she pounces upon others of the same kind? It is quite obvious that she does not desire the company of her own. That she is a being born in quarantine of her own serfdom and would only beguile others as to think she would be pleased as to be surrounded by women of her own. That is how one of whose nature is poisoned acts, whom might be childish enough to be blind enough as to consider others of her own as being somewhat civilized in the same manner one might consider the likes of Jews and that of Negroes as to be. But there had never been one who is as self-blinded by their own nature, to lack such self-awareness as well as self-contemplation of their beings as that of a woman. And whom else to talk about one such creature if not one who knows them? Whom else if not one who has been made aware of their behavior and has come to fully understand these creatures as they ought to have evolved or how they've been made, if that is the cast, in order to understand that there's nothing more to be held under such contempt as to recognize that the very core of a female is to be submissive? Regardless of the type or the kind of behavior that has been ingrained in her by society and regardless of the amount of indoctrination, and adaptability one might call upon it, is female submissiveness not a constant for every possible case that's ever existed, or has been represented throughout human history? Is she not one to be molded, shaped and made do as one desires? Since, for all purposes, she does seem to match all the needed criteria as one would come to understand that one needs only to pull a few strings and she would only fall and serve. As that is the nature of a woman, stripped of all, and made to walk where one pushed her to do.

That is what a woman is. She is but the hiatus from progress, from which humanity may be dragged back into the black chasm and the boils underneath the puddles from which it emerged. Her nature being mainly one that is as such unscrupulous and might only be thrown off the feet of men only to be pushed around and be dreaded with. Women represent that which is evil in man, masked as innocence and naivety, they may not have the power needed to carry on such a thing as destruction by their very own selves but that is the reason why they employ that of others. Man but being under her command, although he doesn't know it yet, as, if there was no such a thing as her, would man not pillage and freely roam as to destroy and take what is his, eternally being unpleased by life as is it so?

Let us consider this much. A woman is incapable of shaping a wheel, her small brain is unfathomably incapable of creating such a thing that would require an extremely endowed amount of cognitive power that's simply not present in her female brain. Since it's clear that they cannot work properly, they are just not made to create by themselves. Which leaves out only their role as progenitors which shouldn't distract from that fact that a child is not a wheel; a baby is a human being. That is embed in her organic configuration.

That is nor a creation of art, that is not a sculpture, it is not work added, although it could be, indirectly interpreted as such, since, as it seems likely a woman can do something arguably decent in her pathetic insignificant existence. She is capable of giving birth to a man. Otherwise, nothing that's not been said or done before, yet the question remains. Could one somehow genetically, perhaps alter the female nature as to make it much close to that of a man? In which case, the danger needs to be taken into account, for which answer, and immediate action ought to be taken. A woman cannot become a man, for a man is dangerous, and although a man may be physically weak by some account, he makes it up in others. A man might be witty, mischievous, or even become a scoundrel. He bears hatred, he bears anger that's outwardly expressed. That is a dangerous thing, for no one desires to surround himself with other men. This is a problem that needs not be fixed. A woman should and ought to remain weak so there might be balance in store and only for the safety of everyone that's being called in action. Could a man not harm and take the life of a woman then? But what if the woman in question might just be so enthralled to retaliate to the man? And what if she did so in every single possible case?

There are other means to harm someone, that, with the added pettiness of a woman that could only be inflated as to adopt the nature of a man could only be so disastrous as to bring unfathomable results.

A woman is a curtain, she can be dragged from one side to the other, then back and forth until she cannot take it any longer and why would this be? That is quite simple, her lack of spatial awareness makes it so everything looks distorted in from of her eyes. It's just how women are. It's what they're like. Therefore their incapability of creating a wheel is shown by the very fact that their easily dismissible attempts result in them making broken things like cans or ugly chairs instead of round objects, since they cannot see them in their heads.

They're nasty in any case.

She stopped reading and merely folded the paper.

Her face looked like that of a victim or a deer staring at a headlight in the middle of a street. She could not make sense out of it, no, no.

Peculiar thing about patient zero, he was there. There was no virus or disease he was carrying, but a mere peculiar thing about his face, it was a cut, which looked like the female reproductive system, almost drawn across his face but with a blade.

But the sounds came from somewhere in the hall, where the noise was being made, and came out off.

That child was ill. He had misbehaved way too many times for any personal liking to be taken. And he had spent the entire afternoon simply walking around the hospital, bothering everyone who ever happened to stumble on him by chance or by mean.

He was only a foot in door, and peeping in. A clearing of the table, the janitor-lady was but a maid of a head as the back of her skull embroidered clothes. With each strand but a bone-tattle tough, in which, there stood a few deadlocks.

While in doubt of what to wear, he but stared at her.

It was far-fetched, just like the carving of a face, to ask, or at the very least, when need called, to unmask the man as anyone else, but he but followed through. A young stranger with will-to do what came to his mind; there was no running and no getting away and as all things, time would take everything, to waste. And spare no one of what they would become or at the very least, there was this need for some kind of elation to occur. The memory of what could have or ought to have been fleeing with every second; that's what came to mind. Eventually wearisome and ending; that's something a child could never grasp. How his every step was but one closer thing, drearily putting him past them; they would look at the child with wonder, even from their lines and seats, without questioning anything that happened after. He had lost his youth and merely walked on stumps, a drifter or a grafter, or some kind of similar thing that wasted inside, not knowing. Time was running out for him. A child would not be bothered by it, nor could he find out by any means, what happened, in the meantime? And who was the one who should've called on him to claim his life back.

It was for that reason that he chose to waste away in the Hospital, which had become a graveyard by watchers to be. For every single one of them was but a twisted image, never seen. Cold respiration had entered him, for he was ill, sickened by such sight. Within every step but a match for his own, unwearied by anything he's ever known. Thrown by foot the man unable to look forward, he stared with giant eyes ever-encompassing his face and mouth, bubbling about the face as they turned inwardly, the man standing there, between the frame of the door and the uncanny wearisome sight he left behind. As for him, he but waited for this to end. It was sickening to no end, but both were put down in the room, as bastardly as they could be put, by mind and body, shaken in unearthed beds, from beneath which he saw but that force that drew them away. By feet uncanny, bastardly the man as well; he but thoroughly confirmed their foaming mouths, the dead. They had been speaking ever so plainly to him, ever near his approach.

‘They were bound to die eventually; you’re young but yet to understand the ordeals of men.’

‘Why did they have to die?’

For a second there he could see from where the mouth had darted, from his innards, through his chest, they started. Always of a mind for stench, approaching the end of a servitude yet.

‘I mourn not my father, nor her concubine. I only seek to bury everything and lay it in the past where it should be. That is the will of man and you should know it. For that reason I stand here watch until it’s finally done, child. You should understand that.

They have abandoned their share of life, which have been kindly returned to me so I may watch upon my own. With it restored, I can finally walk a man and no longer have to waste in vein or walk away from whichever circumstance might be made of me to convey the dreaded nature they have cast me in.

I have wasted many years watching over, and have wearied myself to no end. I am but a shell of what had once been and for that, I can only have sympathy for them.’

‘How could have sympathy towards people you loathe?’

‘Ah, but I see that you’ve yet to understand, haven’t you?’

You still show signs of impudence, and you’re a prude to knowledge, hence you must know. There’s something you may not understand just yet and you may not get to know about such intricacies of what’s humane as we do.

Boy, I chose to cast upon myself this sight.’

And he had but shown the missing organs and everything he’s given them in order to keep them alive. For however long it had been. There was but a strange servitude he never recalled and which he could never recall by any means. As he was wearied by hopeless wonder, so many touches he missed. All because of them, but despite his appearance he was still at peace.

‘You’ve wasted your life.’

‘Ah, but I can see from the tone of your voice that, and I may judge you so because I see upon you an image that I may recognize to be as one of my own while at your age, that you still don’t understand.

Perhaps I ought to have made it clear somehow, this way. There is no force in this world that may put you in any kind of direction, be it wearisome, vile or benign. And you must know that know of all time so you make not take your chance is the wild, wondering by yourself without hope, but to be made aware that whatever your choice might be from this point on, falls upon your shoulders alone.

Circumstances mean nothing, neither does anything you’ve done in the past. Whatever you may adhere to put your life as a claim to might not lend upon you anything. As a matter of fact, it’s just, contriving that you may think so otherwise.’

‘I can’t, it’s late, you don’t understand.’

‘I do, child, for that reason, look at me now, that is what I want you to do, bare lay upon me with your sight and look for a moment, not as a blind man tries seeing, past your clouds and the blinds, look child. What do you see?’

‘A sick looking man.’

‘What else?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘One that’s finally free to do as he pleases. A man that’s paid his dues; ask yourself as much child, have I gained anything from it?’

‘A loss.’

‘And do you think I feel weary because of that, child? Knowing that I am the one who chose this path, do you think I’m weary of my every choice? Do you think I mourn the years after a lost voice?’

Am I not old, upon to cast and lay as they have upon their dead beds?’

‘Then why did you allow for them to be taken then?’

‘That is just as simple as there is child; past the years, there was but no hope left inside of them. How could you fathom such a thing now?’

‘How could you?’

‘I was not there, when it happened.’

‘But you just stepped out of their deaths.’

And for a moment there, he but pushed the door in, only for an image to be there, again. But they were not alive, and were but fashioned, like tiny toys pulled down upon a frame of wood, beneath where shook but a single pit that’s fallen.

Of yolk and chimes the child was known, and better yet, what he’d been told was but a mask. For what drew him in also cast upon his eyes the blinds, the man simply stood by him, within his grasp his sight, but to the face there was but nothing. And in his arms there stood the watching, entrapped. He of annoyance grandiose, was taken aback. The child was no longer watched, the boy was cast underneath the shadow of the bed, with which crushed, his back as if to realize, while, too late and always bedded underneath the floor as his soul not to wander anywhere else, he come upon the watch. Eternally in the afterlife, the man had snatched something which wasn’t his.

‘Their lives are not wasting now, within and do with waste.’

Therefore he had gotten rid off any other question and no to get rid of it, he had embraced it. Talking to dead-children of which light was to come. Only when appeared to him, beyond sight, the child had asked for his eyes back and for his head. All in part, were taken from him and missed, out of his way, to be reminded. As much as he could resign but a single question, he darted, as to meet the bonds.

‘They were the parts of me that held me back for many a year, now. With them out of the way, I may be free to convey as much as my heart desires to cast all upon my cast and body and for that I’ve only taken what I claimed.

The means through which I may be able to extend my claim upon this land and the one after; I am pleased now that I you have stumbled upon this scene and that I have recovered what’s mine, I thank you child for every organ I reclaim. I may walk again, free of pain and of a limp, I feel that I may do freely as I please now, with my recovered youth.’

Although the man, deformed, still thoroughly looking as if worn out, he walked. Would settle with naught about, other than to walk with the eyeless, headless ghost, of which parts but followed him as well in flight, four pieces in total, all after him, in sight. But only he could see, though he would not be tormented and would not flee from sight. The child had but questioned him, as if, not asked, but made up of a mind to know.

‘Did you plan this all along? For someone to come along so you may steal their youthful vigor?’

‘Of course I have and do not mind yourself, I do what I please and never be touched. Of a kind I wear, I stay and bear.’

But he didn’t walk again in turn, towards the plains and the stuffing in the walls, which were of some oat that were pushed behind and the water-pouched which were placed inside, the list but putting pigs-the cattle. They were disappearing, then only brought to mirth. There was some dread, and they stood-dead. And after a while they came again, tired and placed. It was unnecessary, the first and second, days were bore. He could not fathom standing more, too much. Toll taken for every single man, they were plain and body wrought in sane. Towards the termination ended.

And walls were bend, and there they ended. Asking but a worn out door, entering an office with many pools of hardened yolk, the plastic machine sand moving and wringing like pendulums, the room was put into a part. And would be moved back and forth like a cabinet drawn back on empty rail gaps, or like a wagon that’s to recede, there stood but a fourth piece, a coffin like dome of glass, in which hide the scream, but only his mouth, jaw and two legs were stored. All parts were missing but he would not understand the fright of the worn. For everyone in wall and torn, would ask for them to return.

Thence, his first action, as his judgment called. Was to push on behind an far, finding those torn pieced and doing so they were long stored. As, he had said himself upon being met.

‘Whose there standing, beneath the door? And why is he stored in such a fashion that only a jewel of worth be in it?’

‘That is but the body of a man of worth and you need not know.’

The device communicated to the man, worn out by the likes of Hospital-machines and the intercom within, he had but started his search. Wearing in the distance wonder, and opening the stronger, man came to be. Dressed in a crimson toga, he had greeted him, to offer help. He hadn’t but a clue what was wrong with him.

‘There we come upon there, to stumble. I see, I must ask of you, boy, what do you see the parts I’m after?’

‘I can only see where you point the palms of your hand.’

‘Fair enough then.’

And he looked through the curtains of this den, that is to say, he could see through walls and do as to say, where in doubt, the parts were missing, only so to realize that the cement was but a cemetery, filled with many too far close alike. He could not find for the likes of him the real one, therefore they would but have to fill the missing parts. Of yore, the man, next to them; his toga worn, ripped apart, he shone but from the slaughter. As his hands had split, with but two strikes behind the hour, a minute within. Both arms but fell and then he aimed, not to dismantle, not to shake after, but arms were torn, by tendons torn, they shot and would not remain in part. Nor would the legs be needed, but the head wept as he was but pinned and beaten. Pounded, joint after joint, until he could not punch him, his head was torn apart, ripped clear, while there was no blood but a drivel of blue within a white of alabaster he cast aside. Upon his walk back, upon the derail, the crystal coffin opened and he had placed the body well; it was a fit. He was pleased of his second great act and had considered this.

‘Child, I need you no more but I shall not need your eyes any longer. For that you may stay with the dead and keep him company as I go and search for replacements that I may not be bothered as much as I.’

But he realized himself, unable. He could not for the likes of him rip off the eyes of his palms as they had but enabled him to push aside. Thrown to be and cast what he could until he rose inside. And plain it were, he ripped but a hand, while the other he bit off his own wrist and spat the other into the coffin hole.

He was to be called upon this uncanny thing which came out of him, not blood but molecules that could be seen. Visibly deformed upon the hour formed as leashes worn, having become butterflies that went around. Asked of him In the hour where he placed two pots he found hanging around, bleeding stopped, with there to stay. He frozen when met by a clean whom no pain could convey the fact that behind him, the dead man had opened his eyes. Then all of the sudden when both faces met, he had but been ripped, out of his placed and cleaned. Halls, and in whichever direction but put where he stood not to be called or to swoon more over he could not have fought such a creature which was soon joined by a hundred others whom had stood in line to butcher the body, spreading it evenly.

But they were of little worth as much as it could not be held.

Somewhere, in the hospital, like a toad leaping were the Buffon.

Always of a mind to fight, and would to be followed now by a crows, they had try to make it to the point, where they could fashion themselves the keys for a car and make it through the parking lot. Of free and whence freedom was but proven, he had settled to tell them of a house. They would know of it and would be set there, to live in it safely for the rest of their lives with him. Happily keeping company with the problem of being met by a peculiarly deformed back web which had waited for them; in the way one would use their arms, the full-stretch and full reach as a deformity. An anomaly of form, like a carpet maker and a boxer made to be. With the many strands of threat being made of some unnatural material always drawing then pushing in the same way a fire-blower would, that brown accordion like tool, but made out of eighteen more of those, attached to the great organ-web that stood between them and the exist.

A general structure in the middle could be recognized like the contorted nuclear silo and a cocoon where the full-reached arms spread connected to the great web, from which they pulled and pushed, in the back there being little young, all but wreathed about and fashioned, not of this world.

For the creature was not where but had somehow taken them momentarily, to its home, where it stood that way, upon a wreathed pair, two of them, which held it that way in the air. Though they could not be recognized, it mattered just as little as it would. Whatever entered their heads could not push through.

It bore behind, finally to their signs, inside a hornet, which held its youth in; many even looking human although they shouldn't.

But worn out, this world was uncanny and were of little space in the distance, all taken aside. Light of stars long faded, instead it came from their eyes. There stranded inside of them, she had come to create but points that were benign of a dark nature where it swam. Of various eons, they but came out, dreary. Of little nature, wearied; then they were refined.

As to belong to it, and what appeared to be the long had protrusions from its backs, always forming the surroundings, as if they were, and mares would be aware to flight, like long antennas wrapped and turning about the placed until they stole the sky. During such flight they were made to appear, fearing not the children it stole.

As their final refinement had only made them become strange beings without legs, but sweeping-like vacuoles below them, as if their skin melted away in them but to take away, whichever thing fell from inside of it, before it could grow and take its place. One of the most dreadful thing was there, watching how the unwrapped antennas had become, to the hornet but many feather-like things on four sides, all but drawing the air.

All of the sudden it spat, daringly, putting itself through such pains as to deliver. He appeared there, but nowhere near him would lay but bloods-particles wrought, yet to be called. They formed but in-so, and taken from them bones, and some were missing what had been wrought with the bodies of the infants, tails, and would to be a heaviness in the front of a wine-maker, which was blown apart, that opened, halves were made, breathing from behind the plains until It died away. For it had matured too fast and organs stomped, in the cartilage they could not grow, in doubt.

Pushed them forced to kneel, feeling the unnatural thing which was their god's bitter chill, but sent.

Backed away from the parking lot as if they knew what lay behind it.

For the sight was dreadful, of what they missed. And although they walked in the opposite direction, there was something they could've missed. Mother of the creature, of which bones were a feature of man, choked on it and bled, as every youth were but devoured and the figures holding it but broke their arms, unable to hold it any longer. They were not to be controlled.

What came out was worn, and wasting. A bothersome, loathsome, feisty creature, of tails but the mouth, coming out of the hornet, while in the front which had become the back, from the web-like contortion, the full-stretched arms but pulled; pushing the creature over as if to swoon in flight. Of space delight, as it could finally join the others out there.

Though this was not a feast of nails, they felt the mercury in their heads but the iron was nowhere to be found. Instead, oh cheerful thing that drill-head with the many mouths, had departed with a gift, the bed where they spread the dead during peaceful flight.

Peculiar mold of cast, it spoke in words.

It was day-time after the late hours.

‘The surgeon is called upon to attend the command center where the beast is being held. It needs to be operated upon, now, in any case, one needs to alert him, immediately.’

Upon their notice they started making it to where he was held prisoner, room eighteen. Which was eighteen floors away from where he stood, placed near one another, adjacently speaking. A few meters away, like rising platforms, separated by stairs. Doctor Eschter Spew had been wrapped ‘round in a net, but merely conversing with a fail surgery, it was a brain-still born which had grown-crawled through the womb, into the woman’s throat, then outside her skull, finally erupting into a giant harpoon-canon-like growth. Her being the long shaft or the barrel out of which she crawled out of, the child being a living javelin-like growth that had contorted its body on the way out; hardened like steel, a skin of coal with many eyes and peculiar grabbers-hands that bore long stretched talons out of them. From every hole there being but a single spring-like thing that spewed everything around.

He was contemplating his failure as a man. To be certain, he hadn’t been valiant at all.

‘Certainly, I am chloride-pesticide.’

‘I am the Demon-speed that walks the walls. I make the floor where I want to.’

‘As is, is.’

Eschter was eating out of a pack of jelly-bears, they were not real bears, but he was uncertain of what to believe. He had got them from a market which was nearby. They were sour. He enjoyed the feeling of sourness. He also wore fingerless gloves, a black shirt, brown pants, a curtain on top of him, a Klan’s member hat, a pair of peculiar black glasses that would’ve been worn by Victorian England, English pirates while he had a black trap coming out of his chest. It could’ve gone off at any moment, completely splattering his body into every possible direction. The device was attached to the net he was wrapped inside of. Device being somewhat square-like outside, with large tips of conical-like pushing little tip-like mosquito-curved mouths, washed with acid, torn around the ribs. It was still sour, with every bite, he certainly felt it down his stomach which had been wrapped around the strange device, that was but a strange-like space-ship if it were seen around the moon, which had its back-propellers, those being circles, the point out of which the leathery net came out of, completely appearing out of a hole that was put on his back. Rounded, dark, a stump, a pucker that was rounded, grabbed upon by his little finger-like edges, which acted like arachnid web-spinners. They had been activated as a measure of self defense caused by the total shock he had been forced to witness and to live through once he was met by the strange creature that stood in front of him. Or upon its eruption, of which he showed no fear but some kind of contempt for having dealt with; but then again, that was it.

‘Great, I wager you ought to explain to me from this point on, the reason for which you ought to hold me accountable for what I’ve done.

Because I think you’re holding me accountable for a failure I was inevitably driven towards not by mere chance, but by a precise calculated thing which had been my heartlessness towards reason. I thought I knew you could not be saved, I thought it so. You were bound to be killed.’

‘Yet I live and here I stay, without another second wasted, in a place no one might find you in time. Arched towards you as I slowly make my move to claim the life I shall so easily destroy as I antagonize you as such.

And I can see you as such, through your peculiar metallic white helmet, although seemingly that of a ghost, through which I can simply see and walk through as I’ve come to realize what it truly is.’

‘It is not true, this is a helmet of dread, power and of the malign, you may see through its spin what it truly lay within its grasp, therefore, I shall see no reason to hide it any longer, as I will have revealed it so.

As you can see, I’ve got nothing to hide. And I will not, for the likes of me defile the means of my escape as to prove a point to a pity creature that’s barely been alive for only a short amount of time, although shows signs of a much superior power wreathed in.’

There, in the face of terror, in the halls of agony, on top of the platforms of death, there stood he. Without the slightest remorselessness, as the surgeon unwrapped his helmet, as a rusty old parchment which had been embed with ancient, almost outlandish features that had belonged to completely pounded creatures of which wrath could still be seen as if to have been sutured underneath the rotating metal helmet which hid them inside of it.

From the open child-like infantile creature there leapt the specter that had been speaking all along, as it to defile even the husk from which it had simply erupted out of. With such a peculiar malignity as to have been made aware, there was only this it had, but the reasonless wonder, as to say.

‘I have tricked you as such, to have revealed yourself with such pity. I revel in your plastic mind, one of logic yet that’s tricked by such puerile things, now I shall seek no wonder as I merely enter my new home.’

‘But you cannot do so, because that would only mean defilement of all that I dearly me hold dear to my very soul. You cannot pierce that which is mine as to destroy what comes to mind and make of me what would put under a small juveniles chest where he stands.

As I seek, desperately, for a way out, through which I may be able to unleash the evil my body still holds on. Because I swore that I would destroy whatever evil lays into my hold. That I may cast this thing into such a deep abyss that I may prevent doing a crime as the likes of whom, might be told so to none.’

‘That is?’

‘To serve as inspiration, is but dread to every man that may behold such form with scorn for eyes.’

‘Why have thou not smashed it then? In all your search towards the salvation of man for which you have become a surgeon, how, must it be that it has never occurred to you to destroy it?’

‘I cannot, for it may not be touched by the hands of man.’

But it’s sometimes clear, when one needs to watch, that such perverted men need not talk about their dues. Since, beyond his reach, the cavalry has but arrived; driven through the drivel as if they were but put about and would not stand away, their arms but settled. They but cleared the slight and threw away the creature as to see it draw, back into the shell, as it came. The spirit just darted with the entire structure as to make way. Wherever he may have went and wherever such sights and pains. They were but his and lay.

Quickly on himself as if to wrap and take away from them, whichever damned sight there might be there and wherever they may come upon no matter.

‘Ah, I see but you claim to have come near me during the time. I see you’ve come to steal away whatever shroud I may have steeled through. Sealed in it there but nothing left, more so than I should be aware.’

‘What have they done to you, surgeon, are you harmed by any means?’

‘Stay you hands, the platform is still not yet safe to be walked upon as you may be called to feed upon its plains and stay away as I call upon you, but stay where I may see you.’

‘For what reason, oh dear man of little mind, what are you hiding behind your back? What should we beckon upon you when times draws so short as for you to become of own?’

‘I don’t know whom to trust. I’ve been touched, around my mask, and I fear that you’ve come to steal it away from me in large disgust.

Please stay your way and do not approach until I call upon you.’

And although there was a distant run, as if they had but been called away by his long-distant shout, before him there stood but the Buffoon, the Ham, Dock and the Clerk among others whom were benign. Of a sight such as the likes might not draw from them, let It be called. As queer of thought, they came here by chance. Not to wane or waste away, or how to wonder how they came upon his place.

‘But how, oh over, might you have found me, if I drearily so ask of either? Of smell I feel naught and I’m lost about each thought as if to have left a trail.’

‘We but stumbled on this place on our way out of the way. In search of a way out, we but looked for a reason to get away before the time.’

‘And what time would that be?’

‘Whatever happened out would doom us as to seal each step. To take away and draw from our mouths potato and bread; whichever red beads, shattered, were made appear, all around the planet, only to have life but disappear. In plains we no longer stand and nowhere near can we walk again.

I think this is the end, high-likely. I think there's but a chance to stay. But a single lifetime to look around and live with him to the last of our days.'

'Why do you need him so then? What can he offer either of you?'

'Nothing, and perhaps that, per chance could be spoken off. I see no reason to wreathe within the hour, for we know now what you hide behind this show of darks, and behind the curtain you hide behind.'

'Then ask of me this, what will I do to you if you were to invite such a man?

I must admit, as I have admitted to that failure of thought that I alone conveyed, that I alone am responsible for and may not drag my hands in vein. I would have to do and would to be and claim your lives as I see fit. And would to bring but large up soiled, from what happened to you and underneath the veil. There would be little to no way to return.

I will have stabbed your throats, and claim ever to be. Ever your fault only for you to see that there was never but a chance to lay your trust in me.'

'We can take our chances then, oh man, but we claim our need, for we are in a deep need for your expertise we might claim for ourselves. Would that not suffice if we are to take our chance?

Or are you to fall upon this pitiful den and rot with the rest of your failures?'

Of which kind had but resurfaced all of the sudden, as if they were lain there in waiting, trying themselves with each sight. Behind the curtains and the coils of dark, where many hid and many would remain, not to make too much noise now, but they could be seen again. From many other failed procedures, those hands but being the reason they were still to wait. Claim again what they could and vein as they were, there was but little reason to stay.

'The net in which you're trapped?'

'It's shallow, I cannot point to no better thing. It shall eventually rest upon my brow and ever-narrow body as it melts away. I will have been made to lay and put to rest and lay in slumber with my creations.

That's what I am, a creator of putrescence, a failure of life which wrought the likes that would've been saved in twisted contortions that simply walk behind my shadow.

If I were to take it away, they will have devoured me. If I stay at least, I will have closed my eyes, blind to my demise and everything I so ever-clear despite touching upon as I lay broken.'

'Then join us so we may be followed through. We need you in the most peculiar sighted scene, and wreathed thin, bodies call upon your whim to play. And know that these bodies you look upon are very much alive and may as well be the only chance to your redemption.'

As from that point on he was but joined, with the net, etched into his body, chest, blow and head until he had become it, though highly-likely as it were. His helmet was merely unaffected on the other side. It was but ever so closer to falling off and becoming him, which fright had only set his mind to. Either that way, or wherever he had himself handle as to talk. He spoke of the most uncanny feelings, which were but wreathed, torn around. Walking upon a limp, always behind them as to feel himself torn. He looked upon them as a bird to his pair of worms and little insects tried about. And of what little more would he recall now.

There was agony in every hall and every stop, there was the Cleaner. But he had not been one for long, as long past since had he degenerated as to have become, Dirtier, as he had pained. All that remained in every smoke-filled grain of the floors and of the lights, smashed in and put about as everything lay in such a sight as to look as if they were contaminated. There was but dread and as more than it should be, It had remained. Poor statues appearing as if the graveyard, the Hospital had been but a Red Tomb; of which watcher had long decided not to spare themselves of too much work, as much and as little more.

Throughout year, throughout day, eating biscuits every day; they're do die for, they are liked. They're to be put around your belly and laughed at. But they're not like bears of jelly, no one wants them, always in the gums, always cast them off, then into the trash-compactor there they go. Unlike the seeds, the Buffoon should know, never mix them, never mix them, never mixed, where they go? In which direction? Certainly the hungers, first signs to show.

'We should walk through it again, there's another power-out, another feather of a cock, another puerile thing about the hour, you're always talking about taking a shower, aren't you?'

'And how is that my fault now?'

I am not the one who brought us here in the first place.'

Stopped on their tracks, a few truck-shaped patient carrying humans were but moving around on top of human shaped wheels. A dome on top of them as black as the sun, threw black-bolted, blue-trailed, red outlined dark electric thunders all around the place as they walked through. Not to be disturbed by the oddity, a little bowl of fruits had landed. But right before they could draw near, as Brim had but defended it. His stance was shook, and would he look.

The little brick came out like a rat, it took the bowl and the fruits out. Darting, smashed through one of the walls, pushing through as if it were but a tiny canon trying itself around, pushing past the necessary thing which had darted until their hands were taken out. And there, he said it.

'I told you we should've destroyed it when we had the chance, now we lost our last hope to make it in time. To eat, I mean to eat.'

'There's other means to make is, so, no?'

'But you do not understand, you simply do not understand, we're doomed and taken and claim alike. This calamity is but ruin and ruined through, the sight.

We lost everything and that's because you would not let me smash that brick.'

'There are others like it.'

And then, at the most inopportune moment, the sounds came in heaps, from the ends, farther ends in the distance where there were points where none else lay, they stood as they were likely, and what to call upon, what happened there?

Birds were audibly making noise, they froze. Two chocolate bars.

But they were drawn upon that room up north-east where stood but the map, drawn on a single east-south hall where they stood, making it directly proportional to where they stood, being even closer to the south, while standing in front of the long-stretch which lead to the western exit.

In another room.

There's but no other reason, to be certain about it. They had to find her in order to escape.

More so.

'Ah, but I see you sprained an ankle. And your teeth all busted up. I can see from your cardiography that your lungs are as full at that, my fists are but a single piece, I could fill twenty of them then push you to feel something, may I enter now?'

The procedure was anything but safe, from what could be judged. It was hard in any case.

'Say, if you're all caught up now, with little to no chance of truly getting up, seeing how your jaw is split open, would you happen to listen to me for a moment now?

I find it strange, don't you?

I was merely thinking the other day.

I know, it's a strange thing, but it's how my mind disassociates some things from my partaking into something while at the same time, I suppose I would never take my daughter for a harlot by any means.

I suppose It's simply not hypocritical for me to say this, but just because I so often find myself in usage of them, that it has never occurred to me that one day I could wake up with my daughter becoming on, which would in turn be something that's unacceptable. To be sure about it; I don't think it is. And it isn't, as I know that this isn't just a matter of natural prowess, but that kind of behavior is kind of unacceptable.

Don't try struggling, you're only going to make yourself feel more pain. Regardless of it, I know it to be so.

For I have figured that it is not the same thing and it may not apply to one such as mine by any means whatsoever and you want to know why? The reason for it is quite simple, I'd say.

Would you invite a homeless person to live with you from this point on until they will have found a place to live and make do for their living? Of course you wouldn't. But would you do that for your own flesh and blood? Of course that answer depends on person to person, although by the same terms, one could simply suppose every father would stretch or lend a hand when needed to their own while at the same time scowling at such a person of which circumstance there's little to be known about. As aid would not do to lift such a person as to reconcile with what got them there in the first place.

In the same manner, I don't think it's hypocritical for me to venture, as often as one could go, in order to satisfy my own pleasure while vindicating myself by vilifying this kind of behavior perpetuated by them.

In some way, searching for shelter and having employed use of one is just as natural as let us say, using a harlot for your own personal pleasures and on-doings, wouldn't you think so? But I would never want to invite some kind of vagrant to live with the likes of me by any means whatsoever, since I could not deal with such a person as to be as irrational to have come to that point at any time.

I suppose both of those involve circumstances that invite the likes of hypocritical ordeals that cannot be seriously washed or brushed aside by any means. There's shame involved in both of them, but most importantly it stems from the mere fact that harlots are used. As that is merely the role of a woman by whatever means she finds herself in.

She is but an object to be used, which cannot be denied. And having exposed someone as your daughter to this kind of behavior takes a toll on a man; as a man's daughter cannot become as the likes of a harlot being used by whichever man so as to please himself with her, as to first and foremost shame him. Since that very being serves as a reflection of her upbringing and the result of a man's failure to act when called for. In the past, as one knows, a man was free to take the life of a woman whenever he pleased, and that act alone served as nothing more than a liberating thing from all the shame, or agony. Allow me to take another cut out off your mouth, you won't need your vocal cords, main artery, gums, teeth, tongue or eyes. Greatly so; a man is but to employ the means of cutting off a cancer that's been growing on him from the side, adding to itself with the likes of low-lives and whichever creature might employ such a being in the first place.

In all honesty, that's what separated men from animals. It's that distinction, the means of stepping in and changing in. Blocking, ripping it off, killing it if it's necessary. We don't consider those harlots human, but we use them; just in the same way we don't consider workers human, but we use them. I could've been born one of those obnoxious, insignificant creatures myself, but that won't stop me from seeing the loathsome nature they bear.

No, it's just plain and simple. No one is equal, and no one ought to be treated as such. It's a simple case, by whatever means one might employ this kind of abuse upon another, as for him to admit that some people are disposable but not everyone. If a man is a disposable soldier, is a woman not meant to be bred with?

Why of course they both fulfill their duties, something which may simply be understood by whatever means one could look into. And if it is as such, should they not be allowed once again to recognize the nature of the tainted blood which inhabits as well as alienated one of his descendants? In which case, may they not simply cut them off entirely only to start again?

For this is no matter of hypocrisy at all, as that would imply all men are equal, which alone is not and shall never be perceived as being true by whatever means there are; not mentally, not physically, not socially, by no means are they to be seen as being alike. In the same way one might mistreat someone who is of a far inferior breed, or someone who is of a much, unlikely to be bred with conscience, they are not to be perceived as being alike, henceforth, other than the skin-deep similarities they seem to share, nothing of the kind could be established.

My daughter will never be a harlot, and if she become, the responsibility falls upon my shoulders to either change her or claim her life in which I have deeply invested in. For she is mine, her life is mine and I own her. And I have invested a great deal, therefore I am entitled to her well as well as wrongdoings, for that is how life is and that is how we're made. We get what we pay for, in the same way two people whom had undergone such a transactional relationship as marriage have, ought to. Although this is something that may not be easily enforced any longer, one knows of ways. And one can make sure that one can always suffer for them.

Ah, and there she is.'

After splitting open the man, he had found her half-cut head, exactly where he had planted her. After sawing off the upper half, after putting her right here, while he had been under anesthesia, and now? She looked back at him, blinking constantly confused.

'I see that you have enjoyed my little suturing procedure, have you not?

But I am still to be satisfied by what I've done, no, I suppose not. I'm still considering, you know?

Nothing personal, you could've lived like me, but now, you live this. And I don't feel any shame for it now, since most of my patients are yet to know or have found out that, I've implanted your body parts in them, or that they're walking with you inside of them.

Again, I don't think I'm a hypocrite, by any means for what I'm doing. Should I feel guilty for having purchased something cheaply made in some overworked sweatshop because they're being paid far less than someone would've been if they were here? Of course I'm not going to feel guilty 'bout it. No, I think, people have gone mad. They're blinded by discoveries of things that were always there, in plain sight, for everyone to see, acting all mighty as if they see something others don't; having a rush that gives them that thick inside their head, always fattening itself, or clicking like the tongue of a clock.

It shouldn't bother me at all now, or it wouldn't. If they hadn't gotten as obnoxious as to rub it in my face every time I make a plain thing as a comment on it. And why should one comment on a god?

I am a god, just so you know. I do what I please, I say what I please, I am in control of your life and that of everyone that goes underneath my hands. I know better than anyone else and if one were to call me out, I could simply just ignore them as the plebian they are. I would've fancied if things went in a different direction though.

You didn't have to do this, it shouldn't have come to it, but, there is no other way. I have to keep suturing you up, I have you bury you deeper, I have to get rid of my shame and of the reminder of what you have become. Once your mind reaches a certain point, this disassociation between acts cannot occur any longer, for that is the way of the mental invalids that merely adhere to such natural fallacies. They would justify touching children if they were allowed to. Look at the African tribes that have their chieftains feed young children their own seed, how quaint of them and of their ordeals. Is there nothing more to be looked at, other than that? Are such acts not contemptible and worth our pity? Are such creatures not primitive and merely serve as a means to justify such vile and degenerate behaviors as the likes which are being employed by people who call themselves our own? Are we allowed to question?

Well that doesn't matter for the normal man, he was the illiterate who could not speak Greek during a time where every poor man spoke vulgar Latin. He is the one that cannot read or write. He is but the insignificant, barely capable of birthing an abstract thought at all. He is but a man, flawed in essence and incapable of changing.

Unlike I, the god, whom shall rule upon all and claim the lives of whichever I so please myself with taking. In which case, I choose to claim yours, though you may have inherited by godly blood and basked in my eternal essence, you have given yourself to decadence and decay. Therefore, your punishment is to life and decay with every man you've been part off, to have been used in death as you will have been used in life.'

With which he had but spat on her and watched decay. This time refusing to take a step as to have left her in any other piece than what he had latched upon to prevent her stay; in this world there would be but naught, those who would see him as a god.

'And I leave now and choose of plain and whom to run around and where to lay.'

And he had named himself Pthok; carrying but nothing more but a scalpel and a small hammer in his lab-coat, making sure to lower the platform ever so lower so no one might find her in during her slow descend into the underworld.

Pitlok but swore, he was of a kind to bring something to his mouth and eat it. While beguiled with everything that came around him, of the asphalt mended, but to look past one the drowning in man-trucks he but looked away. Obtuse and to hinder their walk, he but talked to a small salamander-dressed crone that had followed him around, two of them now, within the corner, awakened by whichever noise, of which they would but poise themselves as if to swear upon him, we would be worn out. By whichever call, as to hear what had happened after, as he had heard them now.

'Get away from me, immediately, can't you see that I have but no time to entertain no crone that I may look forth and ask for this. Leave me now, as I ask of nothing more and no more should I be made to feel. I've come to know of which sounds you speak off. I bed you plain, you're morose, I can already see that you're in pain.'

A headache of wreathing old, and would to be, as old would shone. They were grossed out, and plain, the mutations about their faces had made their brown-dark plain dust clothes but to be melded and washed off, as if they were drowned in it. Before the time had come to their absinthe scents, were they drenched to listen and hear; of what was told and would be old.

There were no worthless signs. Worthless creature, in the distance, hard to settle by; burnt man with clubs for arms set together in pairs of two and held like arms. Attached to them back, two sets of arms, one that belonged to the creature and another pair that wasn't belonged to anything or anyone, worsened by the disease, never eaten, there was but nothing that was to be set to it. As for it bore, a single trench-heaved up is thin chest atop a forehead worn out. Broken on the sides the ribs extended like strands of hair. Sounded like key chains that were jingled as they came to be touched by the first animals which had been birthed by the watch. Gothic-clothed, and vileness, they were but trying to spare themselves. It wasn't good enough.

'I've come to think that there's no better filth, I'm trying to get a filth-bottle.'

And one of the crone, and would to be, she felt it.

‘Ah, I see, you should offer us a disease, a distress, anything as I would like to confess.’

There was but much and would to be about. Each derogation and each castration would to be felt in every room they passed, during the creation of a moving light atop the vigil. Men had gathered and some had flown out of it. Hardened by what appeared to be the one day which rose in their hearts, unable to come to understand, when was it that they lost contact with the outside world. Spoken to them, every now and forth.

‘Ah, there’s but a break where we might eat.

I think I’ll have roast beef with a side of lettuce.’

‘Shall we eat the gourmet then? How about the chef as well?

He is but a pierced Rook, and the King has become but the pool. A veteran of dogs that’s eating but my shoe.’

‘Is it not rubbery then, with a slice of blueberries that are set aside?’

They had spoken of just as much. And would not leave, the room was but a bit too tightly set and closed around, would not to be interested in, not to understand; not to help. They were but cut, around each filament, the room was dead. Dead people were taken and put into bourbon little fleece containers, and would to be put inside.

No disease would be distress; into coming into the dreadful coming. Marching forth, the little insects were prodding. Some were but unable, incapable of derogation. A few more of the filthily set reactions were but put aside. There was a dreadful child, of little roses-blunt, and tender. Eaten aside and would to be contender.

One asked, but what en trance and what to do after he was caught off guard. He went around and asked for less, he was but filled with left-over pieces across his chest. Form which there pointed another man.

‘Bring the axe, we’ll have him.’

During their play they each took a small axe, a small knife and a butcher’s little blunt thing, a mask for pigs made out of nails, glass and various other things that had been found around. All used in unison to make him do. Hear the screams that would come to be, as one to get himself through it. First of the wall heard the screams, the second one just saw a room within it.

Placed between four chairs they spread him after, waited twenty seconds only to see him lifted, wonder. He was but alive, sealed inside and leaping like a little puppy-eye that cried in a pool of peculiarly set little finger-dead people that were there as well. They were but the floor and a strong little thing which wanted to stop them.

‘Drop your weapons, all of you, now!’

But it was late, as their friend was but turning on them as he'd become. But every touch but pushed ahead, made as to spread everywhere, like a bottle that was shaken, but four of them sprouted the top and the cap, at the same time they were all brought aside and thrown everywhere they could land in, caught and rooted in place from having their skulls poked in and put through so much dead from which they could not deal themselves any longer. It was too much.

‘Dogs bleed but I will not.’

For Hamilton had but the will and might to make it through before the lights were taken out of their eyes. As he fell, he made it through as well and was but bumped and entered through the truck until he, well enough had been left to stare. At a strange machine, inside of them. Making but little people out of eyes, which walked on steps and were but attached; he almost came to, set aside and not understand. This obsession with it had to end.

‘Think of wishful thoughts.’

Yelled at him, one of the men, uncouth and unable, instead. He had but not understood why they were but followed by them, always, always, but to disembowel, the parapet trumpet, the form of two boxes put beneath them, not a tail but a strange split in halves thing, which wore wing-fat, or the fat inside of a mammoth without limbs, which had been wrapped around, slowly shrunk as his head became a grinder until finally he could leave. Slowly dragging himself until to heave, strange symbols everywhere, drawn by hands or craters that had depressed themselves in it.

And that creature opened like a treasure chest, only to heave like a trap, all small shafts, which killed some of the men off. Hamilton but raised his fists and covered his face in peace, blocking some of them with his knuckles, forearms, as well as getting some of his side-clothes scuffed. He walked, in had become a full plight of rolling away, incapable of knowing where he'd go at that. Always trying himself over, incapable of questioning or rowing on the side. He wanted to appear somewhere else, but ended up having followed but a Dirtier, who was occupied, with one of the dead corners, a body in his back turned. He but made a motion around his mouth with a finger's worth, shh.

Not to settle with what happened, thoroughly in set, he simply refused to be dead or listen to any kind of reason instead, making it half-way through.

And bowing to an uncanny thing, he had but faced a hunger unlike any other that was, on cue. Delivered to him by the brick, he fed himself like a little invalid, spitting as he could not use his arms, sinew. Of what poured out of him, he wasn't in the mood to live. No one was.

The sky was of a different red as well as the atmosphere started hardening, burning, becoming, as well, filled with life. Uncanny forms being made there, for the new inhabitants and the creatures ruling this world were to be set. And never mended by what would happen there, in their wildest reveries no one could be settled to follow. All but destroy, to sorrow.

And there was still Zlazlow who had yet to touch.

Such kindness of a soul as if to understand what set him back. No more hearing and no more having to think, only that made him aware of what appeared in the sky during a day where he had but a single drink in the name of great peculiar Approacher.

The Approacher had begun once chanting of long day come, just like the Indians would to be. Whichever natives and regardless of tribe, of sayings they had spoken once to him. He of tall and mighty stature, upon a broken man's upheld nature, but spoke of vile days the evil come. In the veins but floating around, the red of Mars soon to change.

And none of it would be left in grains, it shall become but of Azure, as this was to be taken, as the making of his soon to be bride.

Ophelia came to mind, her essence tainted, through the spectrum of disease, all put through the alkaline bliss which followed due. To the calling, he had appeared in a blackened robe, a tributary upon which he stood of broken nodes formed of ripped out foundation from which he appeared.

At once he threw the cowl away, spread what appeared to be toe-malignant wing-talon-pus contortions at the tips where long finger-spikes emerged, from a trunk that was hardened and bigger than a whale's girth, to a head that was but in two pieces facing each side, then from his back, the worth. Some of which had came from below his body, then from behind. Like curved traps that were reeling back into his body just as they were coming out of, black streams of coils or something toiled as they made the foundation of a giant tome-curved in. Like half a dome of a geisha's wind blower thing, behind it, on which every documented fight would seem to bring. That sight within and tiny bubble-bolts in the distance, on a whim; yellow-lit globes that were but serving like light bulbs in this world where light was gone. And they lived in azure-dark.

Some of the coils from below the trunk had but expanded themselves to him as they started eating his body piece by piece, at a completely questionable distance, from which they had bloated part of the Approacher's chest in which his reflection appeared. There he would be dead. A coffin of skin, and part within, he had been shown but his own death.

And the poor fool thought it but a simple jest. As when the time approached he only saw a sea of red, unlike the blue, it must've been wrong he thought, of due.

What would he due to all the VHS tapes he'd stored? They were in his gut and only swore they were themselves real in a way he could not feel but watch. And he remembered keys that were black and had still so many bucket lists on which the slender touch of the wreathing sound. A sound came, out of nowhere, highly mechanic, like that of a machine breaking, as if a power-arc was but to happen, as if the destruction of the whole device and dreams would be wreathed in, worn out in the matter. Fewer seconds had him become but administered into it, like a shot, his body completely absorbed, where he remarked, that in every death and every making, there were billions of bodies, all put together. He was amongst them, unable and incapable to move. And his feet were so tired, despite what shook him most.

He had spent many years as a cyclist in the employ of the NSA. Though his body had become but the bike one day as his mental state had decay upon seeing an unfathomable event which shook his very nature, as he stepped between two lines, and saw between them that his teeth were misaligned, having become their own pitiful destruction tools which ate what they could. Incapable of holding himself in check, he but ran away but the lines appeared anyway. It was the lines, always in the city, always holding him. He had cycled there and would stop, taking anything he could grab. The lines told him to kill them so he may release a white blood from which a light lobe would emerge, and spread until having become the elongated oblong-sphere-head of a apparition of which body was that of a puddle spread in four directions, while appearing as if it had been squirted out of a water-gun, so it could look as if it would form a tall body, instead of one which was brought down. There, it appeared all too clear that this was the inhabitant of the lines which had almost strangled him in the streets but he ran.

And as he ran away from the crime, it was then that he had met his wife, that which he dreaded most and would loathe to hear; as she loathed her, oh how much he had desired for her to disappear. It came clear to him even at that point that his child was but armless, and would occur further that his legs were on his back, as he walked on mad walls while reading the annals of a lost city he had once dwelled in. For in that city he had been a long-to do scribe and had spoken to secret beings he could not remember the faces on. Of which flowering gulls had been his skin but chimes. He had become them and had part of his knowledge stolen, as was his mind, put on walls. That was he would always live, as but words could be put to skin and they would become. Ancient days calling him home, that house which stooped about the crone-like formation of little mole-women of which humanity had faded that long day when the earth shook by the apparition of the strange ziggurat which had almost broken the world. Many others like them being there as well, everywhere across the world; them serving as a sign, since they were but placed on precise locations that had been written down like secret codes; which were but part of frozen mathematic-lobes that could be interpreted by physicians in order to form a map that would open the bowels of the earth in order to make all appear naught. They had settled with destruction as such as a man would do.

Now, the Buffon had also another vision in a dream which had called upon him to look upon the Man of Boils which had been a servant of Filth itself, of which little doubt could be talked about. In the veins of the evil people whom to worship and worsened veins, only dread approached now as one could hear the moans. They were in pain and begging him to let him say. But a mere word and they would go away. They had to be cast out, as if from heaven. Leave the absence, now the broken pavement. And his eyes were red and worn, and genetic little children were but eyes. And why? Because they were red from staring out for too long until it could not be harder and harder as it was, they could not do it. Allowed to leave, and helpless. He had gotten herpes one day and never learned how to drive a car. So it happened, as to him, when he had driven from the distance, would have lost himself on a whim because the vehicle drove itself, it being but connected to the will of the universe which was guided by a GPS compass that was connected to a tower of skin spread around. There was dread in whichever man's eyes.

And there was also Brim.

He had enough of thinking and merely hit walls with his screwdriver. Always but a mind to smash, no one questioned where this desire came out off, but it had been allowed since he could not self-harm himself any longer. Being too pained now there were days when he wondered whether or not anything mattered. As a matter of fact, what was he made out of?

Strange questions always pained him as such. There were days where he could only eat dark-puddles dropped out of a light.

‘But tell me, oh, tell me whichever it be.

Why is that shallow thing bleeding? The light. I’m so much done so, I must defeat the nemesis of thoughts until I will have become him during a night that’s become them.’

‘Who are you talking to?’

‘I think this is one of his episodes, we should simply let him be.’

‘Perhaps he needs a cigar, does he not? Hey, friend, do you want me to roll you one?’

‘You what?’

‘Or not, smoking is plain cancer any way.’

‘But I want to die. Perhaps that’s what I want to do with my life, there’s no hope we might get out of this place alive.

So I might as well just fill my body with wreathing cancer and become a gangrene shot that will infest anyone.’

For cancer is like flu. It simply is, a virus that spreads to everyone that touches a person with cancer as tumors are bacterium points and little craters that move around holes and live in moist-dark spots with little rat-people and the mice.

Oh worthless thing how could it be that he had not seen anything else other than him? For every moment’s woe he had recounted. For everything that passed him, ever as to have been darted. He had failed to see the fetid fate. Of which the Brim like nature would prevail onto that of theirs, for he was mocking and would never see, whichever side of the wall to be pushed upon, oh such an edifying thing which gathered. He, but a man wearing a cowl of rubbing fingers now, but worn as well. A beard grown as well as the appearance of one whose old nature could not be satisfied with putting aside all. As he battered but an ocean and would bring song upon all; him whom was of a nature as to be discontent with them all had been but a recluse of the mind, he was but one put there like a hermit to seek her, in the time.

‘The lights are one but soon, oh son they will disappear, brought done by thing which would have it as such. The power must come out one day and you will have been vilified by everything as to convey nothing more.

You’re cruel as to know of no candle. You will burn through very wall as to hide yourself and wonder, what was in that room and what are they doing in it? You should not check for the likes of it, they will back taken you by the ankles and ripped them to shreds no wonder as to what. They’re cruel, you should know that, there will be but no point after you.’

But he hadn’t spoken much and would to have himself lost carving but himself and each man inside the crew, as well. Wondering when will there be hope to leave. He had promised them the Buffoon.

Zlaslow was but a special case, and in his specialty was but this, of little ornaments that floated around and spoke in tongues, with little more than what would be, two days prior to thee.

When he had served his share out there and seeing them attached as many as hundreds of them as to be stretched upon a little plow of land.

He dreamed, he dreamed, he dreamed again. It was of an uncanny thing he could not be aware of, ever since through dance of lay. Where he stood now and then, he could see them talk, even in the dark of their eyes, always watching him, as he was given the gift of the eye. No, he was born with it, always to speak off.

‘Listen, listen, listen, I need to make sure you understand, they’ve taken me, they’ve lain claim. I am but calamity, and where I stay, they’re always a foot away from where I stand.

They’re trying to have at me and claim my life, I’m so afraid, my heart weeps, I know I won’t stay for long in this world. I know that my life will be taken if they find out, I know.’

For the Buffoon wore the greatest gift of all, the glass false eyes with which he had been born with, his real eyes grew in them and took their shape and color as to claim. He could see all through, and through. And they would have him, appear in sinew.

Like that strange floating unbearably to look out receding thing, upon the wing of a single blasphemous creature, with eighteen wings-put together floating organic devices that were but connected to it by some wire, drawing some meat as they protruded forth, like large bulks of forest-trees ear-lobes and ear drums which had been compressed in the points and drew out, through the bodies of bean-stalks growths. Around them rose, little to no matter, uncanny mouth-like structures, which spread the dark messages the one bore. Him of fatness and of peculiar strident gloves put together, feature he had recognized, and from each finger but a long-child with the mouths of strapped on-god-like figure that was set inside. Carved through, with the arms of large planted, long-winged breathers, within their arms but uncanny tilting feelers; these were the ones in control, and beings like these appeared everywhere and followed him until he could get no night of sleep, no more.

In the distance breathing the sheriff, he, but a dark figure standing at the door, within an earshot, trying to get a word in, chewing on a turpentine leaf. Trying to get himself off the point where he felt a as if, he would be next. He stood proudly looking at him, with a gun in his reach but none in his hand no longer. It went away. But he could’ve sworn it was there, again, he drew near and saw it appear, a trick of the hand, and then he was near. Kicked behind the back of his head, waking up but on a leg, both of them but wrapped around, his hands, his one arm and face, at last. He was in a secluded zone behind two cranial-moving bars. Which stopped no man, but he was tied instead.

And he had fought through all to get to the side and would do it much harder if he were but to try his hands again, only to have himself failed, time after time.

He had always been threatened by everything and everyone, but the Buffon knew exactly when to fight back.

And there was another, more peculiar man.

He lived a perfect life as one would say, witnessing, at a first-hand account what happened inside the Hospital, he decided, that one day he would get out of it, escape and write about his experience, no matter what people might think of him or of them.

Clerk was but a piece of a scuffle. He was touched by the looks of him. Despite the apparition of this doctor, whom was Infant Outer, he had been uncanny. To say the least, he had walked near the Psychiatric ward one day, and there practices his mind were yet to wrap around, let alone convey.

It was a field practice, taking patients and injecting them with something in their heads, out there in the open where he could watch, where it was.

Ah, but it was certainly not something either of them expected. Always but a problem, always but a fix, little cabin-pox, little first aid box filled with the first patient that ever lived the plague. It was there, in the hospital, placed next a fire extinguisher. Every kind and un-kind and every tide and everything appeared to be surrounded, by the blind and by the touch. It seemed ever so likely that it was senseless as to know. Why it was pouring out now that every wall was but storm-wood wet, and black and standing erect. He remembered how he snuck, and walked around. Ready to get around at a single watch, to check it again; near the ward, and every time he had made it had he realized how things had happened there. There was but one man, and he was waving in the distance, hard to be focused on. Too tired, out of the dread which inhabited his fingers then; it was clear. Man was not made to fear or to look around when the lights were made to look alike.

One can't go alone on a bottle of acid and it was for that reason that he watched him wane. And remain in the spot where he had but pushed out of it, always of in the blinds, the compactor behind him pushing out the lights. Purple-violet, a light which appeared before he was fished inside the room; by many hooks and poles which dragged him in before he could throw away the leper cradle they pulled him back into. They ate from him loudly. They would become him, walking outside with long bayonets attached to their arms, pushing about their meat-wagon fat which curdles around their fattened bodies. Most lost their coats, unevenly put, came to him, as it they did that they were not fishermen, and they were not hooks, long-needles wrapped around IV that shook the man, they walked around. Such strength to be uncannily found, they ripped each wall with big burly hands, calloused and hurt, and cut instead. They could not control themselves any longer. Always hitting the marks, always provoking the most unnatural creatures to follow them around. And they were there, talking to them as they appeared. Fearing what might happen afterwards if they were to open up and split behind. Twenty of them small, like tiny pups, set in flight, but of a piece, they wore their angel-like figures in the back upon a fist-shaped like extension made out of tinier growths, and tongues pushing out of them, licking their new homes, the men who had come out.

And they were not doctors, nor nurses but some of the less fortunate men who hadn't survived the transplants but appeared not to be dead either. It seemed ever so likely that they could not make it through. They had to be reminded that there were things that were unacceptable, as to not ruin the entire world, and put through, such a hold. They ripped everything but still would not be worn out. Not by the creatures inside of them, nor by what crept inside, deeper through them, as these creatures acted like the first means of entry, the rubbing alcohol put on top the arm before the shot could be taken, despite the fact that they were already burrowed in. In them came, with the help of the tongues which acted like guiding factors, little strange bubble-pus specters of diseased being that had died, during the decide of the moon, their god.

Life was a malfunction they could not spare themselves off. It was inconceivable, trying to see through them once their lower legs were given on, them entering the ward, deeper inside, falling over themselves as they buried even deeper, having made it to the tower. Although abandoned and made to wait, there was nothing there that life would not satiate for thought alone and there was nothing either left to bar the light or to bestow upon them such a thing as the peculiar mad twist and turn and body of torches that were but lit upon their touched worms-like shells, surrounded as well, by jelly-wells which hid the deeper bodies in. One could not fashion such a thing on a whim. Various other parasites hid inside the jelly wells, in which Entamoeba histolytica was but kind. In little enlarged nests and pucks of red, in which it started spreading around, they but strode out of the hardened basin, lumped together on a whim as if to breed on chance, there, once fallen by chance some of them had finally grown their wings as they began flying around and claiming the city as their own, spreading with an uncanny thing, a desire to dominate which almost seemed to have been engineered in them. By such means as to know that there was no release.

They had merely tried communing with it for a long period of time until they accepted its dominance, which had claimed a few of them over, drawn inside by their throats as, proven by their incompetence, they were unable to resist the organic surge which had overtaken them.

‘Ah but lord of a ruined castle, I see that there’s but something near, oh, you whom might call upon the Scribe to record and you who might call upon him to reform every crack and every plain broken by the weight brought here.

You should know of this.’

‘Of what now? And why may I be awakened during my hour of slumber when I cannot fathom living for a day yonder.

But if it is behind reason, where it finds itself hiding, may I not be granted peace as well? I seek to find some peaceful thing here I may rest if you don’t mind it.’

‘That may not be granted yet, not while we live in a basement within their hold. Not within reason to have claim, whatever there is, we took them away.

Whichever supplies that might’ve saved their men, we took and hid whatever we could and took them of plain thought, without questioning what we have done.’

‘And have we hurt a man and what have we done with him then? And what can there be done in that case, if such a folly can’t be spoken of any longer?’

‘We’ll keep taking can’t you? They brought the seed of destruction on themselves, it was them whom defiled the lack of satisfaction that lurks in their minds but only spits off our venomous blood. For our veins must likely, to have found so on our own skin, be fanged with each tongue they spill and draw within as they feed upon themselves, injecting. Always, and always will our antibodies be fading.

And that’s but known, we can’t be cured, that’s why we’re here, you should know this.’

‘But wait, oh Dghegg of which you’re made of worn and last, away. Will you but think of the consequences of waiting and trying to appeal even the worst of man and even in his prime and worst of days, might he still but take advantage of what's stored and if it's so, will they not just grandly reward us for keeping something that's their own?'

'They won't do such a thing for beasts, for those within their grasp and for those who surround them. Can you not see yet, can you not understand that what we've done and what we've tried is but poisoned at which sound and which touch, will only be accompanied by a snarl?

To be interpreted as an act of treason and be put to death as the blunder might be called upon, to feel the least, of all, false contempt?

For us there's but little to no doubt, we cannot be certain of what is gone and what went through our bodies to be caught again and put to deathless beds in which they lay, they think of us, they dream.

We're the nightmares that have stolen their childhoods on a whim and have tainted their very last chance that they might live long lasting peaceful days, grown and olden, for each act we've committed will have been weight and said. Of treason like man, of monsters like them, we took away everything and that, my friend.'

'It cannot be parted from, can it? I suppose we're but to be done about it, now that they're gone. And in trail of destruction there won't be a man left to feel, or to reel in through the most uncanny thing and be destroyed and feel but pain and be enslaved, a testimony of when.'

'And when will that day come, my dear friend, that we shall finally cross the line and push aside which testimony there's there, left to give and lend upon their bodies, of touch within touch as if to realize, we're the cause of it, for we have treated and we have spared.

And we have mended, everywhere. For each of the ones that were without head and the bodies they carried, whom promised not spare any man who had done such a blasphemous thing, as to allow them to live. As to carry on within, to be tormented to no end, and to be blessed with such a sight, and then. What will happen once every man is dead? To whom will they turn to if not us, the ones whom' mend?

Only to destroy, themselves and every ploy and every maker, every creator and every reanimator if that's their will?

I know it to be so. Because I am aware that they know and if we do it, there's but hell to pay.'

'Then we should do it anyway, only for the sake of it, only for each man alive, only for each creature in sight, we have to bring them back, corrosion, or at least for sake alone, look at whom we had crossed paths with. Do they look like men? Nay, they don't, but they achieved, such sighs of the malign as for us to rest within the hour. Our damned disaster but comes upon a shower coming through.'

Much water coming, electrified. And there seemed to be something else, left in doubt. Although they didn't fear the chance of the entire city being flooded, as there was not enough water left to spare. But they only saw it in reverse as a sign, of what it meant. They didn't stop the water-compactor, the pressure being set, the wires being met, with them across and now each dead. Whom followed through would walk again. And on top their shoulder, little men, of which obscure lore none was known. Better for them to lay so. Little more than their coming and all the breaking, beaks were roaming. All dissects, floods of beds, and some of the patients were brought instead.

During this strange series of uncanny things, they but receded in one of the small abandoned homes they often found themselves reeling through, trying to hide one another, in a must to be order, to hide themselves through. It was incontestable, how they cherished but to say a word, and how they found themselves incapable of but paying heed to such warning as if to show compassion.

‘We may not be the last who’re here, there might be many yet to come and largely, come as such, appear.’

‘But what of them and what have they learned? Are you certain that their experiences are worth? For they have seen but what have seen as such, too much destruction brought to last, too much of it already on lain on the past, on which shoulders they carry and they speak. And meekly they know of everything we’ve spoken on, about each day and each passing of every hour since we met.’

‘Yet we do not know the crossing of the alley, and do not know what lays up yonder, there are things that are defile and wait for us to lay our strongest, of which we know as much.’

‘Ah, but there is still hope to be achieved.’

Past their sight, there was one to wallow within. From the place he lay upon and from the general direction from which he appears to be lain on top, as if he were to look out of a crucified objects made out of peculiar wardrobes put together while they’re made out of peculiar telescopes that only come out during rainy days. There were some peculiar things surrounding it. Hard to see, everywhere around, hardly placed, at large distances made out of eighteen hundred miles at least, pushed on top of large pores that give the general appearance of living ground-lets put on top of one another, stacked as if this alone would suffice to someone who was out there, watching. In the mere duration, and of the mere taking of a t least eighteen days, the smoke had cleared and made it so the original, first drop was but the result of a single spread of dust-spice that had entered the nearest men inside their tombs. Some of which being actually left behind despite being revived by the strange needles that were put inside; hearing them was a bothersome thing. Since most of them appeared to make is so they heard of the slightest drops and the slightest hints that could he heard.

There was but a dead man and a dead talker whom was distracted, and worn by a suit, he was killed by it and worn her husband as she walked away, slowly descending as she had become the first of pins that had become them. They were perfect, and intelligent, like god-bodies that hardened by the second, since the Cleaners were the ones that prevented their evolution to push ahead. And many of them were but put to so much stress that there could be nothing more. And more would they come to press, onto one another during the initial witnessing of the pass.

And finally the silence came at last.

A few living things, if so could they be called gathered around, fathered by no one, but in doubt of what was going on, have merely come to ask as well. Just what happened there during their absence, their abstinence for crushing skulls being remarked, and from some broken coffin, the echo of a long-lost shout having come through. It was a mere fact that they could not be held. Or grabbed again or that pain was felt by vapors of darks. And clouds were but squares and there was nothing to do about, the state of the world being somewhat smeared by pain and would remained engrossed in that sphere of azure that only bled remains. In air the drops, and red marks could be seen on the ground, they called those clouds.

A man had his eye smaller than the other, tiredly walking outside. He didn't know what to do now, as he simply woke up out of a blue mound of dust. Then he was met by two men dressed in alligator suits, with large hats that were black and looked like chess-rooks and horses, while they wore their largely exposes, flayed chests that revealed no red-meat but a peculiar blue-like green marked, peculiarly starved, largely skeletal-shaped employ. On which stood like twists and little more than a few grown children-forms, like that of babies, of which heads were pockets, in which case their brains were handguns they carried on them.

Four of them aimed, and dark heads as in painted black. And white gloves with peculiar skulls with horns for every knuckle which were hanging upon metallic skulls, and chained pants made of chains and of little rocks made out of metal which wore radiators shaped mouths which rotated, from which they spoke about since their head-mouths were covered with velvet-crimson color, blue dotted dove-shaped twisted wrapped around scarf holders. It was peculiar since he thought himself unfit. I'm not well dressed enough for this party, I suppose I must've slept through.

'Ah, allow me to introduce myself.'

First step and he already almost lost a toe.

Shot just above his nectar, ready to be killed before his time would come.

'You see now, I'm trying my best not to do something that may harm you.

I come in peace.'

'Not a single foot longer, you're not to approach.

I'll kill you otherwise.'

'Don't, I wouldn't be pleased, very much so to find myself being hunted by two fine gentle creatures as yourselves.'

And from their backs, large coral-circled-hand formations thinned as if starved, made out of some thin material, sharp, came out of them. They were prepared.

'I cannot be killed by your pea-shooters, you know that.'

'We can try it nonetheless. Come with us, prisoner.'

'Not until you tell me where I am.'

'Where you've been eight hours ago.'

'That being, here, I suppose?'

'There could be no other place.'

Then Jones but merely lifted his arms and was chained by the two Peculiars.

'Who are you, if I may ask?'

‘I am Killself and he he’s my brother Starmade.’

‘And I am Jones R W R W R W R W.’

‘We’re not going to remember that.’

‘Neither will I, my good friend, neither will I.’

And with their status being held in check, there was nothing else but to wait for the half-a-pill long desert scowl they entered. It was plain to see and a majestic sight, to be certain about it. A puerile thing they had to dig a hole under in order to enter it.

While Killself waited by him, Starmade had dug the pit. And they entered a bizarre thing, but not as odd as it looked or one might think it would look, but how comfortable it seemed inside. It was much wider than it looked and the walls wore something, not tapestry as that was a plebian’s choice, but a majestic fur-like thing, not an imitation but not a real thing either, certainly not an animal’s he had ever seen before. They had pillows on the ground, four beds, eighteen rooms, and a bomb, two of them on the ceiling he had noticed. And they weren’t real bombs although they looked like bombs but little drove-machine vehicles one could climb in and drive out of the pill during the middle of the night when all was cooled over.

They drove for hours in the midst and finally had arrived at a half-a-planet miniature celestial body which appeared to be kept in the air as it was surrounded by various ear-lobe infant black-boiled, armored creatures which unnaturally elongated arms that held their hands together in order to make a pseudo-portal looking wrap-around the planet they seemed to be drawing power out of.

As it were.

‘Ah, I see, now you’re planning to kill me here.’

‘We shall.’

And within the minute, Starmade pulled a knife and stabbed the mans’ chest one billion times, until he became a splatter, although that one billion time stab happened in one second and appeared like an unnatural movement of the arm which simply phased out of existence then all of the sudden could be seen inside the man as if it were made, dead.

But this alone had been his failure for knowledge could’ve been attained. He could’ve had the secret to immortality and have become eternal then. Instead, he simply died now and he was forgotten.

The strange beings, down with their invocation but ate the planet and its inhabitants, unrelenting during their assault. It was lewd in some manner but it was done.

Ptlok was a great magician as well as he had been a doctor and a God. He could take his hands away, and make do without them, he didn’t need them. As a matter of fact, he, didn’t do it. No, he chose to use them, as he could inflict far more, more damage than he could inflict upon the world without them.

And he dreamed as well but couldn’t since he was followed by Crones.

Cone one but never spoke, but she told him so.

‘My dear young man, but life is still ahead of you, is not.

[illegible]

The Crone yelled, there was an unfathomable sound, that of an alarm going down, being dragged below with everything that could be brought. It pushed on with the most unnatural high octave defilement they could achieve, coming in from every corner of reality until they appeared. They were unnerved and vileness was in the air, and a door but opened and it was a metal corridor he pushed them on.

'This is one of the out of the access laboratories, we should not be here.'

It was the port. They were staring a giant fish-dome where people were being held in giant fish, inside their bodies, looked as if were eaten. But they weren't, no, they merely rested inside of them, with air masks put on top the fish's eyes. The men had drowned a long time ago. But the life signs were still going, the fish would live.

He put one of the Crones on sedatives. They've heard the sound of floors and body shakings. Plants were dead, which meant that moisture was poison, this had become their leisure for the next four hours.

‘We won’t make it past the hour.’

‘I will, I cannot be killed, I’m immortal.’

But there, even he was startled, something dreadfully big approached. For a second it almost broke through the door, leaving a huge dent in the wall and in the domed entry from which they came from. Steam came out of it, little valves floating in the air, appearing like tiny butterflies that moved senselessly in the air, disappearing only to appear a few inches farther in the air. They were loved.

In the midst of this happening, he but moved away, took a sip of a Aqua Toulouse Limited edition water bottle which had a mark-engraving of some famous physician-athlete which had died in the fifteen century AD, only to bounce its cap off the Crone's head, as it saw it off.

‘We needn’t come closer.’

‘I don’t think you’re going to make it through if you keep it this way.’

He looked again, the bottle was filled, red within it, wrap of a human cord he had worked on, spilling out. He threw it away. Who was the man?’

Reminders don't serve as much, let alone as clothes were hung about the ceiling and the room. It was hard to see, or make it out just down, how every word was jotted down in hastiness. They've taken the table apart, with the help of the Crone, at the very least they could make it for a few more minutes. Before the second punch went through; another dent was made to stay. Eight arms gotten through, bled from the looks of it; they bore bands such as the likes of a Chevalier would, but bound to be split as to hold them all together in place. They spoke of little likeness and would not approach, not to be too paranoid, for the very least, they feared as much as every man would in the circumstance.

Even as the Crone had noticed.

‘Afraid of a little touch, are we? How ungodly of you to act in such a manner.’

‘Silence yourself now, I was merely startled.’

With which, he had taken this one gratitude in his very own hands, pulling one of the shafts off the ceiling and blocking the door with such strength as to not belong to man.

Same mechanism inside his arm; enough of them put through to at least hammer it another bite or a single slip, a single pinch, to sculpt the surroundings. It was here that they would settle, staying for the next few hours.

‘We’ll set camp then, until the other Crone wakes up. And you will say nothing of it until I’m done thinking.’

Just what am I to do?’

The man looked about the place.

There wasn’t much to make do with.

A few matches but no cigar, he hadn’t the guts in any case to make any sound whatsoever, being close and alert to the fact that it was still eavesdropping or they were, by whatever means, desperately trying themselves over and over again, with little pounds upon every few meters as to give themselves a filth-boost that was short-lived. They were getting their kicks out of doing it and by the eighteen beat the doctor only came to the conclusion that they were his and they were trying to do him harm just by merely taking away everything he could push about. By the second, with each passing moment his fingers were but wrapped around, the key, trying to work the little engine which was pumping air into the fish’s eye, and considered just as much that he could simply claim its life. Leaving it to die there as to remove some of the unnecessary life that was to be kept under power. Since the basing was most likely consuming more than enough of the longed for, needed electricity as well as the eel-leeches that were shaped like ringed-shoe worms that were as peculiar as luke-warm leukemia if it were touched.

Regardless of it, for the time being he but found a small revolver and had but chanced himself to see, even though it was dangerous.

It reminded him of a previous conversation he’s had with a friend.

‘Where is my soul, where is my soul and where is my baby?’

‘Where is his soul? He asked, but the bay where it is as is nowhere to be found.

And the child is merely his soul.’

‘But what does that mean for us?’

‘I do not know. I cannot know.

I do not understand.

There are souls and they are children, that is why souls are pure, because they're infantile and they do not know of the evils of the world. And for that reason, there are creatures of this world who would birth their souls but kill them just as soon.

For that reason, those creatures are soulless and soulless creatures are not human.

And that is why, humanity lost its purity ever since it matured. That is why it's touched by evil as soon as this gets abandoned and left behind.

Indeed, it is.

There is no better reason to deny our chance to look upon it with understanding since there's no escape any longer. Our souls cannot mature, by any means.

They're struck by a celestial hold which is kept underneath a block of memories and experiences that prevent us from returning to those years where they were yet to be made. Know that there's but no chance one may keep it safe either, or prevent its advent any longer.

Such purity can only be experienced once, and one needs to be made aware of the fact that there is no reason to feel jealousy towards such fiend, as, merely attempting to relive everything is but yet to be resolved. IT never ends well. You ought to know that you will never be able to relive those years.

You spent all your time working, studying, learning only to have become this. You resent your offspring, your family and people who are not alike to you, but you fail to realize that some of their actions are, as such a result of their attempts to live through life, in a metamorphosis stage which comes after the loss of purity. You were never pure to begin with, no one is, no one will be.'

'But that's where you are wrong; that is irrelevant to me, I cannot, and will not spend my time trying to long for the memories for others, you couldn't be more wrong than you are now. Instead, I'm merely, well, to say the very least, repulsed by them, since I know better.

They're not the same as I am, and they'll never be. Our experiences couldn't be.'

'It's fine if you don't want to accept it. No one will ever antagonize you for what you've done, dear friend, but you need to understand that you are much more alike to those you consider lower than yourself than you'd like to admit.'

'Similarities that end up at four limbs and a head, nonetheless; but you seem to dismiss class, what's dignified and what's not, and who would be as naïve as to preach to a man whose seen this world from inside out?

I have experienced far more people than you'd ever know.'

'And have you found differences inside of them?'

'Of course I have, how could I not?'

How could that not be the case, of fatness of the liver, and size of the gut, of the abuse some have consumed and of diseases which were brought; after so many years, how could one refuse to see a pattern there? How could one not see himself as pure?’

‘Are you?’

‘I am what I claim to be, I am as I have always claimed myself to be. There is no question as to denote to this certitude, because I know that what I claim is real.

It’s not a mere fancy and I know it, I simply know it. I can see man for what he is, his organs speak of every action, and every reaction, be it so genetically or environmental distraction that may have claimed him as such.

How could you still claim we’re alike after that? How could you ignore everything I’ve done?’

‘SO that’s what it’s all about?’

‘That’s is not my point, we’re but two different cuts, though you may claim me as distraught.’

‘I never denied it.’

‘Yet you refuse to listen when I tell you that, I’m a derivation, I am truer to my spirit and to my condemnation as a martyr for each man I brought to life and for which one I brought to dead, put down by my own hand. Whether saint of man of vile, whether there’s a leper, serpent tile, my hands had sown through all.’

‘And what have you found out, then? You keep making claims but you’ve got nothing to show.’

‘I have the graves in mind and the men and the women whom had returned after months. I know them perfectly and I can remember, and I know in which direction they’re headed. Ever since they entered my room, ever since I opened them and saw the swoon inside them. As they bear no guts, nothing red as crimson drops, but dark machines and radiators within, always working on dead time, always pushing for another time.

They yearn to return to the same life, they yearn to be pushed around until their bodies died. You do not understand, you could not possibly understand at all, what we’ve become.

We’re watchers and serve for men to return. And I’ve grown tired of working on dead machines that don’t know better than to mourn for themselves.’

It was the same day he had decided to end those who weren’t worthy of living. Working on them endlessly, wasting his learned knowledge on pitiful abuse, crossing his Hippocrates’ vow, as soon as he was done, he was truly freed upon, as he claimed.

He looked at the Crone for a moment, considered it as well but merely tried himself. Underneath, but not now, not to coil.

‘Where’d you take that?’

‘Took it from one of the dead security guys; two of them underneath the sheet.’

Pulled one of their ID’s, Honnnsow Milkone, III.

Dead man rose then twisted his head for a moment before he fell back in the pile, instead lifting his arm as if to point at the wall.

There lay a small door-like trap which opened as soon as they pointed their eyes on. It was definitely something they had to consider. A single way out, whichever the reason, that didn’t matter as much. Certainly it was something he wanted, he wouldn’t have put her through.

‘You go first and check the way, if you don’t return, I’ll assume the worst happened and wait for the other Crone to wake up.’

‘Are you certain about it? I couldn’t possibly make it on my own, you know that.’

‘That is neither my due nor is it my concern, I’ll do as I please now, and you shall do it ten times forth.’

As he had called her to do, there was as much about them, which rue alone hadn’t changed, she crawled inside and then.

Ah but there were the jewels of feet deep-in. A few of them pushed into the wall, where she had get to. For crawling through was a laborious task she could not account for, while the beasts were trashing their way through, about the place. They had been men once, not in form or shape, as they were abnormal, as well as they were abominations of shape, yet they acted as such. In their display, as much as it was vulgar, to call upon itself, this was no act of a properly behaved creature as it were. Something about the Crone made them become aware of a malignant thing. A cold being but a window still spread between them, from which they looked but could not see. They had been raised from the uncanny and would listen to as much. Of their likes, there was this. She left now. A few more inches forth and they couldn’t listen to her, nor could she. Crone or not, they had somehow gotten attached to the noises she made. It’s not often one finds himself surrounded by females for long enough to bask in their essence and know of them. And that is what they desired, since the dawn of their species they had only bred by force, and they could only claim as much, many females, not of their wont, since they had to pick the exemplars of much dreadful approach. Some which deified their knowledge of filth, worth a pack. It’s what they traded females with, after all. There were tall specimens with many arms and many claspers, pincers and grabbers, grappling little eel-length rope-like shooters which coiled around and many big heads that could swallow them while putting them inside Kangaroo-like sacks of warmth where they would be properly fed and clothed with skin-clothes that would never decay and be properly put under organic stasis until their proper use would be employed. That’s how they stored them, and after, the mating by force. It has always been a strange thing how they claimed themselves to have belonged to a much greater society than the one they lost, although their lack of smaller ones, the ones which were sparse and few in between whom were but the ones in control was beckoning of their fall. Since, with every generation they have thinned, it was all too curious, to think that eventually they would be driven to a nigh inexistence, and the ones that follow after, were to be, more violently shaped, outlandish, even completely formed for roughness as to kill the outer body of the ones they mated with but store only the womb they would properly feed themselves. Yet even such violent creatures found themselves standing near the walls, listening in hopes that one might come, stumble or do whatever he can in order to win the gamble and be surrounded by such a creature as that, which the female is. Or even feel her for a second as a consolation price, regardless of her shape and age, regardless of whom the human was during their lifetime. And for that they but followed around, upwardly heaving themselves in an attempt to destroy everything, although they were severely limited in strength, to such reaches and such a deliberation such as they would stop there. That could only bring a man to ask, what have they done once they followed the trails of sound and the scent which lead her to a secret small room which was four by four by four by four by four by four by five at the top but only one backwardly as to cover a tiny fraction of the shaft she had come out of. Looking back at it, it only seemed possible that this could be avoided, although the way back was completely closed, and there she lay, beating ahead, on whatever facet she could in order to search for an escape. Yet there wasn't any possible escape for the Crone, as she was made to suffer and she would only suffer for ever more, since the doctor was almost hoping she would recognize this trap, or at least suspect something at what he was hinting at since at long last he was alone with the other one. And seeing how that one was much younger, it was for that reason that she was the first one to have the sedative be administered to, without any kind of separation having occurred between the two. As much as that was important to note, she was in a peculiar position, over something neither of them could've accounted nor suspected of happening, since, as it happened, there was no possible way for the masses to break through entirely, yet to have seen it happen, in the least they managed, with every blunt strike, driven by the scent given or lend onto them by the pheromones, to completely reduce the total movable space.

They pounded her in and she died in there. They had bloodied her corpse and she didn't live through it. Her head was popped like a champagne bottle. She died gruesomely and alone, she died while never having touched by a man, unlike her sister.

Her sister was Charlotte, the Harlot. That's what she'd become.

When she had entered the Hospital, she had been lost from her sister, there.

'What's that?'

Charlotte thought, there was a lacerated little camel which bore a man with three heads molded into one, large overlapping teeth that were curved, and tongues coming out of their eyes. This head was but a hardened clay standing tool. Upon the body of a man it stole, replacing the head, which was ripped, another dead. He decayed as he walked, as did his camel upon being brought to him during dreams which had become but him, for he was tainted, through and within the mark, seen for what he was.

'Enough of it.'

The Mouth had spoken. Seen from the distance, broken; bile in sight and teeth which were dark, and yellowed around the gums and pus set inside and eyeless watch, upon which he bled, at last, upon which he drowned, near the confines of a reality which fell apart, only to be put aside, and looked at her, the vile. And would she had admired? Her sight to be defiled, broken like camera lenses, seen the world in false pretenses, thinking she was young, stepped on many feet that were not around, her throat within reach. Her arms having been stitched, but still taken advantage off, made to clear of her own, and to struggle as she strangled. She would but push whatever she felt. She fought as hard as she could and won the testimony of a man. He was standing and was dead, of a dying breath but lived a few. More seconds passed and light-sinew, could be seen just as it were, passing through. He had been no pessimist, passing, always trying to grab. Outstretched a hand but to console him, as the man had been ripped apart; and maiden but she were uneasy, of Crone just but in name. As she was younger than the reins that called upon her, of a lost long lost embrace; of which command she had but scurried, and asked the man, what could I do? He hadn't answered, but was lost, a moment, only to have him put through. The side, then have revealed, there was a gun of which twin needles had but show but power, long and through. He was suffering, but then she pulled. An aftershock uncanny, to suffer, to have him immediately stop after, in vain she looked, what could she do? But lay with him until the stronger. Of whichever feel might come stronger, of what she's done and wept around. But stood and took away her tears, as the Charlotte would stride to stay as strong. Could she withdraw if alone she handled, and all the wonder, but to call; there in the distance had she pointed. A dark man with a single clock, emerged from his throat and broken apart, many legs crawled from his insides. And mouth on each step, the chompers, were put through resting on the walls. To eat now or to eat after, she couldn't handle that and drew back. The man had died and alas, breathing, she could taste the last thing he had. But a cold pill of naphthalene powder, which sealed his fate after that. As far as she could go and weary, as she was; she but entered and soon upon her fingers rose. Working upon panel after panel, opening a few doors, seen from cameras yet to be; there were a few dark things in the city. And they had worn and they were plaster, and they were made of little after. And there were watches, which counted to midnight where she were. That time she went into the court, the building to surmount her. In her shape she had fallen through, through a hole that was but hollow through. Made for her and her to make, her way through it and there she stayed. Within the hour nothing happened. But she knew she had assisted to the scene of disaster, and there were wild things.

'The gate's still closed.'

'You need some help?'

Charlotte wasn't called the Harlot just yet though.

'I think I'm fine, what's happened here?'

'Growing.'

'Excuse me?'

'Something's growing in the ground, the soils just poured over by itself, the road and every brick and stone was pulled it. I saw it myself.'

'How did you see it?'

'I lend him my eyes, young lady.'

'And who are you?'

'Mathias Cork, he's Jonathan Mayflower.'

On the body truck, this much could be said. Although the peculiar thing which was on top of the malignant sphere on top might look like it was throwing lightning away, in actuality, those long extensions would be nothing more but some unnatural worm-like long organisms that would be released from the insides of the very beings they inhabited before.

And as such one would have to look as well between the area that lays between the wheels themselves as well as the distance between, and the placement that lays below the main body made of people and the few inches between the wheels themselves, which never touch entirely, as one would've most likely guessed. Such, as it's been said, the cylindrical organic mutation that would be worked inside the truck is but a strange organ itself that's deliberately outgrown the tunic which is the body of a man from which it sprouted from, attaching itself to the long pole-like cylinder that's working the wheels in the first place, that being made out of a long-thing twisted pair of innards that are placed in both directions.

Of the little wonder there is, they were but out there, walking on desecrated soil. There was no rain but the sky was storm, as in darkened and basked in the very essence of disaster, of such magnitude as the weather itself could bring unto them.

Cork but stood there, in front of Charlotte, satiating something he didn't think he'd find himself looking for. She was but not from around.

'Come from around the country? I don't think I've seen you before, ma'am.'

Ptlok considered it, but just as he approached he had a change of heart. His fingers stopped just as they contorted as to out-reach her.

'I could claim your life at any point in time, I could do with you as I please just as easily if I will it.'

Yet his hand was stopped. He himself could not explain the reason behind it. But he simply turned, took away the cabinet and checked the door. Past the hands which were already gone, through the entry door, he pulled it out of the way, then pushed it back just as he found it.

Both ways were clear but he couldn't think of anything else then. With a glimpse of an eye, he looked down, at the hands of a god, but he saw none other but his instead of them.

He chose to walk, stridently as his heart laid with whichever doubt was still in there.

There was still the gun, yet there was nothing in his mind.

She was so young, the girl.

He could feel the shame of having thought of her as such. It was not her plainness of youth alone which had disturbed him, but the mere fact that he reminded him of his daughter, from the angle she had stood there. Or a much younger version of her, in any case, which had severely disfigured his hands; right before.

'I wish there was a chance to tell you something.'

Regardless of it, they were drawing there, back outside.

Mathias was but trying his hands on the lock. The keys were somewhere on the other side, at the very least a few meters away on the other side. Between the greeneries, put through. He hadn't handled anything properly. He was but obscure of thought. He whom watched on the other side; part of the stone wall, whom was in pieces, him was but a stone with a single eye and a long mouth and a long living rosy tongue. He licked ahead and wanted, as closely as it would take for them to dart around him.

A pole of light, a lamp every few meters, one just broke.

‘Careful there, don’t lose your finger now.’

‘That’s enough.’

He spoke as soon as he could find himself staring. His teeth were grained, grazed and taken along. Deepening a few meters in before he realized that they were set in place. There he stood, trying to giggle like a little child.

Charlotte was the first one to turn towards him, while noticing that something was wrong. It had to serve as a reminder. She wasn’t there alone, she couldn’t find it. Not the strength, not the pouch, not the dark but what laid about the place. It was a miasma which spread some cordiality between the two of them. He was incapable of controlling himself after that point on before he started laughing again.

‘What’s wrong with you?’

‘Nothing, it’s nothing, I’m just, I’m trying my best not to look there, it’s that. You’ll notice it, once you look towards it, in its direction that is. You should know better than to arouse a man’s jitters.’

‘What’s wrong with your friend?’

‘I don’t know, he’s never acted that way before, Mathias, are you all right?’

He pointed at the nearest corner. There was a stone fenced, a block of wood and some puberty grown bush he had to spill his eye in. That was not what he wanted to do. It was not where he wanted to get near towards, but he had no other option. Since he acted like such a child, he would be punished as one. There weren’t a lot of people like him now, no one acted this way. No one had to.

‘I think it’s getting to him now.’

‘What is? Did he contract something?’

‘Kind of, it was a weird anesthetic he was given, power-stuff, I don’t know exactly how it came to happen or how he stumbled in the infirmary.’

‘Why not the main wing of the Hospital?’

‘There’s no such thing on this side of the world.’

Jonathan pointed as soon as he could at the weird little lady-friend, the statue of a Mary like figure hanging on the side of a broken school-yard door. Neither her nor him came to understand why they were there, yet they simply took this out the bowels of their guts and took it as it were.

The sky was pale, gray, pushing right, dragged about by a vacuum.

‘Bell-safe?’

‘I think that’s the name, I think.’

There was no possible way this was a school, she had been in the Hospital, she was in a swoon ever since and could only think of her sister and her whereabouts.

‘Charlotte, open your eyes.’

‘What, where?’

‘He’s being taken into one of the trucks.’

‘What?’

Again he pointed at the human truck just as it was struck in the process of taking her by the broth.

Jonathan already had his arm wrapped around one of the most peculiar branches she’d ever seen. It was long, curved, stretched like a witch’s arm, and appeared to gasp along within its talons, anything it could point itself towards. Wallowing in the distance they were necking, large fat lizard people without arms, with heads encompassed by peculiar gothic-like structures that have molded their skulls; bloating constantly black-disease, coated in their own pools, their legs were but peeled. In the back thrashing, long as snaked, then floating, having become, mid-way set like strings, holding little sack-balloons of sacked-off skin. Bloated in side they swore, and became something of their own. Pushing and protruding forth. Bloated wings from the bowels within, trying to make them bleed, constantly scraping in attempts to get out, cackling with predatory stances in which they carried their babies towards the blocks of tomb-like extended walking backing with large horned-peculiar torture devices they could use to implant their own seen inside stone, where it would last forever, in the growth that is to come. When all will have become their reach, rooting themselves in every corpse until they will have stretched on a whim to reach the peculiar mold of stringed-beings, which were cut and defiled and deformed together, waiting for their rise to become held.

But John was destined to reach the key and as soon as his hands wrapped around them, his heart would sink and he would scowl, and would bring only the broth of a knife against his bowels.

‘What did you do? What did you do?’

‘What are you doing, are you insane? Take it out.’

As soon as she was in reach she but pulled the knife and as she saw fit watched him bled.

‘Put it back in.’

He called, desperately trying to stop the bleeding with an arm, but it was late, the blood sprouting out of him erect, on top the lock, of which key would not fit, but brought to his awareness, fading. The lock was but drinking out of him, the yellow fainting, skies were black. And they were but him about the hour, brought. They wanted to make it so they would beseech and see to his gut, and brought within his grasp. The corpse-truck was out of sight. This was no school and, oh, much delight, the gate had opened and beckoned for her come. And bloated of land and soil and everywhere she could go.

‘You are not conscious yet girl, you must follow.’

‘But what of him?’

‘He’s been bled like a curl, he’s standing there, unnerved, his tendons shattered, his life, after a matter, ended, you may not feel it so. But we shall look after you when the time comes.’

She but followed the trail and saw her ill-eyes remain on the spot, they would be on his body, she would be caught, eventually.

‘Close the gate, don’t forget that, you must always make sure the gates are closed.’

‘But what of the door leading out of the Hospital?’

‘That’s how you let them out, that’s how the truck found a way to bring about the death of Mathias Cork, he’s dead because of you, but reeling. Look behind you.’

The door was closed, but not the gate, heeding.

‘Well enough, but won’t another man die if I leave this closed? If the lock is closed and if there’s no way back?’

‘That shouldn’t matter, your duty towards them is done, follow, follow.’

Said one of the peculiar beings, and Charlotte only done so; a soul of a Crone for a body that looked so young; no one would ever suspect such a matter, whatever entered her soon to falter. She was ill, they were not understanding what went in, during the few minutes they were messing with themselves around. Always but a pass and a head in the ground; there were reasons for staying.

It was a play of turns, they all are. First move was on her now; chosen as one should, to lock within her grasp and soon enough she was but locked, incapable of thinking of something others could not have pinned on her. The breathing; she were of a reason to thrust forwardly heeding for a reason to set forth. Her eyes were but a block between each skull that rose and followed her, around then stopped. A little branch-like wire strung between the ears held them down, two on each side. As they walked, she was escorted. Without a reason to reap in the parasitic heaps that lay around her contorted, she were met by him to ask.

‘What must you be doing here?’

‘I was cast from Yheggan, I was pushed on the ground, with my soles and my feet abound, while asked to mourn her.’

Recalling lies.

‘Mount her hills, mount her hill and search for the house within it.’

‘Why, what is there to be?’

I see, she’s but Mathias, and Jonathan both crept inside, I need to take her now and carry them to the hill before the time is ripe. Before they might waste away, before they could be forgotten and put away within a library of dusk-filled books that’s but shoved inside a back room in that place. Of sweet embrace he’d given her as well, and but pulled her side and through her head but dragged, in mind, both her skull and her innards out, they were but a worming thing that set in flight, took away the heads and set aside an empty bodysuit. Which was peculiarly but spat on.

‘Yhegganorth but took to face and hear them, inside his face. For not his mind to speak unkindly, it was not for his body’s much, delighted for, and searched to be, if it weren’t for the prized command as if to be.

He had nowhere else to be at the hour. Seeing how it was so, he merely walked upon a shower-black, formed out of clouds that were brought to his mind at last, they begged him stay, along the way. Hysteric bowels and long formations, rows on each sides, the tomb-nodes were filled with his creation. He had carved and made little puzzle-like heaps away out of those who have gone missing; there was but a never ending supply after all, and he could not set himself in doubt any longer, he had taken some of them from as far as he could go. Wreathing in and out as if he’d show the slightest show of compassion, venturing to get no reaction, his heart was but thrown. His throng but set in stone.

There were pyre-made fires shapes like Pygmies holding onto staffs, prime thinned hands, the starving, holding on the mighty sphere, of brim-delight. Of butcher’s cores and those whom flight would have them bore. And little structures made of stone, as tall as obelisks would go and reaching dead-heights as if holding within their rows but the bottom of the feet; from men being strapped in helicopter seats. That’s where they dumped the worst and would but to feel a crypt, the shelter of the morsel.

Sluggishly he moved with them, with but a single soil extractor in his hand, top of a screw-know, held like a jackhammer in his hand the device, connected within his every vein, he carried a suit he only revealed as well. Dressed in marble with two ties that moved like clock-tongues, when went aside. Here and there but a dead-blurtd; many stabbed behind and sorted. From both direction some were brought, some abandoned wagons which dumped them, but no one dug.

‘There is the place where we shall live from this point on.

I considered this way before.’

He stopped, and watched the ones that followed, their balloon-sacks but to glow. When they appeared, everything near painted with the soil, even the highest peaks were but encompassed at the base before it rose. Pushing ever near as to climb, never stopping after that, before it was fully realized.

It wasn’t telling of much any longer, but they were trying to cast their glances elsewhere. It couldn’t be allowed, not even for the slightest hour, upon them brought the slightest shower. It placed itself away, through light, they were not there for high delight.

‘You needn’t go a step below.’

‘Why should I listen to you then?’

‘We’re but trying to show you.’

Yhegganorth saw, and seeped for a moment, before he spared. There, it would be, as far as he had made it so. The little pile-stone crawling away, with its little mad eye conveyed, trying to walk, crawling on the length of the tongue before it could finally nib on all the pieces. Around them but dead recesses, filled with only worsened times and the agony to be benign; it was what they spread, it was the dead, the access cut at it again.

‘It will burst out the stone and reveal the country, which may not be allowed.’

‘And if it is?’

‘Then death shall surround us all.’

‘May I not choose to hide then if such deadly thing there is to be?’

‘Nay, that is only for the cowardly.’

‘Then I will lay there and rot.’

As his mind could convey no wonder, or distraught; he chose to go that way, with little more than needed and little more out of his way. IT was his slight concern that there was no reason to be there at all.

‘Is there but reason to stay here either? Whomever might claim this world should be aware that there’s but always a never ending disaster to be brought, cast upon man like caustic spittle, brought to something he could not endure.’

Down there, finally, past which lay and past obscure, there was but a single man, a simpleton, man of disease, distress but pierced, uncannily nodding, but to swear, what he had seen through the device was but death. Coming and being brought, it was something that could not be controlled for and would be sought.

‘There’s no reason to start, your heart is battered, mine is not.’

‘Who are you then to make such claims?’

‘Nothing but a dead man.’

He spoke at last, until then.

‘What’s it to a man like you to be here for?’

‘I’m quite quaint, I fell all right, I’m certain, It was just a small burst, it was my chest, it came out of my chest, believe me, there’s no reason to be here at all, to be sure about it, this is a mistake.

I should not be here, as a matter of fact, I demand I be released immediately.’

He said, just before he started running in circles around the room, punching a wall in, breaking a window, cutting himself, chewing off one of the grates, pushing his tongue through the ceiling, eating one of the rooted acre-palms, drawing in some sniff of airs, trying to behead himself upon a lamp before he showed up to the doctor. Two strong men entered the room, pulled him by the scruff of his throat, slapped him around, punched him in his gut, made a little leprous man appear in his innards, his face being expanded upon every organ-stretched, he sang but not in actual sound, instead those of actually organs, then they beat him for eight hours strait, painted the walls in his blood and put a small idealist charcoal spruce on top of his little chair, with a tiny robust red-tainted, nastily scented cupcake which appeared to be of a red-blossom shape. But it was but absurd, what they did to the man.

With every come and every visit about the hour, they had gotten more and more violent, until the strong men were replaced by some actual doctors whom were utmost sterile in their employ of the wheels that were attached to the walls and the four long thin rectangles which were rotated on two bands they attached at every corner. Red-stained of plain dark wood, as well as it would seem that this Sabbathean device was only brought here with no other purpose than to have him mocked and put to trial as a witch would be, and better, mildly, first came the outlandish spikes, out of every faced on the long rectangle, on which he had been impaled, until he covered every angle, bled upon them, locked inside. The room being flooded, him being caught in an endless attempt of drowning which was enforced by the fact that it was heavy water which would never leave his lungs, soon drained, they entered just as soon, and sawed off the small side of every side of the rectangle only to have those for blocks be permanently shoved inside of him, right until the moment when they had finally identified the man as no one else other than Mathias Corkscrew.

Indeed it would seem that as soon as they realized that, they took back the wheels, the bands, the, now eight remaining shorter rectangles they now carried on a dark chart, seeing how the water was highly contaminated with his blood, they drained it in the nearest river, which was placed beyond the hospital, leaving to a rural area such as the likes which would remind someone of a long walk day spent in Milwaukee. Of what they've done here, nothing of the kind was spoken. Yet he remained clothed in a restraining jacket, with the pillars shoved inside of him, pulled along by chains, put inside intensive care, where they fed him some of the leftovers from the morgue, which had been grinded, put into tubes, shoved inside his mouth, allowed to ruminate for eight hours, before he was forced to lay like a dumb cripple, given small prosthetics on his back as if to replicate a chair he would constantly seek to lay on top of, which properly deformed his spine on every sitting. Before he could finally wake up from this peculiar dream he was on, he was charged upon by a strange dark creature that was as tall as the entire corridor, whom bore in its back upon some large contorted hook-spikes most of the strong men and the doctors, which had stopped right in front of him, a few centimeters away, as to employ the full stretch of the arm, taking its very time to reveal a pseudo-humanoid arm which bore little hardened skull-bone growths for every knuckle, which drew out of themselves with little sharp needle-horns that wriggled along and gave the impression of being bone-parasites when in reality they were as hardened as steel. His palm was fully extended as to form a line as first before he started curling each finger, within his right arm, middle finger, pointer, pinkie, ring finger, thumb, then he put his right leg in the front, the left one slightly tilted in the other direction, bent his knees, relaxed them, slightly moved forward and instead of performing a side, Mathias had barely any time to see him step in a few centimeters as to deliver a left hook which almost, completely recalibrated his jaw at the back of his head. He bled for hours. And for a few more hours after each wake as well. He suffered a highly caustic-like concussive blow, which seemed to have somehow entered his entire head as if it phased in, leaving some corrosive substance inside his brain which was slowly eating him away. Before he could realize what happened, his mind began, in this pain-pressure concussive induce short-lived madness, to recreate the fiend that had appeared in front of him, and everywhere around. Wherever his eyes went, the creature would appear in the most peculiar forms and shapes he could possibly envision. And it bore a high-shaped head which appeared to be like that of a large sledge upon children like forms were there as well grabbing with the exception of their entire heads being the head-eyes which were depressed in and only pushed even deeper as to hide the fact that it had no legs and appeared to float around, as it became a peculiar two sides, long angled triangular-shapes stretch of both arms, which forced the body to be ripped apart as if it had been sawed off by some medieval irrelevant peasants whom had been given an order from one of the well established Boyars whom had put them to good work, knowing they will obey his every whim and command even if that means deforming such a mean as to be reborn into one of the most gruesome creature that had ever escaped from the old town, which had been completely annihilated, thoroughly, gruesomely as if those anciently preserved buildings were but molded in the spirits of the people who had once inhabited them. He had also, in his endearing psychotic episode managed to somehow see some peculiarly deformed deity which had completely twisted the halls around them, completely connecting his completely pushed through long-fingers which were wrought like long strings that connected with the spikes that emerged out of the plain wooden rectangles of his chest, completely dragging him over, now on his feet, seeing how he could've never gotten up by himself, finally contriving to do as this peculiar deity had called upon to do. As he had been but the servant of an evil cause, seeing how this supremely deformed mental corrosion had perforated not only some of the parts of his brain which controlled motion and the way in which he perceived, but it also managed to go down his throat and completely reshaped his entire digestive system as to turn it against him, growing as such a pair of pseudo shark-teeth which began ripped him off from inside out, until the stomach, least of all his gut, had become a strange swirl which devoured everything it could get itself into. He was forced into eight different stops, if so could they be called, whether they were some trough-like blocks, some walls, and some smoke rooms, he was crushed through them, taking the full force of the blunt, hard shoving only with the help of a peculiar, yet to be strangling sensation, as if with every charge, the entire body trap that was shoved inside of him was but even more deeply set inside his chest, until his lungs were deeply and completely perforated. And the deity was there to look upon him which, being for what it was, it looked like a giant insect parasite of some elastic-cotton which looked flat and seen from two completely unwrapped parts as if he had been cut in half then pinned on a wall, wearing but no throat, yet some simian shaped jumping cords were created out of its multiple interconnected interlocked monkey-arms which appeared to hold a monkey triceps with a palm, holding being used as but for a simple understanding, as these were not superficial locks, but complete molds which were permanent, despite what they appeared to show. They palm connected with biceps, which connected with biceps until they went around and they connected to both sides of the deity. And the same process appeared to be done for a few leg-things as well, which were but dragged along as it drew forwards. This peculiar thing also appeared to bear some deformed scales which had been placed upon its naked body, not only bearing eyes and grinning teeth-inside of them, as they were but, without a doubt, living children which fed upon this master of theirs, but one could see the complete long extension of hairs which looked like twisted-curved mosquito blood drawing tools that were only serving as a release from the sweat he had just completely acquired. Mathias had at once, in this chaos of halls, of deformed rooms and of peculiarly deformed ceilings upon which he walked, the stairs which were placed around, the static-caught people without heads and the running figures of the monsters that were chasing him, in their various tall shapes and peculiar elongated, deformed uncannily pushed out, wreathing snappers and variously detached voracious eaters that had only come out of their shoulders, which had only drawn attention to the fact that they had fashioned themselves various pieces of armor they now wore, such as long belts which were twisted and segmented and were of black-coated oily-looking swarthy men skin-like formations, in which swam various dead bones of fish and of various dead tadpole crowned unsanitary pus-filled cotton-leper, infantile creatures, which only drew to the one bolted object which stood out like two rhombuses that wore interconnected little living tiny short men, as in reference for their frame if they were to be enlarged or forced to grow as to be put, in comparison to the average frame of a normal man. Spikes coming out of their throats as they were bled out, so as to say, that they also wore peculiar ripped out, worn out clothes that were but looking as if they were taken from the sea and would be embattled with disease and scurvy, some of the peculiar creatures even bearing large planks and various cuts that were sticking out like hot-irons on top of coal-burnt bulls that were struck in charging matadors in their cruel fights. That could not have taken away from their clearly sculpted and peculiarly formed bodies which bore at least an unnaturally formed body mass such as that which had yet to be achieved naturally by any mean, but without a doubt signaling the fact that they were anything if men at all, especially since, he could, as any man look at the sight of their outer-bowels while realizing that no substances had ever been used to begin with. But most importantly, it was the hairs which came out of the Deity which drew his inner most attention, especially since he had come to recognize that inside of it, from the specks of sweat which came out of it, there were some of his blood cells, the proto water-boarded after lotion which had been formed with his help, and the peculiar draught in which he had opened his nostrils in, now that he was within his reach, through which he slowly started. A part of his prefrontal cortex had just as soon been scraped out as soon as the Deity managed to somehow flicker some of the barely-opposable thumbs, between the infallibly short space between the muscle, tendons and the fingers themselves, gotten a hold on an iron pick which was coated with some toxic-acid poison-toxin it drooled upon despite the deformation of face which actually bore some hidden eyes as well which would appear like tiny specks of black stones, rounded and filled like a leaping-around jovial family of fleas that had fed upon a mass of black hounds that fed upon corpses taken out of a barely dug, two hours ago graveyard, not a normal one but one as such that had been laid as the aftermath of the absence of live, left behind by the departure of Noah's Ark. His brain was then nibbled upon by little clenched, microscopic like iron mouths that would constantly chew him out, being attached to the iron pick, foaming as they themselves would choke upon their own poison which as this point in time would've become venomous as to be completely inserted in Mathias' general cognitive area, as they were driven by their insatiable hunger. The Deity also began punching him as well, then he simply pushed the pick all the way back, drooled upon him, put him in a corner, where he laughed at him, took a candle, raised the flame, poured some wax upon his head, then simply threw it against his cheeks, as to see it bounce around for a while, burned his face, left a scar, took him around to another room until they were no longer in the Psychic ward, but right before he would be allowed to leave. A few nurses appeared out of nowhere, took a few of their needles from their first aid packs that had been lain around, then they started completely filling his head with them, shoving them even deeper than the iron pick had entered until they were depleted. Upon this, the gut started wreathing against him even more furiously than it had done before, forcing him to enter some psychotic-hysterical delusional episode which had him walk upon little baby charts, which had their names scribbled inside, being followed around as not to harm him. He had stolen a baby. And he began licking the child's face. He wondered, though this was not the most important moment, let alone could he actually think of any better, where was Jonathan. He was good with children, and he would know what to do in order to stop him from crying. It was certainly something he hadn't done before. He couldn't have understood, why, exactly, but he felt some peculiar call he refused to answer, right between the hour of the dark wood, upon which he fell. Upon the hour, all was changed. The child had slipped away from his hands and he lost him, in the worst possible time, in the worst possible manner, and there was no one else to blame but himself.

‘What have I done?’

Where is the child? Where is my child? I need to find my child before they take it away from me.'

'You mad-man, that's not your child.'

One of the nurses felt as if it was her responsibility to tell him about it. Her heart was almost shattered, but she cried. As she looked down, then returned the glance, tears were drained, her eyes sunken to the remains. Upon the wooden-wet floor, upon where sweat from the Deity had run its course, upon a hole surrounded by baby-charts she swore, her heart not being in that place no more. Her fingers curled around a triangular broken crack, from where the floor abruptly stopped.

'It fell down there, you idiot, you dropped the child, you complete imbecile!'

She cried, just as he stopped from his flight around the rooms, just as he stared and there, understood. And there were no more words he could think of saying, no condolences that she could accept by any means, for what was worth, for what was laying, there alone she stood, and at a glance, but distraught as one would.

It was plump, so the child was born, the fall was broken, as it should be known, by nothing soft, it was caught and brought and moved around and lolled and yolk and put on, as if on a pan, to be born, through it, past in split, many legs-a-feet, gelatin-ship from its chest drooping, formatting anchored inside the folds, and the skin of this simian baboon pink-a-lighter had become but a condensed piss a freighted, folded forth, a parachute which held upon the hardened soils of skin around it. Placed beneath it, placated, with many shells and tiny specks and most peculiar antler-heads, which served as spines, contamination dimes, all to prevent further breaking in-apart; flirting with the deep sinew, which floated in around the place obscure, right until the fall had ended, there, sent, in light, defend by the men of Yore. Whom gathered around on the acreage of the surgery and more, would they be caught, trying to figure out, from whence came this peculiar object, for they could not see the child, only that drooping thin end which had entered the black wall as well. They weren't normal doctors, incited by the fact that they were together, four sphere-like forms, shaped into one another, but not in them, that served as the mass, in the middle there being a cylinder-like pusher which pumped in an out a bigger tube, which pumped below, in a square-column which held the four spheres, transparent as they were, within, upon rising centipede-like figures standing, the head of every doctor, instead of their legs. Many of which were dumb and only babbled, as they could not help each other after. Eyes on their foreheads, eight on every man, all overlapped with a half an iris which changed shaped at every minute, well. Enough as it could be told, forlorn in their cast, and brought to the side, their innards would not stop laughing until put to mind, the fighters brining. With the thrashing of the room of Yore; for the transparent bubble but looking like gnawing, a black gum that had been chewed from a dark-grayish device of bore. Into each rod there were flat-people with little minds, and were to be called they were but fat and bloated and cruel in doubt. Large square-heads and flying corrupted saws that were used and set to flight, levitating around the cruel bed, which was defiled. In which rested the child.

'You've lost him, it's dead because of you, how could do it? How could you have done it? Have you no shame whatsoever?'

'No, I don't think I have. As a matter of fact, now that I regained my composure, I will leave and I shalln't return; for my very likes, as I see here are not to be appreciated anymore.'

And then he simply started darting. Moving twenty feet at pace, and there was a strange man and he was followed by eight of them and they were just trying to jog their memories by punching one another, jab, jab. A punch and a kick down, one of them brought an axe, bore down between the eyes, bore through, and in-between, they shared it, then they were pushed in a crowd, more of them coming out of doors and they were but plain in head. And a strangler with many long-hands that were eight-ball-shaped at the joints moved upon. Peculiar; they stopped.

Everyone who had been in that fight turned towards it; weird many arms flying tambourine, with each bell but another arm, sprouted in the middle a tongue-like shape if a man turned his head backwards as if the back of his head or his, for this sake alone, protruding occipital bone touched his back, while the meat would also be raised as well by having both of his arms and shoulders raised and pushed in to make it for the remaining gap, although there would still be a gap of a few millimeters between them, the tongue being raised to above, with most of its girth being at the base of it, there being but the strange taste buds-erected, in the forms of peculiar staring, deformed heads that bear strangely peculiar juvenile leper-hare twisted cylinder-eyes that push in and out, pouting as their mouths, whom look would be akin to out of a television static fields, empty gallows, around their throats, being pulled by the tip of the tongues, there being nothing else left to see.

Mathias simply walked out of the hallway in search for someone that might help him do.

Although, to be certain, those weren't as much as baby-charts as they were baby-carriages, that changing nothing of what happened during that scene of massacre and everything that lay there. There being nothing but no chance there to be sure not.

He was aware of whom he just met. And he stared back at him, without paining himself to ask more so than what was fair. His fair share was but a pint to ask, a little more than twenty of a while, around them.

This peculiar Guardsman whom had, appeared by normal means to have come out of the recesses of one of their plain Booths was, somehow insurmountably dull. He was not the type of man of which mixture one would like to have himself wrung about for more than was need. And upon their meeting, both Clerk and Mathias, did as a man would do in such a circumstance, upon being met by another man, regardless of the rank and such, with every curtsy in mind, simply shake hands with him. They shook all too stubbornly strong, when all of the sudden steam shouted. A pipe came loose, it drove like a tilted wagon which had pushed through, eighty centimeters in the front, splitting them apart. The wall was broken through, this was too close for it to be coincidental.

‘You had anything to do with this?’

‘Me? No, of course I haven't, how could I? I'm a patient after all, see?’

He considered pointing at a badge or at his peculiarly ripped apart restraint jacket which was open now, but, it was highly covered, not to mention distracting, seeing how he still had those things lodged inside of him. If he had been a few centimeters off, he could've gotten rid of at least one of the spiked cylinders, if only it came off. Damn that, in any case. He was way into it, to stop giggling like a girl when he was put to the test.

‘Stop that.’

‘I’m sorry, I’m always giggling when I get anxious. It’s not you, but, these circumstances we’re in.’

‘All right, well, don’t cross the line then, I’m going to check where this came from. When I return, and I’ll make it clear, I’m quick, too quick, I’m fast, I won’t be long. And If I say it won’t last, then you know, you just know that I’ll be here. So don’t move, or your legs are broken, and your face, and those things inside of you, that’s where your ears will be ringing against, because I’ll make sure to press you in.’

‘I got it.’

‘Fine then, just don’t move.’

He opened one of the closed restricted area zones; pair of chains dangling from just about everywhere in place, in spot, he was about to move aside, to set everything back when, another burst, another distant wall, this one from behind, a few meters away from where Mathias was. If it followed some kind of pattern and he wasn’t wrong about it, the next one should either be a few feet away from the other, or. Stopped, he heard the noise. Too late for a warning, the voice froze on as soon as the next piece came in, plunging, this time around directly into the opposite wall. Down on the floor bleeding.

‘Are you all right?’

‘Stay back, stay back. I’m fine. I just stepped on a crack.

I mean, cracked, my insides, the liver.’

‘You were pierced by one of those nails weren’t you?’

‘It couldn’t be avoided.’

‘I’ll call for help, don’t. Mention this. Yeah, don’t mention this.’

‘Don’t worry, I won’t.’

The man would handle those wounds then, since there was something he had to check first. Come the entry:

Clerk was inside the room, the Parabola’s what they called it. A dark hallway-raised up floor, stairs were there, a man charging with little more than the open torn-up pile-shine taken from one of the upper corners of the boom-sticks that had blown off part of the room.

He’s taken by surprise by the baton he’s carried on with him. A smack to the side of his head smacks his ring right off, another one makes the ear drum beat, followed by one that settles through, he drops the shine. He’s slapped around.

‘Where’d you come from? Tell me, come on, buddy-bud, tell me already. I won’t be too rough with you, I’ll let you go, I won’t rip off your face, come on.

What’d you do? What’d you do? I won’t pull you off the chains, come on already, I’m taking you, in, are you seeing this? I’ll pull you off. Tell me.’

‘He’s touched me, the man in charge, he’s touched, looky-look, at the back.’

An empty bald patch where a few open-palms had been imprinted; they were tight enough to be pushed in by a little more than fifty degrees Fahrenheit, and a little more, he’s bashed it again with his baton, just to make sure he’s felt it.

‘My patience’s running thing, boy, tell me where he is, how he’s done it?’

But he couldn’t make sense out of it and out there, too dark to see. Too twisted, too long, too stale, a stalemate, a problem between the two of them. He chipped his shoulder and threw him off, right around the ledge, over the safety fence, down the fall. That was close, he thought as much. It could’ve been a dead-long drop by the looks of it. And what was plain to see was the fact that he had chipped his pit, and settled on as much, he was on it, a few inches of the floor had depressed out of the mere weight he pushed on.

It was all wrong, clicking on the floor, following no more but he saw the open cabin lead upon what appeared to be the largest climb that he’s ever seen, out in the open, necked on the side of a wall. A pair of stairs that were anything but surrounded by the fence, leading to a small rustic-like apartment which shone as if place upon some Antarctic wall, if there was such a thing. There a light emerged, and he felt cold. At least five or six floors worth the time to get there, or at the very least, the keys were in but someone’s been around. A wheel and a few devices put in this cabin and a few windows that were put on side. Locked behind him before he could even get to it, the panels already started, the steam valve enacted. Many lights on, a window turned to dead-door upon which a bed stood a peculiar screen, aimed within the dead dark, where it shone. Outside it already started prodding off, walking on its own, dead legs about the place. A league’s worth into the fall, he accidentally clicked a few buttons, and almost fell down.

A few more leagues down, it seemed to control the whole thing, with every push. Dead-static floors, little pill-buds moving along, red-hatched, eating gore. They were nibbling on the giant legs while threatening to go on before their time had crept. He could see his chance before he knew it, sight gotten, he stood up rooted. As it a dead-looking bird froze in front of deep Semites, whom had cowardly gurgled upon and lurched upon the insides, trying their best not to deeply inflict some cuts, and put in a dent or a crack, whichever was needed to push in.

At the hour, they started working, then slowly crawled back down. Many moved about down there, it was hard to see or be around. There was no worse place, nothing that would bring more about each little pint-like trace left on the ground.

He had gotten a handle on it before long. Clearly advancing, clearly going through, upon the fissure, there stood but little more than a fire that withdrew back, but it wasn’t red and only pushed out bubbles as if to breathe. It couldn’t have been, since there was no water within.

There was a clear insulated pair of devices which worked their way down there.

Sorrow would heed him so.

Upon the other, of which, one spoke.

In the fissure there had been a voice, Clerk omitted it, but lost himself, without a trace. Of what happened, all too quiet; suddenly near and disemboweled like a simian without a trace, he was still there, without a face. It had crawled on the ceiling and remained there for a while, frowning.

The device in the fissure, it was pumping, like a tiny oil-recovery long extender, with many tubes venturing beneath it. Through pumped and would to be, a little more than pieced-for cyst.

Upon the last color of the plains, death follows, none remains.

As simply as it were, the blue was bound to change one day as if to mourn, unlikely, needles of each skin, entered him as soon as he started dashing in the words, commands, anything, pushing buttons. From the storage small empty-spot which opened, a metallic voice asked as much.

‘A liver is needed.’

With as much as it was settled, it was a given, it was what he asked, what he wanted, what poured out of him at last. He attached the few little pliant thing, and the winged stings that were drawn from the side, from long pencil shaped holes, between the levers and between the button-chimes, then opened, large to be revealed chest. They worked themselves over and extracted him, with pain and duress. Upon this nauseating pain, he has almost lost his sense.

But they were there on the screen, on the camera, on the window, staring back, dead in light, open and turned, with many legs pointed at him, with every point and every way contorted and stung, with everything in sight deepening as it to face himself in dead of nights as well.

He didn’t know how to control it or what’s it felt, and where to touch. He simply waited, winced again, then, as he could only think of nothing else, wait it out with both of his eyes closed, until the process was done. Encased in a peculiar folded fake glass dome, he looked at last.

A few more leagues were pushed below before he came to realize what had happened and where to look after, not that he’d know when to strike or when to move about the hour. By the time the screens and the windows were cleared, he had finally decided to avoid the fissure in its entirety, for what seemed to live there, the glowing creatures of which light shone upon him, would but wreath and not lay away, they would stay their way and stay out of his way, if they did as much know what went on. If only they had realized what went on. He’d be just as broken, just as spared, pushed around, then stand. He couldn’t settle with anything, shaking in his booth, clean clothes but stained with sweat and whatever else appeared to be put on him by the time he started coming sooner, then, aware of what was going on. He drew forward for hours. A few more miles, a few more leagues below; damn this, I need to make it rise.

‘Ascend, I tell you, ascend if you will! I cannot have you float no longer, I cannot have you here, I will you to ascend!’

He spoke at last, as well. He could but only push on faster, dreadingly as if there was no other way to last and cast it away, wherever he might lay, there was little to no matter of thinking, as this metal beast was not doing what he said.

‘Ascend, I keep telling you, wreathing machine, why won’t you listen?’

Then within his sight, before he had considered the chance to temper with the innards of the panel and the device itself, he finally found a way to rise, and move around before his veins grew wilder, before he froze in place. Before he could be gotten again; a wall unlike no other, and put like a buffoon in front of barracks of insanity, this torn-away reality, molded, much akin to its many facets, within the reach and within stress, many puckers of large formations, all but squared. Most would be of chitin or of skin, reached within them, boils-transparent which were thin. Swimming inside but the creatures that had crawled inside, he'd come to realize that one was in the cabin with him. Standing on top the ceiling waiting; as it's been staring at him for the hours, as he's gotten through, to him but lowering itself, it's gotten close, and would to be, much wider, as it came up close.

It was incontestable that such a thing would happen. Dreadful event that might come to no end, within the reach of the humane, the man was but frightened to no end.

The bands were sworn, they were worn out and looked like they were fumigating in the air, as they bore their salacious worn-out forms all of the sudden, praying like mantises, calling for one of their children, whom started retreating from inside the cabin, as soon as he could look below. He had a clean view of his chest with was open like two standing doors of which dark was but a pit itself he could not see through. Little cords still connected to the machine in front of him, always working on the hour as well as he could shine a lighted-glance upon the burrow underneath the panel, only to see a semi-automatic cocked in, blocked, waited, useless, he threw it on the side. If that thing returned again, he'd only have his baton and. He felt around the side, damn that.

'Lost it.'

Strange, he noticed it just then, over a couple of a few more leagues down the girth of water, he found himself being met by something he wouldn't expect seeing here, or would, as a matter of fact, if those bubbles of air he had seen connected with this peculiar string he was staring at. But it was no string by any means, yet a peculiar, yet to be seen or looked at, fully grown as to reach the ceiling, which he wouldn't have seen unless he turned to his left side, algae-like formation made out of the strange butcher-pilled black reddened creatures with their many concave-set, wrapped around legs that were constantly grasping, seeing how. Many of the smaller ones were but the youth of their kind, whom had, for the time being adhered to some kind of growth they had settled through, following themselves up as they formed a chain of command that included the highest and the lowest of their order. Which looked to be leading to a black sphere made out of thousands of them, with flat cylindrical thumpers attached to them as if to make it so they were a sea-mine; furthering the convenience of him believing that they were underwater, although that couldn't be so entirely, since there were gaps in the cabin and he had yet to drown, wet himself by fear as to leave a trail, get soaked or somehow have the panel become some electrical conductor which would pull and push away wild arcs that would shoot in every possible direction. Peculiar indeed, although that was not to say he didn't consider maneuvering this off, in order to furthermore, understand, who he was.

A man was floating in the middle of a fully turned stop to the left, where he had aimed the inner-most middle region of the cabin towards. Looking forwardly as if to understand how he had come to actually pin himself in that direction, he had but took a second, plain as it were, to remind himself of the man he had previously encountered on his way towards the cabin. It was dreadfully peculiar, how, him of all ended up being right. He stood there, floating, not swimming, a static-statue frozen in a cast of black as if he were but a hollow cast, or a cutout in some invisible wall which had been revealed to be empty on the inside, though which still was yet to pull water in as if to fill the recess that lay inside of it. But he knew that the man must be the vile thing that had messed with, not to mention dragged all the pushing-through pipes that were ended on the other side of the wall; more so, he considered claiming what was his, by fairness of chance. Taking his baton out and signaling to the man that he meant it, at least to the point where he could harm him by any possible means whatsoever. And there was but no other chance to stay away from this thought any longer since it had already inhabited his mind, not to mention that he already started preparing himself by the time he started working over the devices.

The charge was set, a general trajectory towards a man he had but wanted to be dead, ever since the moment called for it. And he wouldn't take this letter off, he couldn't take his mind, around, for he had, as much as he could think of it, already taken the necessary precautions as well as general chances to get himself through as soon as he could make it past the first line.

It appeared there, invisible-microscopic tainted things, trying to fashion themselves in and get through, they weren't there in actuality, but he was seeing them. The cause being the sudden apparition of the man, he made him paranoid. He wanted him to be there, and not just a man-gap in the hull. And while slowly working the cabin, he dashes and slowly walked, a few leagues below, the stopped, fully cocked upwards as to look at him. It were a man, no man either; where he looked he simply stood there as if there was but nothing to this peculiar creature to be pinned upon or truly be spoken through.

Being there for a long time made him feel somewhat uncomfortable, even to the point where he couldn't hold his hand from dripping in. Dripping in, his hand, dripping, he thought, on top the ceiling, the window then. As soon as he was put through, protruding in, made of them, and soon revealed, they came to be, a face that sealed. He but fell behind.

Clerk unable to hold his guide as he had but stepped awkwardly on the tiled floor, backed against the wall, stared upon as if to hold anything he could find on him, anything that would do in order to get back at the creature and regain what he had lost during the few minutes there were there to spare, thinking, after a while, where had he went, where to go and when to close his eyes, had entered, through the ceiling, then but sent him around, but ripped apart, and slowly eaten, there was no pulp inside of him no more. Instead there were only veiny-tendon-snakes which pulled one another as to each some more. Grasp to shreds but made to feel pain, he couldn't help but at a time like this wait for help and make it so, ever, had it come, someone would hear him so.

As it happened, there were the piles, which had still made it outside by whichever means there were there to begin with, and one could see him, barely standing, barely to make a noise, barely poised, there stood, in a direction, broken.

Mathias had felt himself frozen for a second, woken up from a deep sleep he hoped to make it through before the night was through. It was night after all, wasn't it? He couldn't know, he had but little more than nothing left, his mouth but sparing through, as now.

He was but remembering a ruse, he was only true to himself as if to understand that there was no reason to get himself tired just as soon as he was there, up on his feet, wrong-stepped, then entered through the pipe, inside his throat, jittering inside his throat like an insidious snake which wouldn't let go, that's what he's become, that's what entered him before the time had wrapped around him but a coil, dragging him along, he felt the soil enter his lungs. A miasma gotten through him, he was gassed with some peculiar psychosis-lust, they wanted him there and he could only be dragged by this wild thing, the wing broken, he looked behind. So many pipes on laid there, but most importantly, the charging beast had returned, he'd die, he'll kill me, he'll smash my body, crush my ribs, I know that I will have been made and put to death as soon.'

He thought before he'd gotten through. It was ever so likely that he would be lost, at the cost of wondering what and how he'll settle, as much of a boast. It was cruel, trying to make I through, they were as inconsiderate of him, as the ones that settled taking off a few facets and a few of the slabs of the wall to look from inside-out.

'Peek-a-boo.'

Said a lady, she was tall and weird skinned, as if a billion cuts had ruined her body but someone took the time to put her back in, back together, where she'd last. Even her teeth were, no. They weren't chipped out, they were clean; too clean-whitened, too perfect, such purity was something that very much disturbed him as they waned along, as they pushed through, putting before they lost even the slightest hint, of there being more. More and more and more faces came through, more than that, a few of them more in the back, before one could make out what was going through them, always taking, always done.

Indeed, Mathias seemed to have aged a lot in the past few years he had spent on his back, and that alone could be seen as being reflected on the pieces of wood which were but as degraded as he had become.

If anything, his old habits never seemed to die off either, as he retained his tendency of laughing like a woman throughout his plain-lived life.

It was ever so near him that they gathered, trying to pour themselves in from the other side, seeing how they were just as onset on him after he had revealed himself, they set aside.

Strange, the Buffoon thought. He was being met, around, by eleven miles of mass, starting from the front, turned around upon itself, a stair-like encompassing structure of meats that were sutured together and formed the room-tunnel upon which he passed upon the hour until he could not control his feet, always but pushing away. Until he was met by a door that was shaped like eighteen deformed shrimp like contortions that had eaten from inside one another, leaving but their empty heads missing, instead of which bat-like formations if they were melted in shapes, bore their malignant teeth out, falling upon or between the shrimps as they became as peculiar as shoe-laces caught inside, fattened as to be like tendons, through which little parasitical featureless insects pushed through, carrying small body-foundations that were carried over from inside the room. Which, as soon as he had finally opened the door, slowly, he had managed to see the peculiar bat-teeth like encased laces attached to every corner of the room, bore upon hornet-tall devices upon which stood the cocoons; sarcophaguses upon which bore, the head of the mummies-worn upon the people in, they spoke of him, of ill, of ill. Inside of them, there came but a wreathing, twist, of many filthy men that were as if, eighteen of them split in pieces, on a giant scale in dark. Their worst sides and their insides chosen, specifically to make them yet benign, they looked of cuts and bore only the worst, skin of plume, olive-stings and livers-burnt within, and headed there and headless sphere, inside their chests, the guardians but followed through. Within their lives, what came behind, their children were but burnt-aside, and carried in sacks behind their backs, unable to feel one another as they continued aside. A light could be seen seething through and his gut was speaking, out floating through sinew, before he could realize what was going on in his head, he was seeing the destruction caused by their peculiarly elongated hands which were like gliders, hanging and lynching the defilers whom were the dark children they had finally lynched upon their long-mammal like extended arms.

Now, upon the hour, the room turned to skin as well as it became him. Seeing his every reflection but remade as well, the many hands but pouring out until they had formed his throttling throat, from which many hands pushed out, dragging him into long rat-corridors, where he met them. The people who bore their hands behind their back, upon which the giant horned rat whisker beds stood by, forming around like congenital diseases afflicted by necrosis, filled with blood-clots that had pushed through, pouting aside. As they were only put there for the side.

‘Please, oh please, I need to put myself in there, he will kill me.

He will kill me, won’t he, I will be charged through and put through, please help me!’

He yelled, and could only think of this as well. Mathias put himself through, and sat on his own lap, then blasted thing, it flew right through. Charging as it brought destruction, with an arm by the wall, stretched and reaching, pushing and destroying everything until he action to lay by the side.

He was not stopped, as they feared, below the earth, awaiting the tram. They were set to see him, all but recording as he came out to light. Peculiarly droned, to waste, there and again, he almost set himself cast on the ground. Wrapped around, each arm on the side, as much as he revealed his uncanny nature, peculiar break. As soon as he could move again, he had been torn, ripped apart from inside, worn. Black barb-wire caught in some rotation, a bush-like mass inside his bodily concentration span, and turned around, twisted as he came to shout. In the midst of the making, he had merely opened himself and seemed to bear. Turning and twisting until he could not take it anymore, his eyes were gone, both sockets claimed, but as soon as he regained composure, he’d begin away. He crushed, with both arms, but set and rash, the nearest pole, his arms contorted. Such strength brought by steel, dissected, his mind could not control, but trash.

Ham but continued on his way until at last, he made out. Barely alive to skin, incapable of fully contorting himself within, he had but charged through the first ambulance along the way. Near the album-store where a few children were caught between the doors and twisted, squeezed like lemons, through their heads fisted by an evil man, who was sawing their lowers sides again. Dressing in their clothes unable, to control himself as he’d disabled his lower body half, with a pistol that had missed, in turn, paralyzed he had lost the gun, somewhere beneath the counter, he was slowly dying, for what had brought them there was of little matter. As he had clenched both fists, and went deep-in as it to crush, and decide, which followed. First king, then queen, both seats were hollow, reddened in the front. He would drive alone from this point on. Couldn’t help it if he had brought himself there, traffic, then stopped. His legs were crawled through, and deep sinew had gotten him as soon. Brought within the hour, he had almost lost himself, beyond the shower, deeper rains. Pained by the looks of them, and shallow bridge, it must’ve fallen, he turned around, up-hill and shallow. As were the people he drove through, most of their bodies but puked themselves out, with deeper hues of smoke that flew, and went deeper, lost and threw.

Themselves, off lost and going; if they were pained, not ever showing. The city showed signs, they were but benign.

First the water-towers being taller, on many legs which, disemboweled, appeared to home in, during day, many scream trapped within, and man a day had he passed around, until he'd gotten through the town. There was but ashen, deepened stoves beneath the earth, instead the sewers' torn.

Kid is brought twice, brought twice, he's brought around and was worn out watching.

Kid was seen around going each public space and seen, starts fires.

He goes around and stops around the ambulance, swish and flick, put around the high-way, near the bridge, on top the scandalous little prick inside the side-street. Kid comes near, and punches the ambulance.

Ham takes lead, comes out, grabs kid by the ambulance, crushed head, opens brow, goes around, walked on top of public-sport, hunts people and sees them. They are looking at days, programmed filth, they start splashing one another before he draws near, he opens his mouth and draws a breath. Another kid enters his mouth, he chews him-dead, he stabs his own gut with a knife in order to have him struck. He was put down, little dud-canine explodes. Pissed-through, there were seven-eight-one people, all around, wearing masks pouring liquid glass in their necks, trying to drink skin. They were nastily going around, running.

'They won't come near me, it's my birthday, why aren't they coming?'

'What do you want?'

'They were listened to.'

And what does this kid want? Why are they drawing little charcoal circles on top of green and plume, and they were angsty like teenagers are, playing with guns. He startled them. As soon as he came near them, on the basketball field, one of them shot the other in the face. He fell and bled for twenty minutes he had purposefully watched for a long enough period of time that he would see him through. He also took his time to pour some black barbwire in his open-wound, just like salt and snails, they put around and walked about the place. He's taken his sweet time to see this place through. There were fires in the distance and something in the air. The army was planted around the town, a store in particular had a man without. His wallet, he did not have his wallet on, what else could he not have on him?

There were legless crawlers climbing in the dusk, all shot down after being hunted, before the taxidermist made a case out of it. He was the trophy maker after all, and he's gone through the trouble of making it worse for everyone involved.

But the asphalt, that was where the rules of the street spoke and the children playing, guns were shot all wrong. They tried killing him as soon as he approached, he was just done picking up a ball, hanging it behind his back.

'Want to play a round, children?'

They were wearied out, shooting all day, too exhaustive, both ways, it was unclear what he wanted, put through, soap in the trash, washy, washy. But it couldn't be the children either, he knew that, their hands were dirty he'd noticed, and there were planes still going but they weren't normal passenger-seat filled baby-carriages-black eel helicopters followed instead. With dead man with large mouths twisted with many tubes instead, power pea-shooters, large torpedoes around, little destroyers following them through. Carrying themselves until they couldn't see themselves, sky-mirrors carried by little things, they called those signs.

The children thought as much, they considered what was going on. It was hard, don't obey, the barking in the distance, sweat was underway.

'Make sure you aim well, kid, or you play a round with me and I promise, I'll let everyone go, no one has to die.'

'You killed our friend mister.'

'I wasn't the one holding the gun.'

'You scared him, that's what it happened, don't lie. You're the one who killed him!'

'I think you all misunderstood me you little shits; I am going to kill you.'

Ahhhhhhhh.'

A fly came out of nowhere, it startled him. It triggered a long lost memory of him getting out of the room and being startled by his mother. He kept laughing that moment. He almost lost an ear, the kid shot again.

'Damn fly came out of nowhere, damn it, that filthy fucking nasty black thing.'

'They're just about everywhere around the place mister, haven't seen any fly in your life now?'

'I have, of course I have you little, damn it. I swear, I'm going to die before I reach the hospital.'

'Wait, Jim, he's got an ambulance, he can help Limp two shoes.'

'But he's the one responsible for him getting shot.'

'That's right and he did challenge you to a fair match, hasn't he?'

'Of course he had, so what about it, mister? You still want to?'

'Boys, you do realize that your friend is still alive, right? There's still time to pick him over and do something about it.'

He threw the kids the ball, and all of the sudden it popped off, they blew up, with a part of the ground, pop-pop, they all died. They were turned into an ashen spot of black blood and barb-wire remnants which had been scattered around by the air inside the ball-bubble air, bubble, air-push, air pop-pop blow, pow, push-around and push through. The children died instantly before their guns could recoil, which backfired on them, killing one of them right before he could be touched by the explosion, if at all. On the courtyard the child was still breathing. Ham decided this was the perfect opportunity to take the child and get him in the ambulance.

‘Ham stop it already with the laugh, you’re pissing me off.’

An after thought; by the time he had come to the ambulance, it was wrecked. Stomped, trashed, lain down, put to bed as they said, and a lot of trashy gangs had left their signs on top of it worn-out and went torn-about, all to ruin and put through. And put to pain, and painted, pouting, he washed again, his hand in blood, he put the kid down, then smashed his jaw between the boot and the ground. Up-ceiling, there the building.

‘You know I’m coming straight for you, right? I’m killing, you, I’m coming back for my keys.’

From the other side of the city, of the out-doors, from inside the home, where he was looking out, beyond the court and all around. His men not there, he was but put around. And pouting, like they do, like their people do; he was wrapped around the hands and knew what this mean, this insane man coming through, he’s killed a child and put him through. He was jolly good Rodgers, he’s putting up with captain Israel, that’s the type of man he were, that’s what he were about, and this is what came onto him now.

Peculiar thing was, he was but walking, then he rose on, charged through the door like a wrecking machine, a bull made out of black iron, never stopping.

He went in and killed the man.

Regardless of what came over him.

All of them were deeply on-set on looming around the place.

But that didn’t mean to last for long, it went too fast, he but entered the door and right through at last, faced by a few armed men which unleashed what appeared to be a whole artillery-den of shots, he drew back, all of the sudden poised to hit back.

He came into the booth and settled, he shouldn’t; right between them, open mouthed, two, a few more darted from his back, between them snapped, his shoulders wrought both sides and through them, like a little pop, a crack from inside his skin that entered through them, ever growing and stepping between them, right through. They were bloody pawns upon him strewn, as little children would in the coming of their dark days. When both men look with both arms stretched and fired met by him, a man standing straight. Cocked, as the revolvers were, with the bullets stretched and but stopped as they were themselves impaled, through the shaft and through their hands, all along the way, they were but largely fell between the floor, between the door, strung about until he finally twisted himself. Where Ham but ripped them to shreds before the time of the man around the window come.

And he had acted like a hog foaming, fumigating as the barb wires show, as to release from them but one black stupor which had yet become. They changed, as soon as the prolonged exposure to air allowed them so. From their retched pins, from black within, iron changed upon a whim. It looked strangled, it would be, malignant as to feel itself but wreathe away. Become akin to flesh, part of him, became, but soiled, of darkened bones and a man inside his chest arose. His helmet broke as soon as he began pounding in his head. Violently trying himself to be released from him.

He looked inside and felt no pride, having had realized what was of him, and what he'd become. The trenches were but felt, the other things, his skin erect. His wrists were still wrapped in barb-wire, his body but having the rails of a tank, bombs and other little warheads of fire, burnt, the man had finally choked upon being pushed down. Upon the dirt, but still, he remained headed out.

And worst of all, the strength remained. He was a man of War which started bashing everything, crushing walls, everything in his path would not be stalled. Various gas-masked people with their peculiar suits, and army-units and peculiar black bolts and large satchels and containers of gas, and bolts were lain as well, he carried them. Such strength was never met before. He merely changed through the door again, readying himself, met by him unarmed but staying. With his hand upon the dial, yelling.

‘Get the fuck out of my house, or I’m going to call the cops!’

‘By the time they’re here, I will have pounded you in the very.’

Pain stopped heaving around his chest. The half top of the soldier’s head as well as his helmet fell off immediately as he was seen down there. Soil had become hardened iron, just in time. A few shots were taken, they bounced back.

His face looked but a contortion as one would say. A eye pushing out, compounded, a mouth which opened only to choke and spit many long mask-like cords that filtered everything. He spoke in eight accents and never seemed to die.

And from his back now emerged four long-twisted, two-segments which walked like legs, standing upon black-boots that were put down. Amongst the rims of which filthy liquefied skin kept pouring out of him. Everything was being muddied as he walked. The room was a mess, but he didn’t mind.

He stepped in and a blow. And his face, came off, within the inch of him, to show. His teeth were anchors, they flew back, incisors standing again the one of the graffiti painter over posters on lain on a decrepit wall. Black blood on it, and little puff of powder; it’s where his stash is.

He plowed through his chest and ripped apart both heart and crept in yonder. Through his upper chest, he simply ripped him in half and threw him out the window in the middle of a flying chest which had been taken town as well. Both him and the torsos were caught down and run over by a drive who had passed the limit by at least eight miles an hour for the area they were in. A cop-car was trailing him but seemed to have completely ignored the bodies, having been way too immersed in the on-going chase.

‘I think this should settle it, and with that, I will take my leave.’

Although he took a second to draw in some air, having taken a few puffs in, then leaped out the window as well. It was a strange neighborhood, weird people appeared out of nowhere, with children in their hands. All black-blooded on their faces; across the streets. They put gasoline on trampolines and started leaping around, using their children as cushions, which were immediately bled out. And some came with lighters, staring fires wherever they could. Cars were on fire, arson being king. Before he knew it, the entire neighborhood was on fire as well as the clouds and the sky, they burnt. Little children, melting faces, constantly being disfigured and released; as they followed through this inferno, he realized that there were napalm strikes coming from the army helicopters that were taking their time to destroy everything that should.

Release all evidence from the place.

‘Make sure everything gets rinsed to the ground over sector B.’

He had to run, he had to escape.

‘Sir, may I call in backup? Should we bring more squads over the place? They seem to be spreading. And their children are being yanked over the fence.’

‘That’s being taken care of, don’t worry, we’ll tackle them from the side, neither of them will survive.’

The man said.

They were filling them with slugs, which were foaming since the slugs wore tiny pockets of salt attached to them in tiny bare-thin glass pouches that shattered upon making contact with the babies. Many were put down immediately, but others followed through as soon as they could walk behind them.

He began to make it sound, like he wasn’t even gone. It was all fair, he was not to be burnt away. Fall-signs, all around fading, little voracious mouths, eaten, staving off every part of town, he was locked inside, buildings fell over and they formed a block. Looking back, he saw it fit, they had ruined it, the only ambulance was getting pounded, by a fire he’s never started.

But he’s darted through, and fire enacted millions of burn, and worn, through the burning building, he’s jumped through it and matched a bore. His skin was filling through, alike, slightly to be called and liquefied. First wall above him fallen, tiled with a corner stall upon the broken chandelier which was now part of the table and the small chamber it’s been drive through. Where lain a bathroom stained with little plants and clothes of some sinew. And the man who lived there died on the potty, with an open wound and vain to see overdose put through the agony.

Yet as he advanced, though his body would wreathe again and again for those coils of skin that lain inside had taken a liking to the heat, and brought to him, he turned to stare.

He whom had appeared, like an apparition unnerved, it settled through, with an open pore, and would be gore that settled through him. Open and brought to a command, dreadfully shrouded yet no longer hiding in the dark, he was revealed. Peculiar creature that he were, never to have feared, it appeared out of nowhere, only to have dreadfully sneered at them, with little despair. Its eyes were hidden but through stone he would repair. As to reap and sow what came, through lo.

Fire ended, around him gone. And just as soon it settled after, disappearing ever yonder.

With but a blush of winds, and peculiar strings of filth and flimsy taking, a gaping pair of mouths, never ending had but given form, they spat from the mold of every form which formed a great wall. Fire was put down, as just about the minute he started on. Every wall had but pieced together, the chandelier but part, within the mark, and clothened threads and skin and man and fragile cartilage put about. Until one could see that what was wall was spitting; from the gelatin emerged, the elongated body of a great worm, which was surrounded. With as many chitin-plated, granted. Many holes emerged at last, and at first but peculiar looking livid safety-bags such as car-crash safety measure shapes, which grew and formed, within their flakes and the false skin that fell from them. Peculiar growths, contorted hors that pushed about their edges, then connected in the front to a greater lump which caught all of them with humanoid-like forearms that grew pincer-like extensions to grab a hold of them, it wreathed. Like some deformed rib-cage creature, yet, the lumps of flesh that came out of the worm, and the ones in the front bore mandibles of their own, that didn't open to reveal tracts, that lead to digestive system, mutts. Crystal-cyst forms rosy, with bore little tadpole-spiked, cozy like retractors that started throwing themselves around; not in pain and not to harm, but only seemed to draw their images about.

With every stone bearing an image of their own; and every time he looked at the tadpoles, he realized that they were torsos like his own, from which the stings, wrote within the minute. Of broke-quite, disappearance, the names of the men he killed.

‘What have you done here?’

‘I’ve only taken the lives of two men.’

‘What of the children?’

‘The first one wasn’t because of me.’

‘Yet it was your fault.’

‘I’ve done nothing of the kind, I’m free of charge and not to be called for anything I’ve not done.’

‘But you have and you need pay for everything, which death might come, alone convey.’

‘I said I’m but free to choose, at last, I’ve done nothing.’

‘Yet you have.’

And with a piece of his nails which refused to go off again, he but searched for a way in to cut and do as much harm to him as to be brought to his knees, and put to agony.

He was to give him but a chance, since a lot went around the place.

‘Walk through me and it shall all be written off for now; make your way to the hospital, for that’s where you ought to be when the time comes.’

For that was the reason he didn’t change ways, and that’s how his only way out went across ways.

Yet, the Basketball court hadn’t always been that way.

It was more dolefully strange, being there, rough neighborhood, children shooting one another on the regular, they were armed. They bore rifles on the and long-assault sub-machine ripped-off guns with bayonets and tracking devices they stole from their parents’ house. Many of the rich kids wiped out the poor ones whom couldn’t even afford yanking normal pea-shooter, having come with scissors and little cigars, they were throwing needles and soft-turned lumps and rock. Shot dead right-foot in broad-daylight they would.

One girl ran around the area, she being chased. Little guns pointed at her, shooting her ankles, gone, she wasn't bled immediately but they took their time. Going slowly on her, find out what's it take to be a man, brought in a little ballista, shot her entire skull off the plain of the earth, her spine was trailed as well, her body ripped in half, by a single shot. They took her out, and then they put her on a trough and spoke to the giant invisible creature which appeared, as it extended the claw-like mantis-talons which were wrought with fat, bloated at that, but took and ate her, giving them invisible coins. The children took them and put them into the invisible noise-maker, only to listen to no sounds. No one in the neighborhood understood what they were dancing to but no one questioned it out loud since they were armed.

A little army came in but they weren't prepared; as the children hid in randomly picked houses and they had to shoot everything and everywhere, spray and pray, the tank having demolished four buildings.

'No sign of the children sir, should we continue?'

'I think we've done enough, they should've learned their lesson by now.'

Do you hear that?

Abandon your arms and we'll be square.'

And they discusses between them, as in the next morning, during their leave, the soldiers woke up with children arms put on their doorsteps, seething with warmth, as they were ripped off.

'I think our job here is done.'

The army left. But the children weren't dead. They knew what they were doing, they were from the old school, of pain. And before the new kids and families moved in, they walked on giant insect legs that sprouted from their arms, back to their old habits in no time. When everyone one else sleeping, they moved across the bars, on top of the fire exit ramps and broke into the windows, into their rooms, entered it and devoured their heads while they were sound asleep. But one night they found out the harsh way what it meant to not have opposable thumbs anymore. His head got knocked off, his insect body reeling back in, reveling a sudden extension-like pushing out thing, as a smaller throat that came out of the hole that was made it. Long meat, like that of a starved thumb which grew fat in the middle like a ringed-worm, which started reeling on every side; right from the front it spat out some peculiar substance in which it coated itself, warded off each shot. Put down the child with a long leg, contorted, though extended, tenderly, kicked the boy right to the side. The parents came in, bearing guts, rifles unloaded yet the body token, all of em'. He was not letting them get through, the man ring worm like growth appeared to be shaped like it bore inside of it eight young kittens that were struggling to get out. It pushed itself open like a fissure from which a peculiar long stalk with two spherical meat growths that were encompassed by roots on every side started levitating. Before either of them could reload, it simply made it out of the room. While in the distance, the stalk was abandoned as they came out of the shells themselves. Peculiar thin-things, like flaccid-looking tapeworms that were made to look like poor imitations of much more than five fingered gloves that constantly shared between the two of them, absorbed streams of rancid meat which moved like plasma between the two of them before disappearing in mid-air. The after-mark being a guttural explosion which dirtied the walls; from which a peculiar creature emerged, like a fat infant without limbs but a head which was a flat table-like facet, on which prune-formations opened slits, like elliptically-squared openings which shot thin black canine-arrow shaft rods that began the assault before they could understand what was going on.

Some kid off the streets threw a basketball at it.

The kid was killed afterwards, instantly.

And then it left. The child was marked for the rest of his life, the back of his head hanging on a lamp, but his parents were children as well, so the debt was paid full-on out. It's what entered him, the boyle-oh byole he was raised by another family from there on out. A family of weird people whom he found in the afternoon day-out, clocked out, dead. They were, spread around the carpet, made.

Their heads were still floating as were their throats, pulling off the floor which was their bodies, to be sure. Throat-taps blew spilled their body water, liquefied bones, limbs and organs as gelatin, across the walls, as well as he could see, they had killed as well, another one followed through.

It was a man who broke in the house, he thought of stealing something, he pulled out a knife.

'To the wall boy.'

He then walked to the parents, stabbed them a few times, no reaction from them. Rancid spittle back, they left with something, at least part of his house went missing and they broke in again, later in the day.

But the boy simply left the house and lived on the streets for some time; seeing how there wasn't much in the neighborhood, for him to look after. He was set on trying to sharpen his nails, they were all grown out and were torn from the bottom of their shell. He simply followed the trail of destruction, upon which a dilapidated tall building formed of the broken debris, a few rails and a wagon stood there, up heaving itself to a large peculiar black roof, which pointed outwardly, then inwardly as the floors were wrought in; he stood in that abandoned building for a while, only to understand why it was avoided.

Strange man coming from the side, a foreigner whom looked out of a century was brought. He looked like an ancient depressed jester, black clothes, of some medieval peasant with nothing in his head no more. He was but a drool, trying his fingers in and out, doing obscure things, finger-butterflies, as he attempted to lure the boy out of his hiding.

'Come on young man, get out already, I have something else to show you.'

'I'm not stepping out if you're still here.'

And annoyed, the man approached, seeing how the child took a few steps away, he coiled at the entrance, refusing to step in. It wasn't likely that he couldn't step at all, as his foot was at the threshold, a few steps in. But he looked past him, with dead-swollen eyes, looking into the benign holes from whence the dark stood by his side. He was not to make a scene, or to look anywhere else, than where he'd seen those things emerge. His hands were wet, the door frame soaked after. Grunt saw the holes that were pin-pricked inside his palm, he knew something the man did not.

They've broken him, he simply thought.

They put the skin grated in into a jar through a strange iron-pick grinder, which, once inserted into the palm, formed a large iron tube which travelled all the way through his arm, through his chest and into his liver and his gut. Surgeons often used these kind of devices to travel all the way up the brain in order to completely empty fill brain-pocket with little metal strings in order to prevent metal aneurisms from happening. As blood becomes mercury and the brain becomes rust to eaten by the brain-eating electrified machines. It was what god told the Depressed-Jester.

He smiles, then approached. Offers a hand, and asks the boy to trust him.

Grunt stretches his hand, they shake on it, soaky-sweat.

'I think you're a sick person.'

'And you're dumb child.'

He then steps in, and kneecaps the kid into a sleeping-prone position.

Grunt wakes up in the hospital. Something wrong; half of It still in that building, half of him on a table, surgeon looking at him, wildly awakened.

There, in front of him, alone in a barely dim-lit room, surrounded by multiple apparatuses he stands. Ptlok but barely out of his mind, unable to control himself once he discovers something else; it's not often that one finds such a specimen as to be awakened for this long.

He looks happy, elated for some reason, it's not something that happens often, as a matter of fact, it's not something that should happen that often. It doesn't fit him well at all.

He's already pinned the boy down, worked on him as no other man would, trying to gut this half-a-pig as he saw it fit.

'I've blessed you child, thought I can see that you've already been blessed. I can see that there's no way someone like you could've made it this way, yet you still breathe, you still move and most importantly your heart Is missing.'

They were worn-out. Put to shreds, and there were pointless. General infection points in dead-men, put through.

'Why are you wearing an army suit?'

'I am a soldier, I wear the mask on top of me.

Looky-look, there are hordes of people trying to make it through in time. I need to call and make another call, if I can't put through. They can't put us all to jail.'

'They can, if you don't look after your own. I'm telling you, there are things that don't work today.'

Torn-cities one day a week; put one good through, stupid things on one of the open-tv's; soups taken from Taiwan, they put one through one bug-man with little uneducated people that eat from people with batons in their heads. Lodged in or grown. They were trying them, the Philosopher, spoken off. Confucius's teachings were wasted on the youth. Monks only gathered around dead holes and paled.

Butter was become rubbing alcohol, or at least as expensive.

A hobo was bearing a weird circle signs, condemned by the people as he prophesized the end of the world.

Shops had hidden walls where they hid the dead.

Men were whipped openly on the streets and made to serve.

A pandemonium of colors followed, the gloves, suits, and other finely womanly clothes were but used to wrap around some of the sickly that had broken through the window-streets.

Blue-paint in buses was but carrying cerebral palsy, which was transferred by touched. Taken by the throat, a man was shot and put through one of the most painfully erect syndrome-punching Ottomans upon which they were being tortured. They put something on the beds.

'I think there's something in.'

'What?'

Skin was falling off the sky.

They were refusing to speak to one another, but all life was driven it, to one point, or various others.

Various new hospitals were being built.

A mall was being demolished in order to clear a general area that might be used to help raise one of them amongst the lines. They were a given. All construction materials rested on bones. Men who died now walked away with giant wrought metal frames that stretched upwardly for hours.

Of course there were no braver men, whom faces were but taken there. Worsened by hours, given by piece, some had missed.

'Damn it.'

'You don't understand.'

Said another man, they didn't get it then.'

What to look after?

Small place where he worked the innards of the moving sets, where to hang about the hour, when they called upon the dead. Wrought behind, they didn't listen, they would fiercely be laid.

Brim worked in a small cozy room. It was neatly cozy and he enjoyed working in it. He mainly fixed struck objects across the floors, like cats stuck inside or ripped in half who still meowed for more. But they were electronics, toys abandoned by children.

‘Children nowadays; they’d do anything to destroy a man’s working hands. I keep telling you Fred.’

‘I hear.’

Jonathan, Jonathan.

‘Jonathan.’

Someone said, they said.

‘Jonathan, Jonathan Mayflower, you are Jonathan Mayflower.’

‘I am, but who is calling me?’

‘I am, I am the one calling you.

I live inside your car. Keep driving, and don’t look back. Don’t check the side-view mirrors, will you not?’

‘Five more minutes and it’s done. I love you.’

‘Who are you?’

‘Magcogm, this as much as you need to know.’

The initials written upon some ancient tome he had looked upon during the time he had been an invalid child with three eyes painted purple, dressed in, gut.

The car was a gut, it stopped and bled.

His mind was a little off the train.

Instead of ankles, wheels, but eight of them lines back, on each side, they bore bands which wrapped themselves to his wrists, his shoulders, and to his belly, they wrung him around. Constantly spinning him until he could see the light that followed after, afore mentioned, he saw lights; broken clocks and asked the man-clock maker.

‘Clock-maker, when have I entered your store?’

‘It’s been a while since you asked me that, stop the wheels.’

They were not there anymore. It felt as if his torture finally ended and he would not succumb to the death of every skin in sight, although there were many salamander giants span around instead the walls, which fell like rain drops inside the hollowness which replaced them all. But neither of them were actioned by cogs, or machines. They were simply there, having him stare. Within the minute, the Clock-maker Jopyrat, whom pulled him by the side finally stabilized the man.

‘I don’t think you’re going to like hearing this but you need to listen to me, all right?’

‘I am listening.’

‘I’ve given you twenty shots now but the color of your eyes hasn’t changed. It’s a barf-spot of pastels and I’m highly concerned about it.’

He simply took him up, wrapped the man by the shoulder, as he was placed from the one chair he had been waiting in onto the counter. He was opened, despite sitting on his arse, revealing a mighty cock-pilot belly opening where he was but quickly worked upon before he could even figure what went on. It was mightily odd. He didn’t ask any permission as he worked upon where no man would belong. A man’s gut-clock was his own. But in that case, who owned the car? If he was in it, after all; the man inside the gut doesn’t own it. Indeed, he doesn’t, but what of the little man in his gut?’

‘I’ve extracted a coccyx of nickels. You are saved.’

‘May I go now?’

‘Of course you may.’

It was such a daze, having had his appointment already.

But he had received new eyes, which were cut by him inside the bath. The bad doctor, the one dressed in black clothes, who was death, instead of the real doctors whom were light. And was bloodied all the time like a butcher; and had a blood trailed smile on top of his mouth-protector. He told him much about himself. About his two children and about the other things he dreamed about, such as.

‘One day I will stop performing surgeries such as these, as awkward as it sounds, I do seem to be the black market of surgeons, don’t I?’

And I don’t know why but I feel like a fake, as opposed to them.

I’m not as real as they are, you hear?

I wish I were, but I’m not. I find myself often performing the most dreadful thing son, on people.’

It was nap-time.

It was dark in some places, when the patients had to go to sleep. There was no question any longer, from the looks of it. They were to be spared for some time and take all away when needed be.

There’s something in the air.

Not inside the hospital but everywhere, if there was any doubt before it, there wasn’t one any longer.

But it was no matter of the air itself, what drove the people to act the way in which they had.

Abandoned building eight-hundred miles away from where they were; placed near the intersection, kept a few feet above the ground. A hand’s full reach at the very least from the looks of it; a few frozen people placed beneath, their carcasses being abandoned there, where children play from time to time. In their cadaverous nests they formed little play-nests where they often talked about their day and what comes after their school-days are over. It’s hard, thinking about what comes after it. Those are nicer days, better than what’s the world come to. Or what it became. It’s somewhat depressing, staring at the people outside, whom, at various points in times seem worse than the dead people they're surrounded by. Even warmth felt at home amongst the corpses than the people out of it. And they were always pointing it out, trying to make it too often, a foolery of words. And strange growths revealed through one of the opening hatch doors through which one entered the building.

The Porter always invited the children, he even encouraged them to knock on the door and enter in. He'd even lower down the ladder, rather than leave them down there among the corpses.

It's not a place young children should play in. Especially since they've been doing it for years; by the time school days ended, they still found themselves there, in a place they found dear to their hearts. To which they've taken a liking to. Every time a man passed by the building, he'd kneel around the ground in order to ask them of their wails.

'Is there something I could do for you, perhaps?

Could I call for someone?'

'We're fine sir, thank you for asking.'

'I think we'll do just fine, thank you. Bye.'

Seeing how he was so quickly dismissed, the man simply sneered at them, making it so it wasn't read.

'Then be careful, children, I wouldn't like to step on some guts.'

He said as much, then picked up where he was left at. He had taken a corner, past a dark set of fish-net casts of human-beings, left around a dark-red cage left out in the open. The metal-frames were just as rusty as the bars. He had half-expected to see a man wrought in iron, trapped inside. Yet there was only a thin figure that was chained around the mouth, across his legs, his waist, he was but strangely put to rest. Before he even came to know what happened to him. A few people knew of the red-some machines that drew in from the dark tunnels. Brought by rails to gas the man every hour; liquid moisture hardening, as he was licking the bars in order to feed himself before they left. This was one of the few people that couldn't be helped. And devices like these were placed just about everywhere, and have been ever since medieval times. The only difference being the wealthy in tomatoes having rotten, leaving them with little more than some obscure methods of humiliating the figures caught in public. Often whipped by little bands and strained hands as the metal frames would sometimes move by themselves, only to begin their motions of little torture. Followed through, they would pour boiled water, steam, but soon they were at a break.

What came out was not a man.

After years they would be still there, walking but chained, despite being naked. Releasing them ended up being far crueler than letting them stay inside. Many more followed from dark corners, like junkies only when they felt the sings that one of the cages was opening up. Others were but simply coming out of their hiding when the hardened moisture was but placed on the bars.

Little more of their minds was left than to figure out how to work a gun if either of them had stumbled onto them. One in particular but tripped on a man who was so nervous that he began stomping the poor creatures' head until it had been split open like two twigs of a tree of hairs.

Animals were treated better.

Little cognitive devices put on top the flying spectral hardenings around each fainting man. They were dead. They were fastened like little weather propellers which were flown around of little-drawn to a point little deformations of abstract-men whom had become peculiar elongated figures at to be shaped like molecule-spherical rounded arrow shafts in length, until their upper heads had become giant filaments that popped like empty cylindrical-objects that wore themselves off, having their upper side look as if they had been blown from inside by slugs shot by shotguns. And they grew even fatter like elephant-tumor filled creatures filled with such growths at to create a homogeny of forms that finally blew small pops in the air, having thrown the slugs away from inside their heads, with the slugs being match-boxes of skin which blew to a point, as to be chewing-gum blown struck in mid air, creating an electrical-arc of lice-shaped extensions that connected the top of the fattened monstrosity to a shape that looked like a constellation that kept growing and expanding until it had been drawn into the air, at such a speed at to take away from the murder that had just happened a few meters away from where it had been initially observed by the passing man. As it happened, more than a few miles away, a van stopped, allowing a man who wore dark clothes, a concealed knife, a head-scarf, and strange eye-containers that were lodged in his socket, bleeding thoroughly, to stumble upon a restless symbol of youth who was warming up to do laps, around the hour near which the perfect stretch from eighteen of May seventh, which directly paralleled the day of the Amsterdam's Grand Athletic Event was about to happen on the other side of the world, having been placed this year somewhere between the Asiatic Plains and the Great stretches of Russia, right before he was awakened by a sudden warmth that began encompassing the area between his lower ribs and his fractured collar bones, upon a sudden turn where it was revealed to him that a man had put an eighteen-inches wide stainless steel iron butcher's prick, ironically stained by a patch of blood he hadn't rubbed it off, of, furthermore, adding an insult to the injury as the stained blade was in actuality infested with a coronary gut-disease that's been left there from one of his earlier kills that day. His van having travelled eighteen hundred fifty two miles and four steps continuously, needed to get away as quickly as possible from the previously exposed crime scene where he took the lives of four men who were crippled Siamese twins, ex-convicts whom were responsible for child abuse as well as a various other felonies that had been swept under the rugs, having blushed upon seeing the man who appeared to be nothing more but a criminal who coincidentally stumbled upon the nurse responsible for their caretaking during one of her breaks, as she hang outside the building during one of her smoking breaks which was very well received by the man. What he did next was simple. Seeing how there was no one in sight that early in the day, he stepped dead-straight in front of her, knocked off her cigar with a simple slap off her wrist, punched her in the face, kneed capped her nose a few times, immediately stepping back as to allow her on all four, before he kicked her as hard as he could in order to blow out all the air she bore in her lungs, so as to buy himself enough time to pull off one of his shoes, then his sock, shoving it inside her mouth before he proceeded to absolutely wail on her until she died of shock, her ribs and skull being shattered completely. Before the next few minutes hit the mark of ten, he had already dragged her to the side, pulled out a small razor blade he used earlier to shave himself with, began slowly peeling her face off like a medium-sized left for too long in the sun pear, wore her face, switched closed with her, took his time to put on her underwear, his on her, the bloody socks, the clean fish-stocks, the apron-white, the blood on her clothes, not that it mattered. Then he unbuckled his belt on her, put a finger in her bloody mouth, drew a smile and two eyes on his nurse-suit before he walked into the building. On his way through the hallway, seeing how there were countless rooms so many patients were placed in as there was but one guard who was partially blind and thought this to be no other than the man himself, he took a break, then sat in a seat for twenty minutes, reading one of the magazines as he acted normal. Every now and then, throwing an eye at the man in charge with the security whilst wondering whether or not he was going to call a cop; it was a sports magazine which spoke of the most peculiar car-designs they had come up with, many of the vehicles, belonging to the new age being made out of people who looked as if they had been contorted in the most uncomfortable poses, as if they were but freaks taken from a circus, or from the movie which apparently had been banned in multiple states because of the allegedly cruel depictions that had hurriedly, as in the speed at which the attempts of the people who tried taking the movie down, somehow did not align with the general day-to-day working' man's sensibilities upon its initial release. Before he could turn on the page, his head tilted upwards, as to still conceal a good part of his lower face which already, having dripped on top of his shirt and pants, left a trail of blood not only on his face, behind the mask, with it slight pushed further down his forehead, below the brown, almost completely flushed down, as the guard came and brought him a cup of warm steamy black coffee he had brewed this morning, yet found it fit for it to be reheated just for her.

'Here's your coffee, miss Anne.'

'Thank you.'

The man said with the manliest voice a man could ever conceive; such likes that not even women could know off, nor would they survive if they were exposed to it.

As such, the security-man shrugged his shoulders then turned away.

Michael threw out his magazine and simply spilled the coffee off the back of his head. He simply fell and died. The head having burnt his fragile back of his head which was left vulnerable as a result of a previously untreated car accident, a wound that refused to heal; although he died instantly, as the top of his neck suddenly released his head, which started crawling away in an instant, to one of the corners, leaving a trail of coagulated blood cells shaped like little wheels, that began pulling the blood towards it. Soon enough, they contorted into a ball-body-contortion of mass which entered one of the mice-holes where the body exploded on the other side, painting the room in a bloody-red entry-point. His body being split across all six facets of the room, equally split until they turned into giant hairs which serenely started brushing off along the air waves that came out of the hole. With him taken care of, he finally pulled out his stainless prick, entered every room, then killed as many of the patients as he could. The crippled Siamese offering no resistance whatsoever; not only did they not fight back, but they carried a house plant, which was extremely green, as flat-green, as not even being shaded, and a small orange-dirt clay pot. Which stood out in a room of white; despite the patients' faces being somewhat pale gray, there were milk-buds inside the dirt and they had grown out of it, and formed little coffin-holes where blood-guts sprouted off. He merely coated his pick in this peculiar fountain, which, in turn gave him the most dreadful of infections any man could stumble on.

This man also spat on my mom. He was evil incarnate, he was vile. He had thrown away his future for a life of crime. His given name was Michael but his taken name was Turn. And he stepped out the line. He didn't care about anything, especially not his life or personal safety. Upon exiting the building, he began lighting up the prick, smoking it over a couple of passers-by who took him to be some person dressed for some convention or some similar event, having finished throwing a few jabs with the local punks, he went around the corner of the building, found the corpse which was finely preserved and left just like he placed it, switched back clothes, right until, he was exposed. Not to a few people who passed around but to a pair of five cats who appeared out of nowhere and whose eyes were but shining upon him. They were moon-shaped and appeared to project themselves onto him like stage-lights. He felt guilty then, which made him keep the woman panties on; those being far more comfortable than the other pair he was previously wearing. And since he was a sexual deviant, he proceeded to make love with the cats as well. Luckily there were no children in sight, because that's how people like him acted.

It was no wonder than he killed the athlete, slowly then. Before covering his mouth with his forearm and biceps, completely contorted around him like a snake, whispering in his ear with his tongue pushing in. Then he left him there, to bleed like a plank.

He had many victims he wrapped with an iron band. He formed a fence of dead people which formed his torture house, which was his. But he had claimed it. It was a tall dark-rusty building with nothing but ripped open grates at the top. And every time the wind brushed or touched them, their open ends but sang like pies. The voices of little killed men were heard. But no one knew from where.

The wallet had little to nothing with it.

And Michael Turn didn't like going groceries shopping with nothing in his hand. It was something a man could not do. No, he hadn't taken a liking into that.

He had an orange-organ, which produced rotten sounds, as the colors it bore were as decayed as he was.

Speaking of which, his head had a constantly rotting gaping mark he gave himself after the whole incident was over with. He drove his van into the side of a cartel-raided left over abandoned rinsed to the ground mount-den he sometimes lay in. It's where he hid all of the victims he didn't use for his fence or the other objects. It became his deposit.

Gaping wound, two inward pointed slices, pushing through; bleeding out of him.

'So, have you done something lately?'

'I have, why do you ask?'

'I'm simply trying to make some conversation, that's all. Don't you think we should talk about something since, we've been neighbors for nine years, haven't we?'

Yet we don't talk much and you have weird hobbies.'

'Such as?'

'This.'

'I don't consider this to be strange, I think you are strange, and you must intrude upon my ordeals for some reason. I hate you, it's plain and simple.'

I simply loathe your presence. You should move.'

'Why do you hate me? '

'You want me to talk to you, that's why.

I don't like talking; I like doing stuff.'

'Like what?'

'This.'

'Don't you think, this a bit too much?'

'For you, maybe.'

'All right, well.'

'I'm going leave and do far worse things than this.'

'It's, I'm not surprised, actually. Come to think of it, I would expect no less out of you.'

'How about I, invite you over to join me; would you like to see how it's done?'

'No, I wouldn't. Please leave. I can see why you don't like talking.'

'Then shut your mouth and don't speak to me the next we see. Or I won't be as, I'll kill you.'

Then he left.

He is a doctor at the Hospital.

'Wait, before you leave. One thing; I only need you to know one thing, in particular.'

'And what would that be, little man?'

'It's important that you know, this may not mean much to you.

But wherever you go, and whatever you think this trail you made might bring you. It won't.'

'Why can't you shut your dumb mouth already?

Look, I'm a respectable surgeon, I cannot be and should not be questioned, especially not by someone like you.'

There wasn't any break to it, was there? There was no shortness of breath, to be berraved.

Why would there be no better guide, than the one whom carried them in a way utmost chimed upon, then looked away?

'Look at him, look at him, the buffoon knows the way.'

They yelled, and they fashioned themselves stable before hearing the Dirtier come their way, making through the most uncanny valleys, twists and shambled, their distraction, every light but falling after, as it's gotten. But there was naught to say and none else to hide or get out of their way for what seemed to be a shabby good portion of the hour. It was just as set in stone, neither of them getting out of their way or pushing on in wild directions.

Short

They could be placed here and there within reason without showing much of a sign or little to do, sickness that followed.

There were placed that would not be touched, no one could bring himself as far as to open his maws and enter through.

'I need to listen to the words.'

'I cannot give you this and I believe you know it already.'

'What have I done to deserve this?'

'Don't you know?'

'Of course I don't.'

'Then try again, try, god damn you dumb-little thing.'

He had to go through the motions, both of them dead-struck by the open table were shoot, some tools were missing. That was a mistake he would not soon forgive.'

'Damn you, I think, damn, it's your fault, isn't it?'

'I didn't take them, they were here a few moments ago.'

Yet he didn't know what was going on. Of course not, it was just a plume, they were in the basin. And Basin was filled with wild alligator men, wearing their crudely made-out helmets. It was a white room, with nothing other than a few bolts strung across the walls, with little garments such as heads with coins attached to them. Wild languages come with little gems attached, that's how you know they're worth something, not money, but in heart. They're wholesome, expensive and aren't worth a penny of what they're sold for. It's a scam but I like them, so pretty, so pretty. I need more of them, I need them to look worn-out and somewhat decayed. How can I get them? I wish I could get them but I cannot. I am simple man, I am a simpleton, a layman like any person-man. My mother put a few black bags nears the' box, I am afraid. I am truly frightened. What's in the bags? Entrails of mom.

'I think it's a mystery worth pursuing.

If mother put herself inside the bags, how could there be a mom to begin with?'

‘A truly marvelous ruse. I wager that’s not her.’

‘I am underneath the table and I’m eating seeds, filled with dust.’

‘What do they taste like?’

‘Don’t, I’m not going to say it.’

I am the scum master of the bugs, the insect master of the blood. I wank on streets, don’t stop at beats, I see a little man, I beat him, I am. I am that man, I was beaten, I was mugged. They beat me and they mug me, why? I was born. It’s the insurrection.

‘They are bloated with your children, master.’

‘And whom shall obey the one that knows of what decay may fill their guts as such and who is to be called during the drop of the lights?’

‘I do not know why we’re here and for what reason I was called.’

Way beyond the chasm

There stood two people in a room, they got out. Through a small cut they made through flint, they snuck and won’t retreat a shout. Stood there walking yet confused, both Red and Mouse but couldn’t have understood.

‘What now?’

‘I suppose we didn’t move at all. It’s all a mess, everything.’

Still, they hanged in a ruin.

‘Dust will never settle at this pace, we have to keep up going before it comes and least of all will it procure what’s to be done with it, as soon. I think there’s but one thing we should and might as well consider now.’

‘And what would that be?’

‘There’s not a single soul living, there’s not a single person getting through. We keep this infamy to ourselves, shall we?’

‘For what reason then?’

‘We shall see it through somehow, if there’s any consolation for what might happen if we cross the bridge, you must know that it’s bastardly sickening.’

‘What is?’

‘This, what you’re forcing me to go through, since it’s something I may not be able to follow through with.’

The man with the axe had tripped and but cut his throat and face in halves. Putrid little thing he were, there was by no means any way to make it up to either of them since they couldn’t relent, they wouldn’t do with it if that was the case. Within the hour it would be settled by such means, they couldn’t avoid it forever, it seemed.

Somewhere closer

There hadn’t been a beginning nor an end to the hour, it simply was. From every side of the room there was but a single worthless little speck, as for.

‘His head scar fucking shot his jaw off!’

They delivered the man through one of the trucks, having kicked his skull off right before it came into the very room they were in. Everyone stopped what they were doing, most of the laundry mat being thrown around, every patron having dropped their eyes from their slave-newspaper sheets, their human curtains being pulled down, to look at the wreckage just as it entered through the front door and almost came, extremely as such, close to taking the whole structure down with it. They were enraged.

The Guest room was completely smashed, and the man crawled out with nothing but his half jaw popped out, held by a long arm that came out of his gut, holding it as it became a strange engulfing strange crown-like spinning spindle wheel which rotated, spilling its blood across the room.

‘What just happened?’

‘There’s been an accident.’

‘A second one, I wager, I wager, my pap was in danger, he’s took his gun out, I swear, he shot his kind, this young fellow, he’s Monroe.’

‘Slow down man, I don’t know what you want out of me.’

‘Listen, call everyone in sight, call everyone you can, we need him taken to the surgery room immediately before he opens his eyes, what’s left of them.’

‘And if I refuse to do it?’

‘I don’t know, I seriously don’t know, they’ll take my lower legs and attach it to the electrical surfboard right there, the ones with the buttons, the one with the buttons right there.’

He pointed at it, this being the second right entrance to the left from which they came through. It was short, small, short-small with little specks of light-drawers everywhere where they stored the morgue patients after they cut them into pieces and had nowhere else to put them. And they were little more than eighteen of them, all with strange faces, that grew on them which weren’t theirs but they were there, from some point to another, one could wager as such, it was a reminder that no one was safe.

Eleven miles from where they stood; a group, an alarming formation of twenty men, twenty patients, twenty people who had been waiting in the guest room, some of the nurses, and eight doctors had to be present in order to pin him down while there was still a chance to have him standing.

He wore a foot in the back, he was a trebuchet-like being with an open-standing scar spreading across his neck, not like an open wound but like a peculiar snail that dragged through. Everyone stopped immediately, trailing the walls with the tips of their fingers, being incapable of making out what was around them, having resolved to walking in like children with little more than cut through faces that were just as soon oozing out. A strange formation, and a shroud.

‘I think there’s still some hope we might be able to pull him from where he’s heading to and what he’s on.’

‘What is he on?’

Asked some of the blinded men and women; yet their voices were rather flagrant with disquiet since they didn’t know what happened around them.

‘Saint’s mercy, but what is that thing over there?’

It felt, in some way like everything was under a siege, living beneath the charts, in the guest room. Nowadays it looked somewhat completely destroyed as well as it had been torn from inside out, yet there hadn’t been any outside world any longer, it was only a refuge for destruction. From where arose but the most uncannily deformed and those who were out of fashion but failed to realized what happened after.

Four men dressed in white, as if they were part of a Greater Surgical branch were there, amongst some condescending sounding cunts. They wore some fire-packs on their backs, like the ones similar to fire-launchers. Peculiar things, but those didn’t matter, they seemed somewhat absorbed by their back-satchels, entirely so until no one could make their joints out of the mess, regardless of which, they rose and but found themselves in a somewhat empty hall-bend, into the strange dormitory where they would’ve kept the elderly in, if that were the case. By now, since this entire structure was kept under total lockdown, there wasn’t anything preventing them from doing what they did, since there wasn’t any way to reinforce what was happening.

‘I have my ID, I told you. There’s no need for you to do this. I’m telling you, I’m, look, I’m Lock Snarl, MD. I work here, I’ve been working here for the past several decades, there’s no way I’m not in the system, you have to check for me again.’

‘Who said anything about a system?’

Asked one of the men, by then everyone fully extended their arms towards him. There they loomed for some.

‘How did I wake up here?’

Brim asked himself. He was incapable of understanding. It was simple, yet it seemed like some vaguely peculiar knowledge he had been unable to understand or grasp at, since he was there for a reason, a reason that didn’t tell him much of anything.

Glory to Mongol and glory to the chasm

‘Glory to Mongol and glory to the chasm!’

They yelled and shouted and long departed and ever after but crafted their spears and long delighted and little more than made to be and no more yet of what had gotten through to them, they pierced one another bodies with long spears made out of calcareous reformed, refrigerators-deformed that followed through.

But it was not entirely to be called as such.

For what followed after were the abominations distraught.

‘The land has been touched and claimed.’

It was a disease that spread, as if the soils of skin was but filled with filth, out they came; little more of them could be recognized as well.

Peculiar formations, skin-sheet amalgamations, put together abominations they were. Movers, the machines, made and filled and cut within, stitched together with the men inside, whom were but looking outside and came to be. Many of them of them incapable of fully breathing, some were but tainted with the plagues, the bubonic kinds and most of them seemingly forced to be in an unnatural state from which they couldn’t awaken out of. They were the bile, they were the cuts, like butchered animals they walked. Long heads sprouting and shooting forth, reeling in, back and forth like little more than conveyer belts, all of which smiled, inside the Moor’s teeth and many rotten feet, of ladies that were brought from beyond, they followed through, the sky was blank.

It was the disease of stagnation, it was the beheaded head of Rod with a head-like curve, and many lacerations that had happened around his throat and body. Many of their insides as well, they carried what swooned after, the result was blank-death, like people shot in the head.

Many of these livid machines opened their chests within to reveal. The death-mask of atomic bombs, without the atomic appeal, only the shapes of them, instead they carried many people inside of them, all but torsions and contorted, all but put in that snare as they wouldn’t be allowed to be distorted. And on an extended body as if it was a rotten tree, out of a mover which pushed out came to see, many slit together, put together, largely to follow. On the path of Red and Mouse, as to follow, bring them back, like a game of hide and snick. What came out, beyond disease, it was nothing but a bloated hose, one that extended forth, and rose and froze, made out of the bodies of Dina’s, with Aleksey in the front. He controlled the mover in the back. It was peculiar, seeing him so elated, so animated, his death but be uncannily prevented. Not to be long, last defended, he had but felt himself largely contorted and now to be satiated.

‘I hear, I hear, I want to be near, what do I look for, ha-ha, I see. I’m sober, forever, it but cannot be.’

With so many livers attached, he had come to realize that he would never get drunk.

Of but the bodies were so contorted, they were senselessly put together and distorted, what sacks of skin could there be seen, inside the movers, nothing within. These were their military crafts, and the armies pushed over, alas. There was the General Cajun' Tossnt, whom but gave of the first order, have it come by soon, a strange flat platform coming out of the swoon, above of them, it came to be. Bearing the image of a teal-morsel, mechanically incline and put through hues such as the likes that would cause pain after that.

It wasn't as dark during nights, they spent over, looking over the roads.

They set camp while there was still daylight, spreading as far as they would be allowed. This long stretch was but perilous, as the land was still yet to be followed through and come as it may, there was little more to it than some broken points, lamp posts and other joys that were abandoned.

A perilous acre, the mind of the disease, he was distraught but looking forth, came to follow, passing through.

Kreikle but approached the man, he wanted to ask as well.

'Must we address the problem perhaps, will you allow me to push through the first of the nettled-through little pointers in the dark?'

'Which ones?'

Asked Almaine.

He unwrapped a frozen puddle parchment, the lichen-muck that was embed in the fabrics of this partially melted thing gave it a peculiar elasticity that could not be dealt with. He relented. For the time being he had taken to himself to look upon the apparitions inside of it, inside the matter, beyond but through it as well. It felt as if they were there but at the same time they weren't.

Both of them saw it unwrap yet it looked like a glass square put on top a pond filled with tadpole-like creatures with solid spike-balled heads, little extrusions pushing out of them, or a fish tank of some kind. They were pushing out, they weren't actually living, they were rock-forms, or peculiar formations, similarly to how one sees faces where they aren't, in the same manner would they seem to be. Most importantly, pulsating rotations appeared. Beams that were wrapped together like many rubber bands forming yarn-balls, reddened yet see-through, transparent but with little black dots floating inside of them, trailing one another with black-red threads that entered and pushed through each other, drilling then stopping, spreading like many tongues which couldn't help themselves but taste those little peculiar subatomic looking spliced star-like sparkling lost things inside of them, lost and spread. Pumping little blood-matter in them until they were no longer allowed; a small squeezing motion being somewhat pushed through, as well as it could be allowed.

It gave them a lot of insight of the future to come. A peculiar skeletal figure was being shaped.

'The first conversation is allowed to begin.'

A strange man with a chess clock-system appeared to start the timer. They were allowed to have an open discussion in the same way ancient philosophers went, with an exception, those philosophers never existed to begin with, they were made up, stories that were told to children and that would be just as quickly forgotten. First pointer was this. As well as it could be said.

‘I am a man of contortions.’

‘I am not.’

‘Then we see eye to eye, don’t we?’

Who was talking? It was hard to see it there, but Kreikle had two mouths that were aligned with his eyes. They were carefully placed in his chest as well as his cheeks, be it made of a little mind as he was, there was nothing close and nothing wrong with it, how he acted and how he pained himself there.

‘Where? And, all right, the man.

We have to talk about him, look, towards the front, something is but shaping him.’

‘A god?’

Asked Allmaine, yet he was set of a mind to look in which direction, it looked bastardly away, from where he stood, but foamingly-fumigating, they were speaking of large dead-wails.

Men of infantry don’t speak of dead-guns, but they follow through to destroy.

Everyone present was brought, a spoil of spoils, and many swoons connected to the people they brought through.

It does not compute, they carried the gut of the chasm, and pulled it out in its rotten putrefaction-form, it could be spilling in but it didn’t do it entirely, as they were but worn out, incapable of moving on, but what could that mean and what were they fashioned off if such appeal was taken through? It was calming, listening to the sea and the birds, in the distance and for all was worth, they ate and slept on it.

Manno Filthde

Fore and thence, and yonder where they stand. On top of many platforms swelled, there stood but one and less alike, to his every perceived delight, a creature of vile repugnance, sick. Destined to fill and better, ill, by calling, Manno Filde.

Ages had passed, and thence yonder, the last, he stood there and watched and only walked about in hunger. For the sane, would remain, only through large amount of pains, yet to stay and sit and wonder.

Great Manno Filde, of a birth unknown, lost on the account of chronicles, of mirth and bitter so. For he lay and he stay, on top, bitter lay, looking at what he build, wonder. Many throng and many wrongs, and stellar-yonder, there stood a large statue, made out of many dark pieces taken from child. As the great man of filth, had taken but done on such command, yet to kidnap and deform, and to steal those, make his own and made tiny shapes out of their stronger. Bones and meat were mixed with filth, yet he had done much with it and all of them, pushed and forced aside and yet again, another structure.

The floor was his, as all the levels, the world as much, of all the places, all made out of the intestines of the child. Mild in pan as much as he had lain, but colors such as gray and dirt in bitter hay, he drowned them in horses. Many stuck and many'a muck, wickedly in disgust he stood there.

Manno Filde called upon he, of little mind and pity, creature of no benign, of which place was largely known, and thrown around, lesser so, he wanted.

A small can-like, of meat and smile, of many teeth that were gilded, many broke and many hope for the drool was no smoke, but something he delighted. And its eyes, were but dyed, and were pushed, deeper inside, as if they came from his long grabbers. For a swoon and bite, and a sight, without delight, he had merely poked a hole in him. Watched him grab and to stab, and to fall, never alive, as he could not help it.

'I must be delirious, I must be delirious, for I am alone in this world and I have made a turn to find myself staring.'

And entered stairs, for he lived on floating cage-platforms drowned in scum-blood horned snake-like puffs of skin that were hardened by their growths, as the lumps shot through his standing platforms, rising him on their back towards a cage where child-labor was forced upon earless troglodyte descendants.

Tiresome in filth, gone to grit.

Large and swollen, disintegrated bile holds, he walked around and threw some coins and as mirthful yet he laughed. And pointed at them, ever-growing as he could not help himself, set alight by pain uncannily strident as the many woes had put it past him, made out birthed deformed fetus-grown, a strange human featureless headless eight legged came about. He spoke in intonations with an eye sprouting from the ground unable to control how it went around, in him, through a pained pool that was solid under the first floor. No more pushed through and uncannily he ate the sinew out of the first invisible wall where the blind untouched children were bleeding their invisible blood, being unable to taint it with the lemon-soaked liquid that would enter them since they were dormant in the diseased realm inside their bloodless cowls. And as he approached them there was no question any longer, since the desperate twins came out of nowhere as they began talking backwardly, two or eight heads so-pushed in through their chests as they were unable to rest, pain having entered them.

'I want, I want, I want to fill your lungs with tiny scissors and push your around into that small invisible hole so you might drown a little in your small hole where the mad flying tiny pops of steel breed with the malignantly flying eels that have become part of the great morsels of the sky.

I have seen and I have communicated with the seals now, they've told me their strange stories of how clock-work devices work.

There is a distant world somewhere where they've dreamed themselves in.

So many dark spots where he walked and had already seen them fight one another in his name, throwing dirt in their face with pucks of hardened smoke, whence lay, their faces uncanny, stricken down and beaten.

It's never convenient, when placed and set upon his face a mark of degenerate graves he wore, the Manno Filde, snore as he bequet himself, prone on a bone and broken down. Manno Filde but inclines, in the body of a mammoth-throne he walked and tried to push aside, and better yet his wings were draught. For through them he once managed, to push through uncanny wage-of pain and filthy remains, to grow up again and join the ones in laughter.

He enjoyed watching events, unfathomable crests and pushed around and cut through their heads. Pushed through and eaten, for better or for worse, it should be accounted for, his face was painted in the colors of a dead-decayed rotten morse.

In his essence, he was the mold, taken from everything morose of everything that had ever been known or brought, intoned.

Filth spoke to Manno Filde often but he did not know what it was.

‘I have finally come, alive, and be brought to a new life.’

‘How were it so?’

‘Simple, eternal bliss, the one who lives in it. This is ever so simple, yet uncanny.’

And thence, from the past, as if it was wildly spoken about, sprouted the essence of Filthde, of which disgusting form had taken form, not only faces but the hardened rivers which flew forth.

Filthde, oh supreme, the servant Manno just as thin as he were, he simply but in doubt, and never to the shroud of skin which flaked and fell about, to ask of him.

‘Manno Filde, Manno Filde, of servant drowned and Filde. Listen and obey, you are called but to convey the worst emotions that might lie, upon the weary and yet benign, you must know as much and do as I say.’

Upon the voice and voice commanding and little doubting and little more, there came but the wonderment and of little more than it was needed. Right around and better heeded, for what was worth and lesser, many. And what came forth and never through. He was asked to be put and drawn through, and put in front of one of lesser hues, who looked just as mildly tormented in shape, just as little as he were of a mind. Blinded and put aside, made to beg. Thrown ahead and rotten to a head, until he lay down.

‘Him, I need you to torture him.’

‘But what had he done?’

Plain as it were, there was little more and lesser, for he’d bear. No thought of him and little minded. But to wear what he commanded so.

It was a plain thing, small and petty, incapable of bereaving itself against one such as him, until the roundness of the cage he was in, though boiled ground and flooded floor, he leaped from cradle upon a spine of gore. A hall of roses and shaft of metal to the side, grayed out as if benign. To his right, there were the cradles-thrice, the shaped of contorted parts of meat and gray-grasshopper parts which came out. Many of which only started to push and eaten, be eaten as well. Mouths were being shared, although unsanitary as well as it could be put. There was no part in piece, and little more. Dreadful was the gore that came, shattered and remade, thrown forth into the pool.

Yet Manno touched the water and could only feel the murk spread, all around his petty fingers, though none stayed for more than few. Paces in-between and shattered through. Once he spilled his fingers, entered forth, there was no pain to be felt and no question he might ask for more.

They wanted to grasp and throw him around. No bodies below him but the cast and call of many ones, who died forth and set there, below his girth. They did not ask for this nor would they mix with his affairs, for they had been set to be known of whom was in control of him as well.

‘Touch him and you will suffer forever and feel more than you’ve ever felt.’

‘What a creature, he is, is he not?’

Brought on a floating piece of meat-square, there lay a creature grasping, such as deformed lost string, a missing link in the evolutionary chain they would bring back when pain was needed to be conveyed. Otherwise spending their last moments there. This primeval thing but begged to be spared. Unfashionably tiny yet compact, made as if to fit a tract in which it might be spared. Through it one could drive but a single tiny speck and a javelin as well, to gut it, to gut it, to gut it.

‘Have it, oh Manno Filde, have this javelin of mine and do with it as I call upon your mind to proclaim, not only its meat but behave.’

At which command he was set and pushed ahead, free reign given to clash, with the head being largely forlorn and lost, pushed through. Put through agony and misused, unable to live for much longer, not stronger, but ever so humbled by pain and by the deranged activity which might remain. There was little that changed, but countenance that might reign.

Pain by the first strike, a bobbling head which was part of its trunk fell to the side, to follow.

‘Plainly get ahead and hunt for more, this place is filled with them and awaits but the gore through which might you be. Inclined to miss and put through, see.’

He watched one appear, nearing but the front, from another level, as if he leaped from an elevator, looking back. The other side which had been flooded was only drawn back to whence it came from, never to have been picked up again. It was well-worn, and cut through as if never to be taken through. And eaten, piece in desperation, a large head, damned it be, with the maw coming through and pushing, splitting, throat in halves, only in such an extension and wide-spread could everything fit around. The place, where dreams were skin and became its meal was there. To be eaten and to put, the despair out of it, shaken and misused. A skin-tag appeared on a wall.

Tapestry was forlorn and light gray with red-hay put on. Various paintings of hurt-men and various shots, a carpet of scarlet as well as the father of all, the automaton on the side, not abandoned but waiting for him. As they appeared but in the air, the scum things, being those that had to be killed by him, again and again until Filthde was satsified.

‘Of course, my son, my true pet, I shall do with you as I please and never more shall you be dead. Not while I’m still here, I think I’m yet attached. I think I shall not only cherish you but keep you, after a while, unaffected.

Afflicted by a mind of filth.'

Now the beast from behind, of which girth was indistinguishable from its throats, revealed many more that had already opened them and chomped on all. Envoys of skin were sent, black and darkened by a puzzling sudden urge, a glow that spread of gray, with many stupors of malignant straws that appeared and disappeared as well. It was somewhat unsanitary, being there to be called. Filth was there, or was it all?

He could not think, but only listened.

'Accept the gift and make sure to bow and rinse it.'

'With what shall I do it and what shall I use?'

'Your drool should be but enough.'

Thoroughly drenched, but blamefully not, oh what was worth it, never to be so, there was that wild parasitical unity they could not take away, or more.

'It's drawing ever near.'

'Devour it or it shall become fear, disobey me and you will pay for it as well as I can claim your skin-cloud.'

From the mound where he was born about, twice the calling, blessed in filth about the place, the calling.

'Go ahead and turn, ask what you want and you shall only be tortured ever more.'

But with each bite, tinted about each rim and edge, there was no doubt that this uncanny thing had yet to stay. Seethe about and be made to suffer through, various heads being drenched in the sinew. It was a given, at a loss, it was taken would survive the lesser watches, of boils, trenches surrounded.

First he ran to the stairs, there and only there would Manno Filthde look for refuse, as the entire building was in the process of being castrated, eaten and lost about.

'Such piety for one running at such a speed, are you frightened by something?'

'Please, oh, please, don't make me suffer more.'

'I will do as I please and nothing more.'

Filthde could only touch. For about each wall, but his face appeared, all around, hand imprinted in a mouth, his picks of skin and bitter wings, the heads that came and pushed away. Other limbs fell as if they were drenched by rain, but all falling from the ceiling, made to suffer, ever so thorough. Through the first rough touch, and on a patch that looked as if it was decay, he met but a patchy man which came out as if lead astray.

'From whence you came?'

Patchy-limbs but looked and Manno, unable to comprehend what the servant wished to try. It didn't happen ever so often for one like him to appear out of nowhere in his house.

But plague that may be, for he was missing and would not speak forth. He feared something might happen, of nothing better and much yet so.

'I fear that there's something breaking my house.'

Thence, before Patchy-limbs could say something else, a verse came after, but speech was flooding, something breathing in the calling.

'I will ask of you later today, cut him and pray on his body only to convey the slits of pain and what I ask of you. Refuse me and you shall feel wrath as well as a disturbing thing out brought. It shall not be forgiven otherwise.'

'But how can I make it so? What if I get attached to him before the time comes?'

'What did you say?'

'Nothing, oh nothing, I pray that you may turn a bland ear and forget. We have to escape.'

'There's a ladder on the roof.'

'Leading to where?'

'A hole that's in the burrows, whence I might be of plains and might escape one day, but oh, pity that it's incomplete.'

'I will eat your feet.'

'Please do so but never wonder, I have no fear that I might be forgotten.'

'Let's see then what I'll make of stairs.'

Behind them, what appeared to be set astray was the entire house, that of which, part assimilated and part to be, eaten and torn apart, more than freedom of filth to spray, and pray that something might be eaten right away after this strange spice was being put on wood. It acted like a hive or like a colony of termites at times, yet what came from there, with many spikes and short-bursts which shot away both furniture and walls was something of such an abominable nature that everything would seem to be destroyed in its path. No longer could it be forgiven or allowed to lust for such things as were to be destroyed and claimed.

'Filth remains.'

'But touch it.'

And it was a given, after that, as well.

Upon their cast, the last floor, as to have ignored the strange apparitions of the creatures that came out of nowhere and would just as well convey, of the little they attempted to latch upon as they mislay touch and bitter snatch. Of bite that would taken and wretch be watched.

There was a locked door, one that was behind them only.

‘It should delay it, I think and for this very reason I see hope that we might make it.’

‘Truly, do you think so?’

So far, this was barely even thinkable, barely even comprehensible, of little while and ever closer, there was not a chance, thence fold, they had to deal with it as they might.

But he had thought he comprehended, what a master ought to say or do. It was peculiar, after a manner, thinking what might pass as to ensure. A proper satisfaction going, ever checking, nothing but constant.

For Manno knew little of the Filth and what it wanted, let alone what this creature surrounded itself with, as little of a mind, he were. What the despot had done was pull and drag everything with him away. It, the creature of which little more was being peered at, was something of a lot such as the likes of which should never be seen or be looked at for no reason. All uneven, he was evil.

Now the body of a wreathing filth, of which a foot would but yield what he’d become. For everyone that suffered after he was but filled with tendons and many faces, pox was almost gone but stayed. It was a part of its very being as it appeared to push everywhere and set aside. Always entering what suture could not be set, inclined in the most unnatural spaced, always trying for the most vile embraces, trying him, but to cut. Brought as if he was but armless, he was. Yet he floated in a square, of his faces, unaware that they were his, all silently dead, of what he’d become.

A disease piece, the rotten hold, the grasp of all, a so-called god whom ended it all; for he spread along the dead, and would do it again and again, only to get that satisfaction and possess others for its likes. He could not but force himself away, as if to become anything else. It was that ever-encompassing presence which was his. Filth would bring all to life and infect everything, until none remained.

The house was pained as it were dragged below, and now? Nothing would save them, none to spare, none to be aware of the threat that came their way. Most importantly but to end, and never again to live through pain.

Manno was but filled with dread. The creature was left behind and would not be spared. Manno had been so unwell. He had been given but a friend.

Whose legs and arms were in the back, in the hundreds, the hunchback was a sack uncouth, always pushing backward like a tiny glider, going stronger. As a nautilus much-humane, with the exception that out of its shell came many half point, black-heads filled with ashes, taken from children whom were punished, telling lies. Some wore the peculiar corrosive left-over that had allowed them to survive. It was a substance which mixed, with everything it could and ought to be pissed through as reigns of blood. It was a struggle trying to understand, how it hit so many blimp-fat long-thinned spider legs, coming from the shell-o-skin, from within where all the mass hid.

This creature swam through air. And he’d taken Manno to a windmill that was flat and shoved on the ground as a bridge, connected to eight others whom were largely elevated and lead forth. They simply walked and spoke of little more than the abandonment of Patchy-limbs, whom died in agony, most likely drowning in his own foaming blood and filth. Dragged below.

Drenched-clouds whom looked solid and a dark dimension which bore floating houses that moved like pumps, always dripping with their insides out; but no one lived inside.

Bhiltus was it called, and it came from an air that produced strange things that followed him and entered through wall and anything it wished. There was nothing in any world and little worth that would drag him back. It was a strange formation that would cower through, always missing and always true to itself.

‘He had died because of you.’

‘But it was called upon me to abandon him, by none other than the Filth, to which I owe it all. I cannot draw away from it and I know little more than going through his gut and listen.’

For he had been brought inside of that rotten core, through that bore which was skin and gore far too often for him to be pleased. This was no way to talk to him, but there was little to no chance, to escape this strange peculiar world which dragged at his hills and would’ve had, his head if he were to be elated. Too condescending, he was brought to a single clock-work thing, which had been erected. And it was but tall and looked like a city, yet-again condensed, entered through as if to see many floors and stairs. Cogs and other peculiar constructions which dragged it all along, pendulums which were but strange contraptions that shot in four directions, always twisting, turning and making it so they would never be stopped. Dread filled various growths and mossy patches which were red and wreathed about like worms or shrouds.

Pillars and caterpillar twists that were but lantern crisp twisted fingers, giant in appearance but holding the entire structure from falling. They slipped inside from the outside and looked as if they pushed. Open and through, and thought to have died before its time came and never hue.

There was something wrong with the Filth. Of which essence had better settled of ill. Coming from beneath the chasm, ended, but yet, let through and barely counted upon to, let alone allow surrender, and the blunder of pain, and what had come onto it would not remain there for long. It was but a mere shroud for what was going on.

But Filthde could but stand and wait. For the memories of all would make its body insatiably benign. Thrown and twisted but on the side, for it had grown the means to lay and spread. For he was not just a body, just as he was not but a face, thence where he lay, with the means, it had grown and spread like a disease, not to be touched, yet wrong-to look at. A head was cut, it brought another back which resembled a man whose face was but of rot. Swollen and lost for peace. Yearning that release that he might die, as he would be but missed, again, rotten remains, always foaming around the gaze which spread and sat around; little to it and little in mind. For he encompassed all, and would be there, always through the little remaining time and unaware.

He hardly dreamed of rivers anymore. Would to be and lost for gore.

That was it. It was settled, finite. All bothersome as it were, there was no point back to it. And to wreathe in what remained, there was the mission. Thankfully dead, and deep-pinted, let to mark, and where it rose. Where it walked, upon all, but they would but still sing it.

‘Each step, there but stood.’

Where its bone shook, there lay but crook and Filthde, of which, the little while, whichever was known of him and of benign, there could be little worth telling.

Yet why despair, and why hide away? For the little worth which was him, a little while. He had but joined him and would never get away, and lyre. Not to be accounted for what was growing in, and not to get away from it, there he lay. Would remain and would chance to go on as well.

He had taken his rightful place then. As no one else would have him be, none else to put itself, through the entry and through the uncanny thing he'd be.

For the essence and naught more, for which had been bore through him, of little more, there lay. On top of Manno Filthde, stood he, as no one else should remain, belittled as he had achieved, how he's decided and got through him. And would have him wrought and taken, curved around the back, and heaved. As the rivers flowed through his veins in yellow and green and dirt-like puckers, only to have adorned him in a most peculiar form he could not get away from. Wry and mirth, would have his worth.

But in the end, he had only taken his corpse.

From the chasm he took his might. On the piles of impaled benign. Every death and every single remaining body, as such as they'd be had, let alone what had remained of them, nothing could be brought back.

He was still there, in some way. A chain like coil, umbilical cords and made other worthless things, the faces of all, and his children along them as well as the ones that were worn. All of which were still connected, like a trough that had been dissected and would to be put inside. To breathe where he lay and where he'd stand to be, and deeper through his sided tumor-wrought. Largely encased; but most importantly no longer chained. Not to be to the very chime. Or to be put in blinded hope or be precise, he'd worn himself after only to rebuild. Would to be and ever-after, would to breathe, misunderstood.

This was what Mannofilthde's reign, of which the sum of every plain, all were there, in part, but dead. He would subdue each piece of antipathy for filth remained under his rule.

Wrought about and whence he stood. There had themselves lain and put through various hordes of remains, always but a food-hold of reanimation. Always grinning though they could not fathom themselves in wretch and ever, clear, as it were, the nation listened. Let alone obeyed.

Many children had become starved and were but soldiers, thought dead, as he would say.

'Release your lower bonds.'

Thence their trunks were left below, some of them but ruddy-snow. Everywhere around them fading, always but in trouble mending, whence the most important things, of little worth of, they stung within, but they failed in their attempts to rise. Instead, they fell apart, bones pushing through their heads and left to breathe out loud, the shroud of many filthy things, always poking through their eyes and whims. Would call them just as such, they would to be, and watch.

Out of their bodies, he took his time with hands unearned, to shape his way out of the way and watch the earth shatter in a worthless heap of restless sounder.

So many of them, and such a waste, be it so, just another pile upon disgrace.

His essence was of a pointless nature. Once it's been chewed upon and spat through what remained of the verdure, it appeared to be weak. It seemed likely that it would seethe and be forced ever so. Would to be in quite wrong, hopeless as everything poured, out the ceiling, making him part of it.

A graveyard of various plants, and little more would he search out of them, now.

Such dreams of destruction could not be put past him now. For everything he was fed upon would only wreathe and destroy what seemed to be toyed with and put to ground, messed with as they were to be, always thrown around, missing.

'I am the lord of guts.'

And his head was that, pushing through the ceiling until he could not help it so. Everything fell, but became part of him as they showed up. Out of nowhere, always in part, displeased and diseased, never to be set aside; but to run in there, and would to be out where. They could eat the scum-sides out of their necks, the mouths had come, yet to sides were wrought, and never ending. Some would but slice through little men of bile, which were melted and as well as they would seethe, they could not feel their legs any longer, as they would see it, for what it was. Nerves that were cut, and dead-throats about.

Eh, that was a scum. A plot of bloats, from whom they'd come from the insides of which, they could but barely hold themselves against heaps that moved, and ever so clear. It appeared that neither of them would little nor would they obey, not to pray with spittle after, there was little more left to convey. As it appeared, there, in part, but a half of badly damaged mind had come upon a good to know, a kindly wager that would rather be forgotten so; which bore a tail, of hardened wails. Many of the masses that pushed out of it as well seemed to follow in whichever direction its body pointed. For the head was barely broken yet it kept pressing on to words that did not belong to any language known to man.

'Listen and listen forth, go and walk on.'

He carved his way through the heaps and would not stop, not to be brought closer, and what happened at that, was but the first clue. Of little sinew left to blood and most of it thrown around, he called upon non-existent champions of lay, to guide him out, whence sky was gray and would to call. He was but made to feel as if his mind was on the run. Keep walking, he told him so, never to look back, what enter this body's sow, it heaped and thrashed forward, as to expanding. As flat and stretched as the curve and the belt from which planes would deviate out off. Always of a mind to eat, at the rims, of every corner he allowed him as much as he would bring in. Every tooth but curved and allowed, to cut and waste as much as it could, In turn, waited for, he was around.

Where there lay but a scoundrel, there was a plot. A botched-up face which melted and appeared to rot like chewing gum, having encompassed the rest of his body, drawn to filth, it asked as much.

'Where do you need me to be now?

I've done as you asked and brought disease when pushed about. I will not look for more no longer but know that I'm still dreading a second, stronger.

As you may just me, I'm missing something.'

'What is your need to be?'

'An arm, a plot of skin so I may wrap myself around and grow and multiple legs with puckers that shall create dead-men rows, from which the snow that form their bodies longer, upon the tips of their iceberg formation shall inherit the earth.'

Ah, but so much was settled, even so.

'You're not entirely alive, so why should I listen to you so?'

'I shall only curb the suffering as I can, only if you bring me here, where metal bends and seeps into the veins of actors.'

For he had fashioned but the veins of a stage, upon it, he had but considered to make, little masked men which bore his name and would play safely, around each bloated man. Of which negrous filth would only beseech him as to pray no longer on their kind. As he had leapt around from time to time, always deepening his teeth down their throats. Trying themselves, moreover so.

Days of glory often went like that, at the cost and the touch of a little brat's head which came off.

There was no better way to put it, on a wry smile and off surroundings, always drowned after a while, stopping for some time along the way, and least of all, would that convey what went through their heads.

It shouldn't have felt like that, being there. But as soon as he leaped over, he had not heard or listened to a word. All would pass him as he would but hear the worthlessness of what drew forth. He would not listen and would not cry. He would but become a beacon and would thrive into the pus that formed across the moving grown home he stood in now. There was no reason where he lay. There was none to stay his hand and would to be away. It was a time that passed, in little doubt between two hours that loomed around.

Here, there, there, he went. And whom raised from the ground was to stay his arms and lay, where others might breed inside and not to abide, would to be.

From the ocean-depths there was a tear, of which cracks but filled. Ribs of every thin concave cliff that entered through, unsatisfied by the little more than would to be, sinew. It would enter, it would dread, and there and then, again and again. Breeding as they pleased unsatisfied, they were inorganic but appeared to be pleased by their rise. A voice spoke to the walls, the echo stopped them. How beautiful, clocks and books of dust, she spoke with floors, the essence of a dreaded spat. Pants were thrown to be, washed spider who were drowned and not listened no.

Unpleasant as they were, but dread filled the weather, broken. All the nerves were white-transparent, grown in wind. Filled with most uncanny beads, which bore the umbrella-formed whip-infants, of which ends, were not spiked but would grow as heads; they would but cry, unfathomably so. Unable to find their mothers now, crying as they were trying to cut their throats. It was necessary to believe, there was a chance for at least a whip. To make it past the infantile, and whichever state waited after it. That would but last, be followed through. Agony would slow down everyone, for his gaze was thrown through.

Where was watched, but simply walked. Be it wall, of close hall. He entered but on a strange stage. There he met but the man of lost heads.

Henry could but not believe. Someone grabbed him by the wrist, then tore off a few tendons. Veins were but left in check. He knew how to erect himself where he could see as well.

‘What are these peaks I’m looking at?’

‘They’re the symbols of the lost, of whose but inner selves must’ve tore out through their skulls.

Do you fathom being one of them?’

‘Won’t I die?’

‘You’ll live as well.

As long as you’re but crippled, it should not matter.’

‘What do you want from me?’

‘A father.’

‘What do you mean?’

He had but taken Henry and threw him in through the door. Broken into the other room, a ball, the entire house was but stretched and distorted, sights were taken.

If I were; If I were inclined to think and throw him around, he’d see the way out, the exit unfold, and lead around like a pair of rails curved then pushed away, leading forth and drawing anywhere. It was up-heeded and understood, he walked upon flat heaps and walked on walls, as if he wouldn’t but know. He wasn’t of a show. The way ahead was death, for he should lay low. He hid.

He realized just then, he wanted to lost something, pushed away, gutted and thrown around, he had but missed his chance to make something of what went on. There were sounds which entered him from the side like a peculiar assault that took his heart off.

But, then he walked on a planet, in a small Crane, who was a house and held his hands to his side, and largely pinned out, a blank neutral expression on his face. Gut-deep in dirt, he was opened.

Manno Filthde lived inside his body for a while and many a day passed before, one day, Crane opened his mouth and smoke started coming out. Coal was used at too fast of a rate for there being any chance to be replaced. Ugly pictures, self portraits that would be considered abstract if they were seen by men, judged to be uncanny of destitute and most severely deformed by anyone’s standards if they shook but for a while. Unable to understand what pushed them around and what entered their while rot-surroundings, always but a fable in mind.

He made deformed creatures appear only to force them to bash their heads against every wall inside the house, until nothing was left of them but the necks connected then melted as if turned to cement. He looked outside on a shore of teal-whitish marble sand, upon a painted sea without a shore to be seen.

Dawn, at the horizon, where the sand became water as well, as there could not be seen. No life within his night, nothing else, on a whim.

But he made them there. But beings that could not be seen, then put on top, growth-inducing parasites which would become them encompassing, even to adhere to cannibalism eventually if allowed to grow without be stopped. It was brought to their attention that they would be allowed to continue doing so, never to be prevented or to show any kind of malign pity or chance to spare. There was but one thing stopping them. Dirt was there, in the sky instead of clouds, dirtied everything around. Small nets of junks appeared, everything appeared to have come to normal despite him having avoided this for so long. It could not be controlled by any means, as he was haunted by a past he did not talk of.

Nestor Wheel was made to follow. He appeared to have a mechanical cog-looking vehicle car that had replaced his head and would constantly spew out of his chest a bile that grew on top of any facet or surface touched, destroying any peace and quiet there was in his house those days. He didn't understand why, nor had he complained.

Manno Filde wore a mask. He basked around and cast. But whomever he disliked to be done and would to fare. Dead in wells and everywhere, split and cut and lost about, where they could never live about the hour, must they hasten.

He walks in woods, and would to prove nothing to anyone, as he was followed by servant, wide and tall, of trunk in the back, of which he say nothing at all. Here to seethe, and what they lay. They presented him with a goose-rat grass of speck. Many of the winds but grossed them out. In the distance, his house fell down. Ripped around the belly, Crane started weeping, trails which destroyed land, leading into round pot-like holes where his eyes were led to over and over again until he stared at the bottom of a groundless tar-head, the leper eating what he could until his insides were seen. From what he could tell, all connected, were dead, entrails fill with peculiar sharp sea-star foam-bubbles made out of elongated gourd-bottles of plastic that had been melted, then boiled inside his highly caustic stomach acid.

Inside his skin-belly, which looked not like a meaty wagon, but like his outside appearance, in his gut were but an inverted mirror of what he saw in the saw between the pupil-water; he bore pores and various meat-machines that would constantly head his innards just to make sure everything was properly digested, the chemicals elated until they were part of him, which only brought him ever close no. Only to feel what happened around, every now and then. He could not understand how he had gotten there.

‘Folly, folly, I see thee.’

Manno but was cruel and would only rip away what he pleased. Each was but appear, here and there and near. Where he pleased, they feared. Being abandoned, leer and sneer, like wild hounds or strong bonds wrapped around their throats as they would be allowed to starve until their time came on. There, they stay.

‘You seethe no longer, in this archaic troubadour. You might be sour to find out that neither of you should survive as I call upon you, yet the blind.’

He was hopeless in some way. Not to convey too much of an emotion, he but brought an anemone of wild barbed wires and all of the sudden, when met the strange men, but was strangled for breathe. Not by chance, he stay his hand.

Wild contraction, large as an illustration of a virus seen under the microscope, with many legs below, but with a trunk of a man pushing out from every raised plume and every towering thing that came out of it as well as every head that was attached to trunk, pushed out of a long pole that was eaten yet was connected like the Asiatic training dummies' 'arms', which interconnected themselves with kissing mouths that would lock their long-tongues into each other's cylindrical gut-tubes. The insides of which would be more like tubular cut-through bottles, that had little plump IV-wires leading to the giant bloated insides where they lived in, with the rest of their fat bodies, no limbs, stumps, all stacked against one another as they could not help it, unable to run. Which only brought the attention away from the inflated infected heads which were constantly dripping, faces of terminal patients made out of blue wax-like rotten olives colored by the sea-side; that only brining the strange peculiar arms that came out of the trunks, which were long as eels, but at their strange crests, they looked like the weird hair-cuts of heavy metal fans, wrapped within every cone but worm-like movements would draw from every side but even smaller parasitical clenches that would draw in the melted blue substance in order to grow.

At the end of the eel-like arms, there being actually fat-humanoid strange contraptions made out of small boards- but not the kind used for drafting, surfboards-like miniatures, whereas, every few centimeter bore a tube-connected small body-chamber on each side of it, from which there lay pits, from which sprouted acid-like scum, that fell and tainted the land as soon as it touched it.

Simple legs could be seen in the hundreds, the heads were inflated and kept the rotten-bite poles connected by the mouths, the body's weight redistributed amongst them, a chest from every side, arms that were mostly wrapped around the body, as they used the long arms, which may have resembled that of sepias, feelers, or anatomically-spread split-open cunts, on which the cylindrically attached chambers scum was applied and rubbed on the mass constantly as it attempted to coat itself for safety.

This was but a creature that had sworn itself to Manno Filther, as it would call itself Sinndemrr. On which he floated above, since it could not ride it. Closer had they approached the well-suited men who were just outside their office, being brought to face it, immediately they realized that this was but a fiend of evil thought, that would have them harmed and killed and yolked from living until they could not be suffered to make it through any longer.

'Be gone now, we'll have nothing to do with you!'

'I shall claim your guts, I shall to do it so, and you cannot stop me, no matter how far you set yourself into your hiding.'

But they hadn't listened to it.

Too many vials in his head, too much dread, never forget.

'I think I'm going to cut a part of your face and eat it.'

He was followed around by a malignant disease-bolt filth-endowed peculiar trim of a head that started floating around him like a star of fluorescence made out of tiny bacterium-formed mushroom-pores had molded themselves together until they had become an elongated deity that followed him as well. And it split in half and every half but paid tribute to it and would become a shout one day until it would die in the decay which filled the world with what it was like those days.

The essence which made people miserable, it called on them, as the pencil-pushers but dreaded to look away. Too many similarities between them and that kept them off from falling back to known ground, or to safety. It was pleasant, finding it out that way. That it wasn't them. It hadn't been them, despite the amount of lies they fed themselves with. There was never a better time to be out of it.

But I thought it must've been me. This essence further confirms that it I was not wrong after all. It couldn't have been me thinking all those things.

Twelve more hours, for the very least, he passed between them, of which uncanny thing shouldn't have mattered. After four more passed, there was the surgery-drill which had been placed on Ted Ross' throat appliance, eight collar-bones around his chest forming an armor, above it, spreading around until he had formed a coffin for himself. He was wearied out of years spent working on the field.

It switched. Four years ago, at the very least he had been walking on top of a single, tallest heights a man could ever grind upon during the lifting. The Sate' towers, formerly forgotten, split in half during the first initial fall, then put together, head in head bobbed, where he lived in a one of the walk-through bars near his right, near which there was a floor see-through he seemed to spare. They placed the little men and little women there, needing to check how many of them would fit. Never enough. There had to be more space, more to spare and at least a dome at the top which went on every side.

'Think you'll make it past the shift?'

'Don't know Mike, this doesn't look too well.'

During the lunch break both of them were staring down. It was a long drop, where the elderly were being put around the courtyard like inmates, chained around their chests, then waited for as every now and then a worker fell on top of them. It was for that reason they wore Gothic-shaped armor, with all the long horns and little spins, and little whips coming from their shoulders as well. Sworn upon by the sun, every fall caused by sweat running down their shoulders and outside. It was not the place to be.

That day in particular four men fell. The splatters could tell of what was planted in their chests. Traps with many springs but killed, as many elderly had become ill, but trapped. And hardened, shaped like harpies in attempts to set themselves to flight, no wonder why so many of them ended up there. Slightly more raised, but then again, poured through the most uncanny pockets where they stood and soothed, many lancers. It was their passiveness most disturbing, out of all they've done, they waited for the holes to be succumb by weight, then hidden away. Every single pit moved around, teeth grinded the chains, and then; leaped out of their chains to rebind the folk. That's how everyone was pleased.

Speaking of which, the time had to come cross the planks and watch upon the towering fence that surrounded the courtyard. A dame of junk waited him and grabbed the man. Ted could barely reject the sight as she but slipped an oil bag and bled upon every sight near hear. She would not be surrounded but always of an ear, to be certain; they feared what might happen if a heart might rose. Risen from inside of her, she froze in part, walked behind as she started shaking and cackling with the oil-fat. Spat on the side, outside the fence where a group of teens were dressed in garbage bags. One of their faces and half a shoulder got instantly crushed by the weight.

Some of them oil-refills managed to overcome most of the surface it bed. Near the width of which, two noticed.

‘It’s the fourth time this week, isn’t it?’

‘Suppose it isn’t and you merely dreamed of it?’

I’ve been here before you. I’ve been awake, day after day, hour by hour, this week and the other. And it’s the first time it happened, you’re a liar.’

‘How is it possible you’ve been here this entire time?’

‘Here, have this cassette if you don’t believe me.

I’ve recorded everything, in real time.’

After a quick rush on the street, round the corner, to his office, he put it on and fast-forwarded through it. Damn bastard was right, he was onto him, he knew it, he noticed, he was being too obvious there, shouldn’t have asked it. Pull it out, rip it to shreds. Then go away, then walk about for twenty minutes, not to look too different, forget it.

Sweaty from a run, but too sweaty, he knew what happened, it was about in his sight. He was there, he had truly been there at all time. Worst of all, it could be seen in his eye. Somehow the cassette, the other one, the next entry was split, in ninety-five distinct cut-pieces and only two of them were in his eyes, the others were just about the place, and worst of all. He hadn’t said it. During one of the late hours in the night, when he wasn’t watched, when he was exposed to that peculiarity named privacy, he blinked. But it was no normal blink, it was a bunch shot which spread about the scene, only to having every possible angle stored in his mind. If one were to look, closer. Tiny strings coming out of it, attached as if he was controlling them like tiny marionettes, trying to record even now. They were jerky, like organisms, or little tapeworms that ended up there. Somehow, he knew of them, they were in his brain as well.

That’s how he knew I was a liar, that’s how he found out. And now he knows as well as I do, since they’re inside.

Twenty leaps around the fence, the workers had no fear whatsoever, it was something put in the drink, they put acid in there, and cutout words from various magazines that were specifically chosen in order to indoctrinate them. As men were not what they ate, but the words they absorbed. The way to their minds, through their guts; and that was not a man that was gutless. He looked at Ted.

Ted stopped messing around. Yearning to get through. Not to touch her yet, junk-lady on the trough. Thrown around and put in the pile. Kept on the floor with the other junk ladies which were no more up to work than they were after twelve hours spent on the spot, recalibrating tiny bullet-bolts and tiny bot-heads that were working inside the short-circuit embed in the belts.

Playing with a ball of spikes, drinking from their fingers when no one was watching, during time-offs they were knotting little pebble-cotton, making throat-flies which ran about, bloodying the sky with a purple-rose green speck of touches. There and there and there and anywhere, they were trying to catch each other's backs from falling, sometimes they were unable to make the difference between thralls and normal men. Those whom cared for this were but taking out the ceiling, wrapping themselves in, but then, there was this. Fingers cross, men at peace. A small blunt drill elevated the general surface of the floor. The screws were long, twenty feet, rolled through, managing to draw the floor away, making it bounce on the spot before it became but the most uncanny drafting touching plowing striker. Ambient music could be heard. It stopped beating once they found out the man whom had been buried inside the floor, once it moved on, finally they could see a layer of him and others, put together and more. Less cement and more of them, all alive, looking both down and upwardly, one eye dark, then the other down, fear of heights emerged just then. And they were bled immediately as they were called back.

'Ted, come here a moment and pick up a drill.'

Taken a drink from the wood-pile, then a drill stood by the side; it was the wrong organ pushing him around and trying him. Always of a mind, he would remember the man off the streets, especially now. Since they were made to drill down, since they could not look in any other way, around, they but settled with this.

Off the street a few men were killed then allowed to feel pain. They didn't manage to matter since they were lost as well. Words faded on most people who didn't know what they were talking about. And there was the shroud of a few clouds which were taken off them. Again with the drilling noise, it was heinous, an affront to humanity. Ears, eaten on the ceiling, turned around rotated Eiffel-tower structures. Four on every side, then four of them forming a single square which surrounded them, an even wider extension as the two buildings united.

They were of no mind to understand what was going on.

One of the Junk-ladies drew near the planks, seeing how this was the perfect moment to snick about. And leave it so, she looked down. There was a man down there. Their faces were but around the fence.

'I think she has something for you.'

'What do you think it is?'

Recorder looked at him with a weird expression. He did not understand.

'You should go ahead and ask her then. I'll cover up for you.'

'We won't work at the same firm.'

'That's because I was fired recently. The company was not doing well, too many wastes, too many articles fading away. But the stocks, that was the final blow.'

I was one of the stock brokers, can't you see? I was in charge with everything. I made the highest bids, I had a knack of premonition and what did they do to me then?

Thrown off the side at the first bid, bankruptcy and all fell onto me. I am the man of ruin, I'm the one now on the streets, I'm a beggar, I'm a vagrant, barely any work experience left. No one wants to hire the man whom lost Co. and Co. likely a quarter of two hundred billion dollars. I have no work in this town. I have no work in any town. I'm laughed at, I'm barred from hotdog stands even. It's me against the world but I don't want to it to be so. A rapist, a murderer, a child-molester, a thief, a terrorist, a deserter who committed an act of high treason, that's what they're treating me as.

No amount of dough would do them for this, I spat on them and they slapped me back, then they threw me in dirt and now I have no house. I'm sitting all day recording, that's what they do to you. The lowest of the low; I spent all day recording everything so I could afford some food to live. But I have to pay the trash; yet not even the trash would sell it to me. Even the druggies were spoken to, even they seem to avoid me.'

'Could it be the fact that you have a camera in your eyes?'

And he was silent then. There was no response for this little man. He didn't exactly know how to respond or what to say after. It was.

'I think she likes me.'

'Go talk to her then.'

'Isn't it dangerous?'

'Only if you make it so, but look at the fence and you'll understand. The fence is well, not to be touched, it's dirty. You should clean it.'

'Why should I do that?'

'Because that fence is but a floor in another floor, and it's always dirty. One day I saw a weird skull-tadpole walking on it, which disappeared.

And I heard someone telling it to clean the fence.

Indeed, it was walking on it, but I can't prove it any longer since my recordings don't actually go that far.'

'Then what's the fix?'

'Forget about it, maybe pick up a mop or something and clean it yourself.'

'No, not that, but her; how do I approach her?'

'I don't know how to talk to women; that's why I mainly record them. It's far simpler to intrude in their privates than to, you know.'

And they understood, nodded.

Many men inside the office building, everyone busy, buddy-body, that was the disposition. Everyone was nice to the good-looking ones. Wrapped around their arms, they were drinking willows, bones, titties-and molasses, cups wrapped around the mixture, cut and put together on cue. Red-targets put on hand. As it happened, there was always somewhere there. During the hard shift, they went through the files.

‘Horn-Joes’, died in a car accident. Family was present there, waiting near the streets, accomplices found half way down Delaware, during a time the consent age was seven. Tried for, covered up for something they were unlikely to talk about. They went in details, there as photos.’

‘Of the kid?’

‘Of every kid that was involved into it; at the very least there were eight of them.’

Large things, swollen hands, pinned against the ground. Mules were put behind them. It was how they got around. Always a pig making the distance; rubbing her face in near old Toe, trying to get a word in before I stopped her.

‘Think you could give us a moment, please?’

‘I don’t know what may do. It’s my day off.’

‘Then why are you here?’

‘You tell me, handsome.’

Toe shouldn’t have joined in, she was slurping a huge-sized Slurp-Slurp Milkshake before she took another bite off her eighteen inches, french-fry filled round-fat donut head, bacon wrapped, mildly well-done stake surroundings. Cheese grazed on top, mayo bubbles, chicken splices. She had a gas canister filled with them. She was drooling over Toe who was two feet over her at the very least. Motion machine still going.

‘Keep reading, I don’t think she’s listening.’

‘I am, go on already, I want to be part of the action.’

‘It’s already done, isn’t it?’

‘Only after I’m done with it.’

Whereas Ben went on, never found them, the photos were taken by an alleged figure that was not seen, unidentified, no ID, no clue, no personal history shared with the other accomplices, just someone who came along and seemed to have, disappeared, or come out of his mind, whenever that seemed to be.

Other excerpt from the file.

The intercom stopped. She was supposed to be here by the hour, first one passing through, second time they didn’t listen to her go through.

‘We’ll listen to the recording again.’

Inside her neck.

‘I was supposed to meet Alicia, at noon.

By Payton, in the, in the; you know what?

Let me start again.

Alicia, we were supposed to meet in Pocket Yonder.’

‘Where would that be?’

‘Near, the old wing inside Hales’ Elementary school, she was supposed to deliver a small barrel filled with pliant wood near the cafeteria and put some of the crackers inside the dead-meat sector, where they’ve read.’

‘Word by road.’

‘Going around the valley, Street seven.

Need to look for a man. Street seventeen.

Call him what’s he after? Street one.’

‘Who’s he ran with?’

‘One of the boys, I think, fourth grade.’

‘When was the last time you saw him?’

‘Off the wedding night.’

When was the hour? He didn’t speak. They have her sedative water and waited for her to say something. This time around there wasn’t anything going through her mind.

‘Check Hales.’

All around it, missing doors, abandoned before they even came, falling over, openly exposed. As well as it was expostulated with grains.

‘Think they allow quarters in?’

‘Try it.’

Small soda machine, plain to see, they were putting fake coins in it, not working. Then the dimes, then a few punches but a single kick did it.

Tremble and see, trampled, over they had been there and walked as were they over, on the way out, they had been killed with every little other child inside the classroom. With every man in doubt by the dawn of a sunrise when it had happened; then church bells ringing when the time approached for the first of days, the abandoned chapel called upon them. In that moment, of which arborous clue that may have stood to them was but a single stump. They relented as not to understand what had happened and how did their hands reach the likes of the children before their time was come upon.

The case only worsened by the time and everyone who was involved, initially, within the grasps of the investigation seemed to have disappeared without a while.

‘There’s something more to it, this has to be, but I cannot point it just yet.’

‘Who’s the man that made it past the hall?’

‘Shut up, both of you, I need to concentrate.’

‘On what now? The case is shut.’

‘But not the thing that did it.’

‘He’s a culprit, a man, not a thing, don’t be ridiculous now, man.’

‘But I have to, I need to, I know there’s something there.’

To it, they spoke in file. With every page, and everything set on something, during the initial interview whom the lady had but them in mind.

She spoke of an initiation.

‘What happened to the parents?’

‘They were killed, distracted, the dead meat appeared to pile, right in there, in the cafeteria. Someone brought them in after they were butchered.’

‘And the accomplices?’

‘They shared the same fate, all in the same place.’

‘Then.’

Broke the man, responsible for the lady next to him whom had indulged herself into the peculiar meat donut, said.

‘You should go and check it out for yourself.’

‘I shall do no such thing, do you not realize how dangerous that would be?’

‘What do you stand to lose?’

It’s not that far in any case.’

Only half their state away. Through a plain to see long stand between them and a little barrier made out of x-standing men which were placed upon wooden stands in the middle of the desert, killed. They waited there and were but pinned. Incapable of breathing, but alive, mask-tubes entering their lungs. And the more they neared them, the more they started realizing that their faces were peeled off, right below their chests they spoke. About the hour.

‘You’re not wanted past the line.’

‘But we must inquire of what happened there, past it.’

Said the young-officer clerk, with the Donut-lady and the Burly-man next to him; there, Clerk but stood and sparked, but a cigarette after a mark. He drank from a pouch.

‘Is this ok?’

‘Yes, Donut, you’re doing fine.’

She had just drank an entire glass milk-bottle which had water in it, with a hint of cleaning detergent Clerk managed to snick in, and mercury, rat poison and little molecules of blood-aids, which had little nails particles which were attached to the cells, once injected they would bury inside her throat and stomach, finding their way into her bloodstream as well as her central nervous system, eventually shutting it down. He’s pissed in it as well and put a bullet in it, and a knife. She didn’t seem to notice either of them because of her near-sightedness, her fingers being wider than the bottle-cap.

They would not relent from their pursuit. It only had to be that past them, the land shook. And there, in the midst of day, when dark was out of the way, like a rushing train they could see the figure, like an ever-stretched mask, a Greek tragedy made out of many parts, with the winds of a storm behind it, bearing in its mouth, like many baboons hanging lynched were brought. And spat on the side some teeth, all turned from inside out until to weep one could see the body-formed roots pushed in gums. Struggling as in cocoons, this their heads split open where their brains had become the horn, with which it devoured the fully grown humanoid tumor-king of which eyes blackened, he appeared to have just one feature, which was the pair that struggled between the throat, and there, emerged from inside its body a great many a piece compressed to a sparring sword, arms that whipped every man trapped inside, the gums of the beast being what defiled the land, to make it so every x in sight would crumble and fall.

For in the great tragic creature that came, there lay but eyes such as the likes of which conveyed to pieces, stark but draught, little fish-like antlers pushed out, blocks of puffs and pouches that were set in flight, all left this falling beasts which suddenly receded in the ground. Only to have its rib-cage open, a case which opened and split the lower side of its mouth; around it the valley of sand destroyed as the only way they could get through was only through the hole inside its plain hole which was the throat, and gut, largely aligned.

Donut had almost fainted at the sight, while Burly had but pulled out a gun he carried on him. Emptying it inside the creature, several times, though it had already stopped before reaching the people crossed. The weather was awful as well, all of the sudden, clouds were spread and there were trees shattered everywhere around, like a dress that’s been stomped on by a child with little boots that were worn inside the house after a rainy day because he’d forgotten to take them out, not out of the house, but inside of the house while not being taken off.

Simply said, he took off his gloves and finally chose to do it so.

Clerk but took a hookah out of the car’s trunk and a trench coat and followed through.

‘I think that’s where’s we’re supposed to be.’

‘You think so?’

‘That’s the only way towards the school district when the parents disappeared and were brought to, where the child was kidnapped out of, where there’s fear, in my eyes. Where’s there still hope that this case might come to be finally put to rest.’

‘You realize it’s dangerous, right?’

‘So be it then.’

The three of them made their way through. Upon the hour, they were driven and had arrived through the skull. It was open and panned back, but the insides were that of a school nonetheless to be had. They were pinned down, ready to ask and throw around whichever was the need. And they had blocked each shroud and each question down, until they were taken through.

Listened by the Porter whom came around, bearing a little army knife that was curved like a disk, holding it on the rims of the edge, pointing at his own chest until he could not face it any longer.

He looked at them carefully, examining their wild approach, making sure they realized where they were and of the cotton-broach walls, as thin as linen between each classroom that stood as well as rose. He asked for their ID’s with old broken ghoulis hands. The eyes within his skull were but deep sunken and deeply red, leading to small globules of bubbles black, within brokenly concave irises that pushed around, caught in wild mazes, before they wept and moved around. He was the dead-man standing in a barn, asking them to move on.

‘Careful, the parents are not to interact with either of the children during their stay in the premise.’

‘We understand that; you shouldn’t have said in any way. It was kind of obvious and on the eye.’

The Porter but shrugged at her and went out of his way to close the gate. Strange how that giant executioner figure was put in charge over this place; but then again, no one else could take such a thing all by himself, especially, as one would judge, all was broken from inside out. From the looks of it, this was just as hard to know as anything else in here. Broken floors, curved ceilings and wars that were wrought to have fit inside the beast they entered, up the front. Side to side they stood and listened to the children laugh during times one shouldn’t.

‘I didn’t realize there are still children that are alive in here.’

‘This doesn’t change a thing, surprised that it’s abandoned?’

‘Of course not, I don’t, you know. I didn’t think it was possible.’

Burl was just as caught off guard as he was, incapable of thinking of a way through, this was just as accepted as anything else in the matter, for the time being.

A few children had cut them off, by a few years at the very least.

Morn Jones, Bethany Princeton, Charles Dent, Ross McHugh were but a group who’ve made it in before the cutting of the hour was set.

They were walking around with a flashlight shared between the four of them.

It had come to their attention that they were not alone.

They had simply disagreed with living.

A lot of the children who lived inside the class-room desks; they were not breathing properly, and never left their home from that point on. Even though mold had entered their heads, there was enough room for one more. But whom of the other children could make a good fit?

‘Little Tristan, will you please get out of the desk?

You need to stop hiding.'It was important for him that he did not forget where he came from. His mother had been a monster in very sense of the word. She killed herself as soon as he was born, out of spite because, upon having realized that she wasn't human, as most of the creatures of their kind are, she could not fathom living a second more, having pulled her child's umbilical cord, which she shoved even deeper inside his mouth until she choked on it, violently so as she began spewing high amounts of acidic blood upon which she could not help herself but start pushing tiny pins inside her mouth, since she had eaten a lot of iron, while her husband started charging the woman with a shaving razor blade before they decided that this was not the way she should react to the dire news she had been given. Therefore, she settled with talking things over a smoke. They were outside.

The place was not nice.

She was painted in a peculiar flammable suit, which appeared to form large eye-blockers with every brush stroke. They put hammers as well, inside her jaw, then took away her legs, as she only levitated inside the walls, but not every wall. Her husband's wall, who grew an elongated, sink shaped body arm at the back of his throat which touched the walls in which the frame of his wife swam or flew inside of, making a mold that overlapped it as if it were in a different broken universe where she lived in.

The walls being placed everywhere around her, in that peculiar place she was in. It was a maze, a place of walls, a peculiar lay of twists that couldn't be comprehended or even sketched because of the abstract way in which it was all illustrated in. But at the same time it all made sense once all removed all the texture off the carpets and off everything else that's been placed there since they could finally see, as it would be revealed that there was nothing hidden there. Nothing placed.

She was ripped apart. And she had a spear in her eye, then another one followed, constantly hurting her. It was delightful.

Her husband was afraid of women and it had gotten worse. Having carried a giant back elongated protrusion of skin which had completely encompassed a giant room-shaped mass where the shape of a woman's face would always make it seem as if she was trapped inside of it, constantly suffocating didn't help his cause at all. Having become an outcast, he simply carved a black gut-hole beneath his ribs where he carried his child like a kangaroo, resolving to live as he could. It's been a strange childhood for him, having walked in this peculiar neighbor who was the streets, his arms were the right and the left lane, his head was the high-way, his legs split as to make the right around the corner and the mid-way curve to the long bridge in the opposite direction. While the cars were all painted in flat colors, with various peculiarly airbrushed shading; people lived in cars. But not as one would expect them to. Since they were split, one head here, an arm here, a torso in another car, not even in the same one. And they usually ended up with no more than three heads in one of the enclosed cars. It was pure agony. Especially when the hot sun was us; it felt like they were dogs or children made to wait for their parent-masters to return from groceries shopping. Pure agony in a metal box of death, parents never learn.

Some of them suffered, but endured, the cars were never driven out of their parking lots or the places they were put in. And it was all dirty. SO were the gods they suffered to live inside of. For they were all shape shifting beings that allowed their servants to endure and feel agony for their peculiar celestial game. And they put forks and screwdrivers in their heads. And they were put inside planet-planes that were the shapes of buildings. Dead-heaps of rotten corpses were puked out, constantly. Young people spat on the ground and swore all the time. They segregated themselves from the other ones. There were atomic bombs dropped and there was nothing they desired more than to be as far away from the place as they could be.

That's when the family moved to the country.

Now there wasn't a lot of folk down there, at least not the kind of folk people would expect to see or meet, but they did it nonetheless.

When they first arrived on the side, they were but greeted by three wells that appeared in the middle of the road. Of course they hadn't driven a wall, and of course the child was blind, and of course the wife wasn't even technically alive, as she still struggled in that box but Hugh was still bent on making this a success. His eyes wore tubes inside of them which were attached to his guts. That's how he fed his brain. The kid's brain wore mouths. He didn't have limbs either. He was constantly hit in the head by Hugh's piercing ribs but he never got the time of day. He never got the chance to complain.

IT was nice looking at the wells. One of them lifted itself from the ground, as it began gloating over him.

'Look at my great size, do you admire my great size? Am I not endless in my appearance? Am I not grand?

I can house but millions of liters inside of me.'

Then, it was joined by the other well, well enough. Soon enough they were driven off by a giant bird before they even had the chance to say something else. And only a few meters away from where he stood a giant large trough-shaped hidden door opened from beneath the road, where, all of the sudden he entered a military base-like secret spot, which had been placed in the insides of a broken skull, that had been structured like a most peculiar ant hill that all of the sudden brought him back to life, once he realized that he wasn't beneath the earth but he had been in the air all the time. Yet, this was a pseudo-world created on top of a few clouds and looked like a giant rectangular fish-bowl these people lived in. Although it didn't fly, it bore some peculiar net-like stretched formations that were attached to the moon, which was stuck in one place and never moved from its initial location, as this floating structure was keeping it in place.

And the giant creature through which the two men and the Donut lady went into seemed to have been placed in the air as well, including the city they lived in. The whole area being somewhat as widely stretched as the entire stretch that's lain across the states.

Beneath them, the world looked destroyed, and life developed in various floating buildings that had been launched once life had degraded on earth, yet, it was peculiarly crafted in some sort of illusion as if to make it seem like everyone was made out of one piece and nothing had happened, while life had been the same as it's ever been. Although every creature and every man had been put together only by the alignment of a set of eyes that look at this optical illusion from an angle, everything being split across so many things, it was senseless yet it worked. No one could fall in-between the cracks, as they seemed to appeared on the other side of every possible object out there, without ever being approached for some reason since they couldn't see it.

'Identify yourself?'

'And if I don't want to.'

'Then I'll I have to shoot you.'

'But you're just a young boy.'

'So what? I was put in charge here.'

Hugh simply snapped the boy's neck.

The door opened soon after.

'You've passed the test.'

'Was there a test to begin with?'

'No.'

Then another door opened.

It was peculiar, living, constantly, in this deformed reality.

Manno Filde was but there, waiting for Hugh, he had opened a gut and stretched it across the room, although it looked infested and peculiarly disturbing to look at, he had made it as so he would please and draw away the man by the curves of his throat, and put him where he'd tease the little thing.

'Son, I think you'll make one great servant once you grow.'

'Why do you say that?'

'Because I have done something.'

And he had done it rightly as well. He beheaded his father, then sealed the wound. Seeing how his body was already put in place, the body was forced to mold and hybridize himself with the Hugh, growing forth like a limbless long-stretch that ate from the ground what it could instead of acting like a human being.

'Why am I forced to live this way?'

‘Because I want to and because it bring me pleasure. Now you shall continue doing as I please or I shall make you suffer.’

What a tease that had been. His armor hardened, he grew a shell, his mother was trapped forever after, as she woke up one day. No longer being allowed flight into the walls of that peculiar dimension; instead she stared at him, the god she was forced to worship.

But one intruded.

Such was the chance, they were put near an area where ever pulp around them was but a school-boy which made for a peculiar thing in sight. Most of the objects were set that way. They were not to be touched for too long, then out with them. Then back in, out with them, then back in. Children bled in dark basins that were raised from the ground. They formed peculiar scepters and wild gravitational wave-alterations satellite-shaped growths that came from inside their heads and messed around with everything within their reach.

Alas, he had but stepped in. As if from a slit, a man no less, or some disease that merely put itself in such a shape; greetings it would say, but nothing else no matter, to no less convey.

This Riis was peculiar, it appeared out of nowhere and matched, of course it could not in part, and these were not the kinds of things this creature was accustomed to. Yet the body was split and out of it, the creature stood. It wreathed itself, as well as it would. And it was nothing more other than some deformed bile, an oozing thing which had been defiled, green and red and orange, ochre, beige, a mix of dark colors, decay-bubbles as well as the bones of a peculiarly deformed men, as one could see it wreathing in and out. But the skull, that was that one would have to see, two jaws, one normal, one below as from a sack of green-bile meat, harder than the other ones, it called that the sack of bones. It was a creature which was mundane, yet, two arm-thin rods, segmented in two halves, which looked as if they were muscle tendons, covered in some peculiar white meat, or a pale imitation of bone came out of its sockets, cleanly pushing through, no bile could be seen through them. This peculiar deformation formed a strange crystal-kite tri dimensional hardened-bile crystal, which protected that very thing.

It moved them like peculiar Italians or Semite merchant hands, too fast, indistinguishable from any kind of peculiar interpretations one could deal without, but this would do.

He had no asked why he was here, but this Riis appeared to do nothing less than accompany him as he found nothing more but mildew interest of showing him around.

‘A connoisseur I presume; do you think we could perhaps begin the preparations then?’

The creature only did what it could, adhering to the strange motions that were but morbidly enabled by its peculiar movements. Most importantly, it spat guts out of them since they were hollow on the inside and acted in the same way one could expect them to. First it had to become an endearing thing, a habit, then one could chop his head off and become gone.

The classroom is where both of them entered the split-back open bodies of two killed children.

From their point of view, this was but mundane, wildly so.

‘Miss Jane, do you have something to share with the rest of the class?’

‘Ma’am, if I may.’

The young woman stepped towards Jane.

She had but a bottle of bone cartilage inside her veins. Slowly it began adrift until it encased her heart within the minute. Peculiar stance of child, it seemed, she sneered at everyone like a country animal with a wild leather vest to her name and little more than a strong nostril being flung about the place. She was mightily eerie and appeared to give nothing to spare. A prude, such akin to a youthful looking nymph hers was but a single thought of what she might do to her after class, something to be taken after and beyond the grave, when one could not even be inclined to listen to them.

Regarding the man with the camera

He was peculiar, in any case. A case that may not be easily dismissed as to understand why the lady of filthy grit that was melting constantly seemed to give him, even the slightest pints of attention from the looks of it, her tall palace being a given, every now and then a snicker to the man. While the other one was alone, he noticed her, tendency, of being thrown around. No one like that, no one at all; strangely as it were, one should not forget that there was, by any means nothing as filthy and gritty like the spindle and the chime, those things that were forced down the throats of the little children that were set in flight, the warped wasps, with their deformations, they were giant now in the sky. Molded together, holding hands; from their wasp-like abdomen, from their umbilical cords filled with the most unnatural amount of honey they finally came to pour not that, but the most gritty of clouds-skinned markers which painted every building in sight. Their heads fell off and just as soon, the grittiest of creatures swooned in only to see. Men came out up to their chests from inside those giant bodies, but stopped at their waist, only to have revealed themselves hidden no longer. Each wasp-child bore eighteen of them, pulling back a mass that looked likely as for them to have worn large dressed of skin that went all the way back where they formed their predecessors and the ones that would inherit the world from them. It then that every was made to be perfect, with the sky altered, and the sight finally protruding, with the buildings adjusted and finally rotating and moving around, there would no longer be a reason to wait and spread around.

‘Tharthagan, Tharthagan.’

A man yelled in his most queer form. He had both molded himself, a king, a knight a knave with most uncanny things attached to the trims of his darkened armor. He was mighty and stopped upon the parlor where the construction took past, upon opening the metal frames, as to create an entry door for himself, no more was he in waiting. Many men and women, old and death awaiting had but called him there. He was but a suited thing, an armor of some kind, yet that was his exposed body, a peculiar thing which only seemed to open in the back. A set of wings but a pair, one that was pushed out of a meat-block of meat-soil which flied around him, but not with him. He had but looked at it upon the closure of his exposed door.

The root-wings sprouted out, creating a feathered bush that formed just in time before the sudden barbed-wire explosion could finally draw in full force.

As soon as it happened, the nearest group of oldies but crouched, covering the back of their throats, with their wrists and chains, as the after wire sharpened but bounced around avoiding them just as soon as it died off.

‘That was a near one, who are you?’

‘I’m Tart-gun.’

‘Why do they call you that?’

He pulled out a revolver, he was a sharpshooter, unrelated to the name. Quick pop, pop, pop and just as soon their hand-cuffs were blown off, scattering like little plain things, or piano keys that were blown out of their piano-things. The few oldies got away just as soon as they were allowed to, out of sight before the few creeping men stopped in and stole them.

‘Thank you Tar-gun, now we can harvest their organs.’

‘You’re welcome.’

But he didn’t shoot the rest of them since he was there for a whole ‘nother reason. He was but making his way through the frame. It was dangerous especially since he didn’t have the proper protection, the helmet wasn’t there. His eyes were metallic and wrapped around from his shoulder-metal strings and he could only see through his armor.

‘I thought I’d hear something going on.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘Hey, stop, you can’t grab the drills.’

Every construction worker appeared out of nowhere, threatening Tart-gun with their drills. He was to be killed on sight, he was to be put down and made to be completely rusted and filled with little iron-things until his gut exploded.’

Then the hour, it struck again and he was but walking with the gait, and the men in the sky which came out of the wasp-babies opened their mouth only to produce little space like soap-bubble maker, fashioning them with their mouths, where little soap-comet molecules met with cloud-like gas from inside their guts, drawing in the middle until they began fashioning shapes from the other world, with the problem being put forward as they were incontrollable any longer, as they were unnaturally scolded and put in some peculiar-frozen stasis from which not only could they not move but their mere, dimensional actions appeared to reflect upon the entire world itself. As if there were multiple overlapping universes, where this limb-anomaly, without fingers, without a palm but a sharp scorpion-like tail, began flailing about the place in another dimension, the mere brute force as well as the motions it produced began creating inter-dimensional quakes that shook the world entirely, without anyone noticing it, at a quantum-like level. As in, the entire world was static for a fraction of a millisecond, creating a stronger quake across the galaxy and the universe itself, where the static-limb was, moving everything slightly to the left as if to readjust everything. This appearing as if nothing happened, as in, no one would know it happened by any means, unless some scientists were somehow capable of measure the entire universe, which, was for the time being impossible to do or to achieve, by normal means since they could only work within their limitations. Yet this soap-steam gas bubble the men created eventually popped out of existence, as it so happened for them to take the full blunt of the strength that was being forced onto them. And within the limbs, the meat would finally be brought onto, creating an empty dark-gritty fantastical dust-corner where every dimensional limb was drawn into from wherever they passed, creating a great cluster of limbs, a mass that would stand there forever, no longer moving the universe at all, as they were trapped in a dimension of their own. Which lead to the point of the people who were inside the wasp-children to stop, seeing how after a while they were creating empty bubbles that just popped, instead they started creating large tubular balloon-like gut animals from their many pool-like insides that started floating in the same spot, forcing themselves, by mere rubbing motions as to completely set themselves on fire, being as short lived as their first attempts. Angered by what was going on, they only started creating large floating tooth-gum bile-things, after they violently pulled them out of their mouths. These formations had not only grown as to make weird red-meaty flesh buds that wore great tooth-crowns that appeared to grown on air like wild stone-like formations, yet they offered a great deal of protection to the flesh-gums. Joined together into dance, they fancied themselves as not only great creators, but they also managed to somehow think themselves capable of creating something that would last. A pseudo-jaw which would grasp and try reeling into anything it could until it no longer helped itself, drawing from its surroundings, most unnatural of weirdly benign invisible plain sulked. They stopped out of nowhere. The sky was off, it was night. The mourners were on top the teeth and were but using them as seats. Long, elongated legs reached the ground, as well as their arms, these almost rope-thin creatures but would only weep inside. Feeding on the mass of bone-charnel until their features became more-stationary. From their side, it looked like an empty world, with nothing in, only the flatness that was barely dim, everything sparse in the distance, while the other mourners but wept, incapable of figuring what went inside them and whom to hear them, while they were dead. Dreadfully strung and left about to rot, their sounds would never be heard no longer.

‘Let me climb, I can see that you have found something to hold on. Allow me to stand brother.’

But the thin creature but pushed him away, no longer capable of letting him stand so, never pushing yet away. Never standing for itself or the brothers whom had claimed him. It was all too dreadful, to have been taken away by force, but neither one complained no longer and much and much and much too worse, it had been.

They smiled, most cruel of things, they smile. Mournful creatures ashen-gray, looking forward, to their pray. They spat on the ground and found the most unnatural of mounds which rose in the distance, one was built. From it stood but a canker-growth which formed a large hook. From a pile of human-roses also came a great cylinder, which was but entered by the hook to please her. The mother of the mourners laughed. As this trunk was but impaled in a strange peculiar act. With each strike it but settled with, and would to heap, push deeper in, then draw away, repeat the motions only to convey.

‘Most pleasing Matron mother, you need to listen to us so.’

Patron-master

One who swam in the filth-entrails of the enclaves, in the forest which he but opened the peculiar hilted bladed armor, the peculiar frog-like dancer had but came out of the metal cast, from the armored being, he had left at last. Again in stance, like anything that would force him to remind them, of his peculiar way in which he moved at last.

Lust was nowhere to be seen, as dreadful as one could feel upon such wildly deformed face. This rotten thing but stretched and would eat away until it could no longer be forced back. Teethy-grates but chewing when it shouldn't; but never leaving the forest where it spoke to the dark spirits, rooting but a bark; seething at the mark in wood, knowing it should be aware of the barriers and the claspers that would do. The dark armies still marched around, darker in the sky. The most peculiar creature followed one, then made to way, falling through the flights of wooden pairs, and through the briars, where he had finally come to meet one at last.

Amorphous-Tooth was but shook. He had no arms but large legs that looked like squares, connected to the point from where they sprouted, bearing four segments which were hurt and acted. Upon the sight, one would see but a grave benign head, like the inflated carcass of a rhinoceros' head, open mouthed as if it ate a small barely featured humanoid face with only a mouth and two eyes that were shaped like stringed together circles, metal-springs sizzlers like the ones attached to a knife that could be launched from inside the hilt like a bullet shot out of a gun; junkyard-things emerging out of the sockets which was molded with the main head. Or rather, the springs found inside a mattress, yet drawn to a single black point as to form some pseudo black eyes.

Back formations of another head cylinder that moved constantly from one end to another, all along a rail-open spine, but which never touched the legs, which were bloated and fat, like hoses, barely able to keep themselves that way, from falling.

All of the sudden they snapped underneath the weight, like they would always do, pushing out from every side as it would trash around the place, uncannily so, yet blind.

In the classroom B-section

There was no reason to be there, since miss Jane was already taken by the hour. The girl was simply out of her mind, intruding that way, when they didn't even, the class was. And she were.'

'That's enough Doris, you don't need to make a fuss out of it.'

Out of the shadows they begun

And they couldn't help themselves for long, since as soon as they got their claws and their talons out of the great green-pus mass that started encompassing them, the vale-like sea that pushed in began drawing in and out until it could no longer be contained. Dark-malignant beings started pushing out of their guts, being incapable of controlling themselves, having eaten half of their lord's remains. Many of whom remained in the land, as their carcasses got chained on the ground and made to waste in the most peculiar unnatural pools that could be contorted there. But here, lo the Mount arrived and it spoke of evil tides and of perilous tales, for what else could it do in such an evil time, when the monsters but tore each other apart and could not control themselves as they but formed the buildings after, from their insides and out of their corpses until they could no longer be control. A most unnatural thing appeared, with two heads nears, each of the reddened tars puddles which began sprouting after some long bridge-platform upon which unnatural things stood, chattering about each day until a man appeared out of nowhere, dressed in a pink-blue suit with many scrawls drawn upon him and a black-painted face with little golden globes inside his forehead which disappeared as soon as he had entered the perimeter of the platform, bleeding out of his exposed head as if someone had used a corkscrew in order to perform a few lobotomies the wrong way, yet his blood was but a malign thing which wasn't red but was a peculiar rubbery torsion which started spilling on his face, pouring in his mouth, as it slowly marched along, as molecularly it was actually made out of billions upon billions upon billions of microscope-sized, as in the tool, yet flattened until they were as small as millimeters yet deformed stretched in the back sheets of yellowish organic matter, or wraps that managed to crawl around his brain and every organ, muscle tissue, bone-formation, cartilage and wherever else they could stretch until they finally got out of his body, forming peculiar cellulose fat-burning bands that appeared to have chained themselves to a giant meat pole in the back from which he but prevented himself from falling through since this bridge platform was inclined, having fallen into a peculiar puddle-like pool towards which he slowly descended towards. Mid-way through it he became weary of what might stumble upon him, as various torsions began pushing and drawing out of the outer reached appearing like peculiar flying things that didn't look like they were capable of flying. As they were but fat, gluttonously so, shaped like a giant leg that was bloated yet pointed a giant boot downwardly, and instead of being connected to a body, it was connected to a bloated monitor-like shape, the old one where a peculiar eye, stood contortedly on one side, vertically flipped, but at the upper edge turned around as to look like an unnatural portative note, a musical thing with a big black globe which appeared to make this muck it stood above appear but like a puddle as compared to everything else that came around it. And the faces in the reflections were but belonging to it, as the man had seen the peculiar creatures that were carrying them away, these flying flea-like textures braziers, that were wingless but bore little devilish horn-pegs that were coiling around appeared to be its servants. This creature but stopped Hang-Ethan's furthermore descend, although it had to make it as clear as possible for the time being that he wasn't invited by any means, as the pools themselves but raised up a few meters onto the platform as to make it so. This was one of humanity's lost cradles out of which he could not come out of since his heart would sink and bitterly drink its own blood, soaking into it rather than be faced with such vileness as to be broken apart by the gelatin sea upon which he looked down upon. From where he stood, he could clearly see and make out the various humanoid shapes that began churning on top of one another, being incapable of making it through, adhering to the crab mentality as they but grabbed each other off, incapable of thinking any longer or realizing that there would be no chance to get out of the pool they were a part of since they would only melt along the way as they would only end up joining the same puddle they came out of. And lo and behold, the creature but was the culprit of this object of destruction which had dissolved so many nations in the past as many of the servants were in actuality its children who had come out of the depths of the pools, and out of the bowels, being very much so incapable of making it through any longer with the ardor of uncanny being less solely so. They were its children. They were made for this. And from the creature's back an organ created the pool, in its unaltered state, as opposite to what one might think, despite the pool's peculiar teal-wax like appearance, the actual substance was very much transparent and evil. Yet no one actually knew the true and most malignant of secret usage of this peculiar substance, as it was a key ingredient of the most dangerous machine that had come to be made, or brought into existence if one were to count the organic material on which it depended to work. Yet, at the same time, this pure substance, in utmost hypocrisy had to be tainted and altered by specific organisms that would go against the very nature of the experiments itself as specific human beings that are altered to become somewhat akin to mutant, upon being slowly put into these peculiarly controlled environments which were the pools, akin to themselves would only make it so they would only be slowly dissolved, rather than be destroyed entirely and instantly, creating a mold of many men that are connected and being hybridized together as they would keep their form together, unaltered, upon being placed into the machine, they would be recalibrated and slowly but delivered only space, as this machine was but a giant telescope-like thing with a giant transparent tube that lead onto the outer rims of the planet, slowly applying pressure and extracting, drawing, then forcing quantum-power to be siphoned through the glass-like mechanisms that are placed inside the glass like tunnel to slowly mold the pool into a more solid state which in turn, by the time they will have come onto the dark vacuum they will have become fully merged, and then, their legs would've connected and formed rotten tails upon which dark flights would emerge upon the planet, around it, their protectors forever. Many of whom would nest inside their home, for there was no Moon, there was no satellite, it was them, billions upon billions within billions of them, all stuck together, incapable of moving away, standing there, waiting until needed, the protectors, defender of humanity, all connected within their minds, dormant as they dreamed of a perfect organic-malignant puzzle they were a part of it. And for that reason the Expedition sent people like Ethan to extract the bile and the substance in little jars, over a long period of time, not of the pools but the transparent unadulterated thing, the spray that came out of the flying thing, by baiting it with most peculiar thoughts, as it was still somewhat capable of understanding human thought. Yet, it was also not violent unless provoked, since most of the corpses were caused by its violent outbursts, one had to remember himself that it was not entirely its fault, as it could not be entirely asked to adhere to such an austere thing, despite what one might come to think of it, there was no evil in its heart, since it was, borderline an animal, incapable of intelligent thought.

Evil days were ahead, since men were but kicked each other in the head. Then they switched with hammer, and would harm themselves by slitting their tiny female-like wrists since they were improperly fed as children, which in turn caused them to be easily conquered by a tribe that was much stronger than theirs, being beaten into the ground, the scientists came up with a solution, they prayed to a little pair of boxes they had put together with black-rotten duck-tape, then they covered it with lamb blood. One of the scientists took a candle, put it in his mouth, beheaded himself with a knickknack, then he asked another man to put it on top of the boxes. In a few hours of watching, they but suddenly molded themselves together as this peculiar thing made out of skin-boxes, a skin-candle and peculiar red-chitin which covered it, grew dark hairs came to life, not only so but a few of the Swimmers as they are called, came and began the act of worship. They would stand for hours, admiring this perfect form that could do no harm to man or to his kind, but it had to, for there was injustice which happened.

Most of them swimmers died within the hour, even those outside the outer rims of the planet, the experiment having been a failure. Their brains having been infested and torn apart. The shadows of the Suppressors but appeared to be nested in their corpses, where they lay forever, lost in space, casting a dark shadow upon the cradle of humanity and all of their unnatural civilizations, where they finally ended their journey. Their souls being at peace.

Miss Jane

Turned around to the room, she was still there, after the hours, gone before a swoon could take place. It was ever so much easier to acquire it, a little rock in the throat as one could see it struggle for little more than a moment's worth. There was a trough to the side.

A woman entered and her face looked blind. But she could see just find, despite everything being taken into account.

Living there was a joy within itself

There was no reason to breathe any longer and one could only drive himself away for this long until it became ever uncomfortable for anything to happen.

A heart was pumped through the jar, it was a big, wide one. And it had been forced through the grinder by repeated fisting that never seemed to stop no matter how one would try it. He couldn't get away, or let alone have any hope for what was going there. Always to leap on sight; when the need asked for it, a little shroud of tiny chains, always beating, many keys away. Every door had to be checked, commanded within the hour. He was no key master but acted like one, he didn't have a face unlike the others, which in turn made him realize that there was no reason not to lay inclined, past the side where the corpses came around, when there would be a night, after some matter. Some consideration had to happen and had to occur eventually. He was blind and only so by force, a lot of it being put through, his spine be opened, through the key-hole, locked all the way through.

Everything had to be checked in the manor, and all would be done. It was his job after all, he dreamed of something going on. There was some noise, at least for some time. Was it there? Unkindly he couldn't ask, that would promote the doors to grow, it could provoke them to spread around, and just about the hour couldn't come closer until he was gone. And asking was taken from him.

Little leaves and soil gathered around, with little foot-prints of wetness, soaked for what was worth.

'Room Ill-on Hohn.'

Key-guider Hrothrow said, just before he could a finger through and came within the hour of the dead. When a little child, blindly stood by the windows, lies told in his ear by a floating mouth who could not remove itself away. It came to him just as soon then that he could not get away. At least not within the hour; when they were already attached to him, to shower of scum-bloated numbed little finger-lids that fell from the sky. Gathered about a single spot, then lost before, the windows on.

‘I seek to know why you’re here.’

‘I was abandoned by an orphan reaper.’

‘What was he to do with you in that case?’

‘Claim my life since I’ve but failed to impress the one to claim me, a benefactor, a parent as such, of which patronage I would just as soon to have found myself worthy of claiming and giving him on, at the very least I would’ve made it worth it.’

‘Were you never listed to be sold in parts?’

‘No ser, in that case I wager I would’ve found myself in at least eight families put together, but I would’ve been a bother, for them at least.

You must know sir that no parent wants some defect in his tutelage at least no one like me.’

‘Do you fancy yourself to know of something else in that case?’

‘I’ve tried to learn but I’ve failed, seeing how my legs are crooked and I’m sickly shook.’

‘Then what can you do?’

‘Sit by the window.’

As much for as much for as long as it mattered; there was no reason to falter just then.

The school was made to fall onto itself, as there was a second floor. It was a place they sought refuge in, for what was worth Manno had but Filth. It was there waiting for him upon the crust of the door which entered through the ground and pushed down the steep until no longer would it seem likely like there was a reason for what pushed even deeper, past the rims of humanity and down the taints of reality, where Riis had followed and would only be brought to open in the back as if now he had readied himself to fully leave the casket he had lived in for such long eons as to finally no longer be bored with what was happening. It was a period of peculiarity that none could ever deal with, as the deeper they went, the steeper the path ahead had become until it was but a long stretch that pushed on, then slowly rose up until they were no longer beneath the ground, having risen up to a few meters beyond the steep earth. Where they were waited by a peculiar gondola-like boat whose facet, in the front was but a strange sculpture like form that shaped itself out of the front piece, akin to a bacteriohpage whose long legs were but dragging the ship along making water walking spider motions, yet who lacked the geometrical-like head piece in place of which there was but a giant umbrella-canopy shape from which a few lynched-like bodies hanged down. For the hour, all was peaceful, as they kept going through a sea of many put together, not as in mixed, but stitched together pools that appeared at time to be closely nearing soil than any other kind of disturbance that might enter then when they rose. On the spot, if it mattered by any chance, a few people came forward, they were made out of dark matter and had weird constellations inside of them.

It was born out of the wretches of the most disemboweled stones. When the time came for it to rise, and one could see as well the throng, it stood there in pain, wreathing as well as it would pour out of itself what little remains they were, but chanting, many men were but aroused from a slumber they couldn't awaken out of during the time after.

What could there be more waiting than the hour when it was all set, when their guts were but open, alas just as well, there was but no second going, without them but be set alive.

'I see, I see what's going on.'

The three of them but soon emerged, they were but settled to resolve asking then.

Donut-lady was there to see, her eyes were open and split, to be certain of it she was but forced to open her gut and from it came out, a peculiar block, like hockey-stadium clear-shaped mass, which walked instead of her, grown with fat-attached to her stomach which blossomed like an open rose. Her mouth was omniscient and completely filled with cartilage which came out as soon to be formed. Like a large extender arm made out of patterned toothpicks that were put together after that, only to see what was going after, they shoved and grew on top each other, only to have become unnatural as well, many of them but animated, moving as one could tell them off, growing at that, cancer-pushing out, they spread, and floated around like satellites-spells. Her eyes were dead yet body but followed. Dragged behind, the others split and couldn't swallow. If they could see me, if they knew, it was all too filthy as one could be.

'I am Viktor and I've come from the other side of the city, will you receive me, Donut-lady?'

And the lady only shook her throat, which appeared to be made, as well as she could contort.

Viktor had been a visionary, he was but a man with a dream, armed to his teeth, but that was rather, not to be called off.

'Our wedding my dear, I am your fiancée, but I find myself cherished not as you abandoned me at the altar of hopelessness divine.

I am afraid I fear I need to open you and live inside.'

And like an Australian Kangaroo of the most gracious type, she opened herself and he lived inside, for a while at the very least. But enough of the pitiful, her heat was split and he was but impaled by the cat-cartilage-shaped grates. It was the only casket that could be used, the only body that would make the ruse.

From the top of her head a strange machine, glowing hot-pinkly as it rotated within. It was peculiar and it looked bizarre, it spoke to the great tubular region of her split back through which extensions came around.

'I was waiting for you, Klothek.'

'And you, I presume must be the one who was looking after the ones that shook this place?'

'I was supposed to be one of them, before you caught me off guard.

I was but thinking and looking around until I've seen my feet cut through the vulva-fryer and I've seen it through, you surprise me, good fellow.

I think I'm going to keep you in mind.'

And there was great rancor after that, indeed it was.

He was set on the dark road with all the mouths on the back and smoke filling them after they sought the hour. It would never end, whom followed through from farther end to farther end.

'There is dread you need not be accustomed to where one must look past the crowds. I see what I take and I shall take claim of your mind.'

Whom had spoken so?

As such, there were set in stone as if it were but of their own. Wont of yore was pitted against his own.

Obslукle Army

Twenty soldiers were head in head, all of them connected-connected, within their hearts their arms had sung. And little doubt, and doubt and doubt. There was no reason for such treason as to happen here.

'I shall string ye dire man.'

And he was a peculiar thing, his head, like a fat-lumped fish the mask extended at the bottom as to form a pseudo-platform that extended beyond his shoulders and his back, in the front there stood but contorted two ledges, all but curvedly-elliptically contorted as to face one another, where a pair of shark-like organic incisors moves. In this helmet in the front a bubble, yet transparent as to show. His features were deformed, they showed, but the back extension, a tube of its own. He was no humanoid but he showed some bulk that looked like a rib-cage beneath the mask, with a giant socket-like shape of cartilage that was covered in a suit of foam with a look of black. A power device was attached to the sock-spine, that looked like a nastily formed apparatus that extended as to be contorted, like moon-landing rover toes, or platforms attaching themselves to it, pushing away towards the gray-dark men who shone.

Gray-dark were not human either, they looked like two uncomfortably stitched together trash sacks, with a large head on top that looked like a small flat barrel lamp. Little pucker-eyes and a strange horned spike-like breather coming out of an exposed-like bandit-mask look-a-like of a mouth that his the entry point from which the organ came out of. Between the two of them stood a long limbless body with two weirdly outspread-static legs. It bore a normal head that had a normal face scrawled on top of it, but three black vortexes of skin which kept rotating for its eyes and mouth, overlaid on top the scrawls. A peculiar hole could be seen in its chest from which it bled on the floor when it needed to speak as well.

The Helmeted creature was but Yhegg, the middle stalk was Legg, the sacked creature on the right Snegg. They were settled on resolving their dispute by whichever means they could set themselves on. By whatever acceptable means.

Looking behind them, the scene was dolefully pale, the ground was a wail, as to how it was structured. It seemed that way at time, with every second but moving from one point to another as the voice but kept on carrying on.

Immortality

Coarse sand became green, cacti forests grew within the plains as the agriculture drove the tribes away. A few of their Cammelops were prodding out, ridden by them during the obscure movements of the sand plots that flew through.

It was life, in some arid land. There lay but their tanking camel forts which moved and pushed with fur just as benign as everything that looked of them, the headings and the most peculiar shells they were wrapped in dragging them behind. For they were moving only by twisting small storms underneath them knowing that the desert was but sand inside, for miles below the earth, up until tectonic plate. And what lived inside that space, might yet to be called upon the strangeness which lay upon the camel's faces. For they lay dead and were without sockets, the Nomads knew. Just as much as it appeared for them to near it, they feared that something got through and would've gotten them. If only for a while, they would've known it for what was it. Draperies of skin but thrown, all about them, never to be known or heard off.

Set in flight deformed men appeared to be swimming in sand. They were but of little manners and mentally disabled by marks of poke irons or small shafts that had been bashed, against their skulls wreathing at last as if to known. Where they went and everything that went on, with little for them, as it were for them to know. They could do naught of it and it would last just as well.

The strange skin mounts the Nomads rode were but beings of their own. Always in such a fashion, as to chain themselves beneath the sand and carry with them the deformed swimmers just so they could be spared, at last of dying in derogation. An atrocity committed as one would beg to differ so.

Before long they approached a town. Since resources were sparse, this settlement had to be wrought with what they had. Encased in skin-camels the floors, walked upon cradles of knives that would bleed them more only to harden, as blood mixed with sand well. For what was fair and what could be said about them, there was but no way to tell what entered their minds and who forced them to set aside everything and live this way. Most skin fell off as it replaced the holes that were dug by the knives they were forced to wear underneath their sandal. The vapors of coarse blood, the mixtures would make skin fall. Overdone and ever emerging, falling as to trade what they ought to; first of all they were in need of eyes. Since the disease that caused their skin to fall, also made their intestines shrink as well as additional heads and longer bodies in the back which were formed in the shaped of flattened-deformed camels which were punctured and beaten to nigh-death. With each hump being eyeless, the heads that emerged from them yearning.

‘Another batch of eye supplies, these will do, I’ll see I through that one day we will allow everyone to see the world and everything put of their own.’

‘Great and as many, let just as much to be known, I’m not asking for much, but the secrets of the sow.’

For there, they looked, and shook hands and traded recipes below the trade. Not showing much any longer, since there was that scene of disaster that could be.

They were of a mind wreathing.

All of them open-wide, eyeing everything they could, they had giant containers that looked like mugs pumping coffee in them constantly.

It was hard to tell whether or not those skin-tearing vapors existed or it was the intoxicating murky black water they were ingesting as to be the cause of it.

They were also prone to suicide and various acts of aggressions.

Worst thing imaginable happened as well.

Many of them and many more were inhaling an undeterminable, unrecognizable substance made out of crushed beetles rot, brought to life by the mixture and the melting pot within the bloody camel-slits where sand would bleed inside, as brought. To their nostrils only then; as this had already been decided as well, long before they had been given a chance, it was even harder, trying to keep up.

All unnatural, and always but a while, seeing how they only brought fake eyes and how they were fed in the entrails taken from the camel’s pride, both parties got nowhere and nowhere at all would they end.

One day, sand became red, fully engorged and soaked in blood as well as into everything else that appeared there. Various limb-men started coming out and slowly passing the scalped men. Who came out to feed as well; as they seemed to wear the camel heads as they were but unable to control themselves any longer.

‘You’re all in need to be warned of it.

We live in an aquarium, but you ought not to know.’

It was hardened, lumps and formed aside. Blimps as hardened, all falling apart.

‘I see a tower that has the head of a camel, but it’s no tower but a great cylinder coming out of a grotto of sand. In it died eighty men.

And eight men propped themselves from inside their chests.’

‘Bravo, good man.’

One of the sand Nomads started clapping as he cheered the man, during the wimp’s touch, which pushed the sky back to its rightful place. It was all sand, even their eyes which explained the blindness. For they all bore the camel heads as well and could not for the likes of them get away from the stigma they conveyed. Sutured around their necks, though it was clear and too obvious, not senseless in some manner; their legs were long and just like the camel's throats, all placed upon giant domes from which the rockets threw, and sand-sinew came out. They were trying to cut the invisible men who were out there, whom were not invisible but were made out of invisibly moldable grains of sand which mixed with the normal kind in order to create such an illusion of the mind.

Betrayal.

'I shall slit your throat and make your children bathe in your blood.'

'That is disgusting and I shall claim your life.'

'No, you won't, because I have already slit it, stay back.'

And with a single span of manner, he but opened it and swam behind, seeing how the many chains dragged through his body, a lime.

Another man arrived. He was one of the desert camel jockeys from the looks of it. Too dangerous a fellow, Shykue, as of a camel's back. He smoked a pair, one of his eyes were ultramarine with strips of white, numbers on every single line, circles intertwined, small depictions of killed men placed in small squares that lay in the other. But worst of all he wore but a helmet of a metal cone, from the looks of which, it shone.

'Why did you come in here?'

'I had a dream.

A rain, rain is coming.'

'It's already come, on a constant pass. What are you on about Shykue?'

'Ignore him, you know he's uselessly mad, he's not to be trusted, dirty man of sand.

Can't you see that he's dressed like a homeless person? Plus, he thinks he's a warrior of some kind.

He thinks he's wearing a special suit from the future which allows him to see in time. He thinks that it bears the ability to draw a piece of human soul while converting it into wild atoms used for an unfathomable thing. Because he thinks he can make a soul as his own and by the time he's dead, the suit will take a life of its own, wrap around it and make him immortal, without him being physically hurt.'

'Won't someone eventually bust up the suit?'

'No, he thinks the suit can walk through punches and through shots, as if it's not there to begin with, not even phasing but he thinks they're made to believe he's there.'

'A mirage then?'

'That's not either, he's there but he isn't. Two copies of the same suit, one that's being hurt and the other that's make it seem so, like two frames of an animated creature, but one cannot be seen until the act is done. And they stay near one another and the man who's doing the harming is also split in halves.

Both of them are only a few feet away in this confusing event, but they cannot move, instead they change places. For that reason it's so irksome because they do not know it.'

'A man would hurt himself trying to destroy it then?'

'I don't actually know. It appears out of nowhere, I tell you. But I think it's like a game of chess, where every move has already been taken. And on every piece of dirt and sand, upon the spot he's touched, his clothes would appear to have wrapped themselves around each piece.'

The Rook on a side, the King and Queen on another, crisscrossed paths, until the lovers are touched on.'

'What does that even mean?'

'It means that it's not a normal game of chess. Think of four Rooks that are facing one another, now, think of it this way.'

All of them have a piece of string pushed through their heads. Someone's rotating the chessboard, and while everyone's distracted, he's already repainted every piece on the board, the same color.'

But that's only getting trickier, since there's another piece and another man who looks like him but it's not him and cannot be touched either. A dimensional leaper who resembles him in touch, on him rests the dilemma of immortality.'

'Why?'

'Because the new-comer who resembles the man is a suit of skin of which appearance shall be based on.'

'I thought he wasn't to appear in a physical form.'

'That is why the soul would only copy it, I know, I know, you're starting to understand, now that everything appears to make sense, listen.'

If I were to throw a rock at you, without seeing you for what you are, the rock would pass through you because I haven't thrown it at you but at your side.'

The man on the right is solid, the one on the left can be passed through. And that is how life is.'

'What about the one who leaped from the other world?'

'I simply made him up.'

Sand is the universal word for fear in every language that ever existed.

'And while they're connected through, you need to note this down just so you might be able to remember.'

Every rock that's being thrown at him has a soul. For every object that's passed through, a smaller body wrought in his image will appear, completely forming another child he might inherit the lie off once he's actually dead.'

'But I thought he's immortal.'

‘Only if he gets people to throw scissors at him.

As the souls of the objects might be passed through, he would achieve a replicable thing that is life. Trust me on this, I’ve spoke with him many a times.

It’s a great plan, to achieve immortality, he only needs to get as many people to harm him and batter his souls as possible.’

In some way, it was all too quiet and senseless in some manner. It was all too quickly planned, and set about and made sense in some way that could not be gotten or thrown around.

‘Yes, I think he needs to achieve his immortality goal, that way he will take care of all of us until we shall be frozen and thawed off, then thrown around into the sand to end.’

‘Why would that bastardly a thing happen?’

‘Because the Camel Gods have somehow fused with both their servant’s blood and the sand, making a strange leap between the boundaries of misery and the filth that shall ever be present in their defeated hearts, to which I say, there’s but no way to stop them any longer.

You see, we’ve already left the most unnatural expression of them all on them.

We killed, destroyed and completely demolished their children and because of that, I’m afraid there’s but little to no way back, to whence it started.

Our only hope is to make sure Shykue somehow achieved his goal of immortality, with little of it as there is. That he might be able to draw all of us in if we choose to leap inside of him.’

‘Because we’ll become him, is that the reason?’

‘Indeed, that is indeed the reason we might strive for it. If we can by any chance leap inside of him when the time and the call towards satisfaction fades, we might become immortal as well by having our souls be swallowed by his and become such as the stone become.’

There was but dread, and there was little more and little less. Paranoia was but a sign of the mentally distress and those thrown around, never to be faced either, as he could but never understand what was going on.

It had to be that way.

‘I think I’m starting to understand, just how the whole thing is set.’

‘It’s subtle, from what I could tell but I think his body is merging between the softened thing, that is there. It’s not a mirage, but only something that’s seen from his mirrored side. It’s a false impression, a memory that’s being implanted falsely, but not so much.

And for that reason whoever might watch it might think that the man is phasing both left and right, but only because he doesn’t know that the memory and the sight or the irises and the device behind them are being moved only a few millimeters away, like a static image that’s being enacted again. Then it disappears and appears again, as the eyes are but aligned. Then the man who's looking but changes sides, which means.'

'The soul of the man with the eternal-suit is on the left side now, instead the right one. And the rock or the sand pebble that has been thrown at him had become but struck, a humanoid thing that resembles him between the two of them.'

'You got it and that's how he rules the world, that is how he controls everything he touched and everything else that's become. The reason for it being that's underneath the ground, though it can't be seen, there are millions of copies of his souls that are all banded together and put and shoved, even deeper than their embodiments would allow. And all of them are made out of sand particles because sometime, in the future, he will have tripped but stood still as the same time, allowing every rock that was him to become but a sand-pill which had become him. That way he can never be completely destroyed since the magnitude of his soul would have achieved such a great mass that he will have replaced life without anyone else having realized it yet.'

And thence no point of destruction and no sheer force could possibly destroy him for that reason, since he would simply get away from his carcass and take that of another one from below and everywhere else his body-doubles might've been placed.

'What about the suit?'

'The suit is but a sham, it doesn't exist at all. Can't you see that he's dressed in hobo garbs? Indeed, I think it's what he sees. The real suit must be another soul that's been wrapped around that of his own, which can only force the Camel gods to bow to him and allow this to happen. It's fairly important to think of this way. If his plans can somehow be achieved, there's nothing else that might be plain to be called. He cannot possibly be defeated then.'

'If any of the things you've said are real to begin with and you haven't actually been lied to.'

'That's actually impossible and you want to know why?'

The Ahyb, could barely holster what was going through his head. But it was all too obvious and apparent that he was right about one thing and one thing along.

'It's a metal string in my head.

I'm already connected with him, as you can see, it's already gone through my brain and stop.'

And Ahyb knew exactly where this all came from. Where to look out of and what to say, what he was inclined to think and just what did it.

'I know exactly how it is and why they're trying to pull one on him.

I know his history to almost a minute detail, I'm telling you. And you want to know why?

It's because that man grew up in a house of butchers, a house of butchers I'm telling you. And when you grow up seeing so much death, it's a field, I keep telling you, it's a field of death and blood is raining. Of course you'd want to become immortal at that point in time when you stand to realize that, that's just about your life. One day you wake up and they cut you, butchering your body like one of those pigs, I'm telling you.

That's why he wants to save the world. He's grown up seeing camel-porks and came-hen and camel-people all dying at the same pace, all ending up in the same manner and you want know what?

It stayed with him all this time and he knows it and we know it and everyone knows it as well. Where does that take us then? What happens to people like us?

Well it's simple, he thinks we're the ones being prepared to get butchered like pigs and cats. Or dogs, or parrots now and birds and other animals, well perhaps there should come a time where they ought not to be killed any longer. But that's beside the point. Listen.

They're throwing papers in the room and they're all wrapped in skin and tender loins and the walls are brim and scream of agony. I keep telling you, it's how he grew up, seeing his parents wield scissors around the house, fighting despite being gifted with a neck of receiving as much pain as possible while showing no signs for it. They call it suppression, but it comes at a cost. It affects their empathy ten times fold but it's expressed inwardly for them. I think their hearts and brains grow even bigger every time they have to kill and it's almost as if they have to die for everyone that's ever been killed in their butcher's shop.

They even slaughter their clients in some day.

And I believe that's why he wants to become immortal. Because he's trying to take everyone's souls, and make them feel the same way as he does by becoming him. That way everyone will be able to understand what's it like being in his skin while also being able to relate and be immortal. Because everyone wants to be immortal as well.'

'Why the wire in your head then?'

'It's supposed to act as an antennae that should guide the giant cameloid-humanoid creature that's twisting the world and has no entrails underneath him because his lower side is missing beneath its torso.'

It all clicked together then.

'That's great, I wish I could do the same thing as he does. What can I do for him?'

'You need to rip off one of your livers off your insides, pull it out and start writing on it every name and address of everyone you know. That way, after you throw it at him, he will have absorbed everything, becoming, finally what he wanted to all along.'

'Immortal?'

'Covered in blood, he has a fetish for it, even since he started talking to the viola-covered sand-skin crabs and the ruddy orange seals that have come from beneath the false sea that cannot be seen, which may indeed be classified as some kind of mirage if you don't mind looking after that. But you need to know, just as I'm telling you, there's something else.

One of them, the skin-sand crab, his name was but Curtain Kent.

He's claim to have come from another world. And he's the only who gave the man the secret of immortality because he was followed by another being who was in control of the crab. He was but a strange being that was the strange concoction of skin, wrapped around like a small surge of a cosmos that was filled with meat, floating as it descended from the depths of the earth, from a chasm-like rotation that had render its limbs as to be ruddy and revealed of every nerve they bore.

Large legs pushing out as deranged flat briars that started spreading at their ends, in various directions from which various limbs and claspers started drawing out. Through little tubes and feeling-numbered incisors and peculiarly set clouds of skin-like lumps that started breathing. Since they carried lungs of their own, some wore happy features, others unhappily looking while they were always of a cone that was protruding forward. Always, they but always wanted to eat what they could during their stay in the strange realm that was out of touch and benign.

Inside of it, he looked inside, despite everything Curtain told him, he had failed to do so and saw it expand, like a jelly, revealed, yet benign, there were too many inwardly-set legs that were breathing in and out of their smaller heads that were being filled with the false-air. They bled and foamed and they spat what they could, only to have poisoned the sand-well because they barely understood what was going on around them. With each drop, it seemed vaguely so, that what was being devoured was but a strange show for them, as they couldn't be forced to care, or be endowed to believe. What they were doing was but cleave the life hidden beneath them, a their feet. As all of the sudden one could see them appear in the worst possible way. As if they've lain there, bodies crumbling of sand, drawing away, as they could not help themselves any longer until they begged for some kind of release, only to be pushed deeper and feel no peace.

He stared into their bloody melting eyes and begged for something to happen only so they might be spared of dining in their entrails, as little body parts of men fell from the obscene dome-depression in which the heads rested. For they were wrapped around with rope-veins and growing tumors and would look like contortions of largely crippled legs that kept them through the highest picks, wouldn't felt it if he got close.

And on top of the main body outside, which by now would've been revealed to have been a small body of a hill, or a would to be island condensed at a single point, a trunk emerged, bearing the head of a four-pointed crystal of which cracks, bore the fingers and the marks and horns and some snores and body shores that entered through. More sand came from inside, for if one were to look and see. Through both of the inverted pyramid-like structures, that the bore some kind of floating entrails, in a pocket dimension that was theirs. Always emitting rays of growth which immediately grew them bodies of their own. Sometimes chained and dragged behind them, blinded by their worship as they could not help it any longer. It could simply not be stopped. Everyone now and then they would disappear as if to be absorbed, always lost without hope.

And below, the creature, this filth of thought, would be brought to grow or take another one out; so much to reach and touch and contort everything it could at that. There was as little as it could be helped. Everything of theirs was but that, entrails, the crab which followed, Curtain was but brought again. Before he knew it, he was surrounded by them.

As I have told you, he had received the secret for immortality for them, as they could only do it so to prove themselves worthy of what entered them.

Every crab had the open throat of a Camel inside of their heads, which had replaced their lobes, their minds were gone and they forever served them. It was ever near that they appeared as they started drawing the fear from the flying ships. Most of them had stopped.'

At that moment the light an' sky had become but a peculiar match of violet-gray and many glowing hollow yellows shone but to spear away. From inside of them, more came to follow. At first they looked like hardened, completely geometrical cylinders that were attached together and moved upon a strange configuration of pushed. Yet after a while, it had been revealed, that, despite their strange forms, they appeared to bear not only the forms of little-formed, long bodied, horned fiends which mouths where two pseudo false cylinders met but they also revealed themselves as if to roll soon often, revealing flat sheet of fully inflated flat that bore faces and charades. The images of wild creatures and criminals that were but caught in their play and acts, various depictions that looked like glowing tribal tattoos, all erupting with their strange shining needles that entered through them and everywhere around. There was also a strange globe of green filled entirely with boils and strange orgy-looking humanoids that extended as if to craft a spear from the front and the body of a mammal in the back before pushing fourteen worm-rings out of them in order to reveal the smaller cutting-sharp pincer like eggs that came about, and would wriggle like benign things in their shrouded hunger. Surrounding them there were utmost peculiar small brained mongrel flying creatures of lights that wore web-pieces with which they moved smaller glowing as well as shadow-producing eyes, noses and mouths that bore tiny knife-points that aimed in four directions, that were used to guide the system of trajectories in which the peculiar creatures appeared to fly in.

And every now and then, they would allow for the most peculiar strange demigods to appear as they were encased by their giant-formed heads, which bearing millions of small deformed limbs stacked upon other limbs, until they formed arm-legs, leg-arm-leg-forearm, leg-leg-knee-joint-leg-arm-hand formations until they appeared to resemble the pseudo imaginary strange sight of suns that were used to sweep the surroundings and search for life. Since this place was desolate of life before the agriculture advanced, Shykue was one of the first men to come into contact with the creatures. And it was because of them that he also realized he wanted to make everyone immortal.

And there were patches of land which floated away, deforming the area of sky which they conveyed into a blue and a green while they appeared to be able to form strange devices which control the hold of the most peculiar living things to grow old or somehow recede into a much younger form by implanting small opposable cells from a reality which deformed color while turning their innards and their beings into colorful creatures that would not be afflicted by anything else but drops of ink. Giant strange screens were also there, but they were made out of the eyes of the giant lesser member of the abandoned race, of which rancid sub-humanity formed black squares in the sky upon which it stood. It also spoke to the floating coral before entering the strange Cadet. He was a giant space-man who had no other option but to die, defecating himself with an unnatural form of blood that entered his lungs and had become but a perilous thing which absorbed objects in it, destroying their souls with coagulation. He was the enemy of immortality and was to be avoided at any cost. One look away or a blink and he disappeared without being able to say anything since his teeth were sealed and put in a black box where he would live for the rest of his short-spanned life if it was to be allowed.

There was also the crab-master whose dreams were those of made cattle-camels that would be used for the sustenance of producing mules that might rule the next generation of first-borns.

The crab knew himself a lot, as Curtain put it, there was little to no doubt about it. For the secrets he bore were unlikely to be shown to anyone or anything, or be lost as little flicks of skin or drawn around.

‘That is a lie, the way he’s telling, for where he’s dwelt there’s no reason to see or look through or to be called. You need be known about it, settle.

I know of it and lose to betters.

He cannot fashion his own body in the looks of a soul, that’s but a lie, the little creation, the replicated looker inside your chest it but a twist of a dye, not to be looked upon as one would figure out on his own.’

There were dark pebbles, but only in the forefront of the small dimensions made inside his eyes, and through there he stored many a peculiar thing, like floating replicas of the world within each blink. Only to be blandly seen as if they’d disappear otherwise. Never of a mind to be looked back at, dire things appeared in the sky after, he could see them only blind-folded, as not to be deceived.

But most importantly, the replicas that were fashioned to look like him and grant his soul some nigh-immortal cover was but a ruse, for every single one of them bore but a single strand of those dark pebbles which only pushed themselves as to be attached to various shapes of memories that lasted there. In the form of primates that were but struck-unaware of what they were doing, their back defiled and pushed away like screens as they dwelled between dimensions and reliving through the bodies they’ve seen acting in the past.

And this was the key or preserving the immortality, the pebbles which were scratched by the long wires that passed through both lobes in order to enter the eye-globes and action them until the link. And every time one could sink his mind deeper into memories they would know that they’ve been tampered with and the world would forget soon enough that the Camels were in on it. For their godly nature only allowed decay and they bore the eyes of human and guts in their veins which only pushed deeper into them, through their nervous central system as well until they could not only not function properly but they were dragged beneath the sand where their ancestors survived.

It was had to be so.

Although Curtain held this belied, that the strange creature who bore the secret of immortality had but lied and hid beneath a strange, peculiar thing which was the wall of brandish, for he would hide, in the tiny heads that were beneath him small long incisor-launchers, venomous and poisonous as they could act to during the initial contact with whichever skin it may have gone onto. And there was this peculiar thing as well, the heads could throw them as crossbows and they commenced so.

Shykue barely adapted as he managed to push through. He could’ve been gotten and messed with, upon the rue.

The crab knew enough, let alone could he stand aside and allow this to happen. As he desired just as much from the surroundings, pushing a few steps in.

‘I will join you then.’

Curtain-Kent said, as he was set on trying to aid him in his search for eternal life. Since the future was much darker than he would be allowed to know, as the likes of it only showed itself there and then and nowhere else; it was plain to see and well to do. They were of a headlessness that would, by every mean refused to put them through it. Plain as they were, both of them realized that the dark pebbles were but tiny eggs in which life grew and got twisted. Since the image of man which was embodied in them was twisted by the mere fact that they grew up in the dark. Or some peculiar looking light of blue, dim but rotten as if made of cloth, and eaten, past them they contorted while creating the most benign creatures that might be aligned. Two at a time, every single one set against another, pierced through chest, eye and lower basin, crippled if would be allowed to walk, eternally bellowing in pain as they were set to suffer to no end with no possible explanation. But most importantly, just like him, he had to claim it upon his head and shove it in. For the wire was the sole compact anchor which connected their lives and their might, the power being set aside while being shoved inside the isle; that being necessary to be believed, in order to cut and breathe through.

A scoundrel at heart.

‘How do you kill a child?’

The crab a knew a lot and great things were looming ahead. He was but of a mind to open and look inside of one only to know whether they worked properly as young men would in their days of youth. And it held many such stories in which large bodies of youthful looking use-to be touched were grabbed and cut in half during vivisection like flowers. Blooming always as they could but be brought.

What was more important for the crab was that the strange creature before it had been wandering, aimlessly itself for centuries at most, inside various empty grain halls and various other unnatural never ending dead ends that drove it to wander about. It was uneven, on every side. There was no reason for it. To spew it out, to falsify drowning in it or look around, always of a piece and foam, the sea of red was his kingdom come. It was where he would stay and waste away like all the others whom had followed him and would night allow. Not to be inclined to waste another second.

Every floor was wasted in some way, touched by hands, foot-prints away. Some little men left in stairs, some of them conjoined and little more, could it be allowed to be looked onto, since they bore themselves with torches. Burnt in utmost peculiar manners, they were yet attached to their breeding mothers, of whose children fell. Many left-over, through and spat about. Tiny teeth put in uncanny, most peculiar feet that had appeared. Their shape was that of large ships, in which the little men and mothers would recede into, right under his eyes. To which he looked upon only to see uncanny predatory eyes that were being forced upon him, as he was beckoned to stay away. Keep the distance not as to leave too much to be discerned.

And the feet crawled through and were made as if to destroy the rooms even if for seconds. He would do as he pleased, always on leash to what had to be done in order to reach that glutton point which was immortality, of old and new. Seethe through and better watched. He had yet to walk anywhere else.

But seeing how from one dark-purple, vaguely grayish thumb, the top of which was cut from the inside out with a tiny scalpel, there came but a most peculiar father, of whose face was but that, a cut on each cheek and a disgraced uncanny black teeth-paired segment that crawled across his face and pushed through his forehead into a ditch across his scalp. In there it stood and rested, constantly pulling off his face as if it protested the sudden approach. Not to be called on it, not to be coached by little spikes to be. His throat was uncanny, purple-like the plague of his mind.

‘You need to be weary of what’s entering your mind.

Immortality cannot achieved no longer, look, dig through the floor, you should see for yourself what’s happening down the gore-drifts.’

Though the heads were drawn and the pint sharp spits were thrown about, there was little more to say or do. With little more taken from it, there was no blood below the room, and none would even come as close to be. It was all missing, every single second and every single pint that went. Always in their minds, trying to get him from the looks of it, there was but little to no sound then. They were silent, attempting to do something, as peculiar as it sounded. Each blow, regardless of it being wasted in the air, would somehow grow inside and never. Stopped by it, he almost came to look back and question what was going on. He was of a mind unlike no other.

There were toddlers in the tunnel below, kidnapper and taken away by long black coils that almost ripped them to shreds as they were being carried. And while white-patched that were carried through. Some tiny hands risen as if to grab him as they passed through. It would not contend with either of them to know was going on there. As they hid, they forgot. Not to look back now, as the creature started drawing its peculiarly long members back into its condensed body but as to wonder, how and why. And what wretched about, that it had come to ask.

‘Of what blood does the pool below belong to?’

‘The blood of something inhuman, unlike the heads you stole.’

The creature was being watched and most of them had been very much aware of what had been going on. There was no point in even trying to get back at it, since it leaped down there, slowly being impaled by the coils, dragged away, until they had gotten bored of trying to harbor him inside of them. By force, he had been pushed, along the line, then through. Not to waste too much, unlikely, as it would’ve been. They but forced to face and filthily-embrace, they completely kill the infants, then threw the creature through the ceiling, back into another room. Soon to be on its way, as it merely floated untouched, almost not even scourged of pain, as it remained to be seen again.

The halls were dark, but they had ended.

In the open, whereas he descended, hither and there and just about anywhere, there was blood in the air. And in the walls and on the floors and in the carpet, blood soaked corpses and blood-lettered words and blood dogs and blood cats and blood pigeons and dead-parrots and small holes in the walls, darkened as they spat blood. And at a certain point, from the inside of every head, blood started sprouting out. Blood was being spread around. Blood on top the ceiling.

There was also clay everywhere, white clay made out of bone marrow. Stone-clay and clay-teeth turning into puddles, making them choke in white instead of red. Clay-underneath the floors and clay in every eye that was there, clay-encased lower bodies, and malignant voices that spoke of clay from the variously encased holes.

Dark smoke, everywhere, it was hard to breathe through it. And small objects fashioned of knives, statues, or morbid little infant-forms which leaped into the hole from which he sprouted from in order to eat the children that had made it out. Peculiar unspoken dark-machines followed through which asked of blood, spouting clay out of their metallic mouths. All in the name of immortality.

The blood slowly got replaced by rubbing alcohol, almost to its entirety.

It was certainly out of place.

But with each step, everything looked like a liquefied blood, clay, meat, face, gut-pattern turned dark on the inside and on the outside, with tiny puckers, little eels-of flesh which bloody faces on top of. Pillars being spread everywhere they could while fermenting into the most disgusting digested channels. Small flying-in-place made out little dirty rocks of green and yellow. The rubbing alcohol being drowned in the liquids and the burning eyes of the unnatural. Peculiarly dumb-struck creatures with no eyes being part of the strange lamps that were incorporated in the odd-hears that were encased in metal-holders. Clawed upon by tiny eye-to be tracking cartographic-tools that were attached, coated as well into the skin pouches that lay around them. And in this unnatural stretch, no longer were they attached nor dead, but ever to put to work.

It followed through, seeing everything fall apart and ever-be put through. Disorder was around. The walls were falling off, as was the ceiling. Within the grasp of the malignant touch there was but something incredibly unnatural yet cemented within each body that approached, all of them being forced back in their spots, whence to suffer as they were to move. On other sides, never called for and always put and dragged along. There, whence there lay. A single unheeded wreckage, on the side, entered upon, there was nothing that was not rotten, or some crewman that hadn't been. For what they've seen, whence pushed back.

Trashed and set aside to rot as if it had been ever so close, it listened.

'You've come here to ask for something.'

'Indeed I have, the gift I'm looking for, I need to know that it is not but a figment of my imagination. I need to it's not a fluke. Tell me, figure hid, shadows weep upon your utmost peculiar stance. I must know where you stand on it.'

'It's real yet benign. For the path to eternal life you may look after can only be attained in part and not so much as to be achieved while never be prized of and never thrived, just as peace is but for peculiar spot. You need to be brought to it and see it rot.'

He spoke of nothing and merely threw a few lashes, as of eyes around. As if the whole structure was but the on-looker standing before death during a time it was lost for words. Now, to be called upon, he didn't ask for less, unfounded.

But trapped there, he only looked at pillars, various shelves and other peculiar things that fell. Some of the cargo being completely taken and everything from the most twisted forms in the distance erected. Yet their eyes were bore and they seemed to mumble. Only the most peculiar things which included some long distanced and forgotten numbers only they seemed to know about. And no one dared approach their shouts. It was just as peculiar as it would seem that each turn had granted him a spin, to which direction he might taken, unable to realize where he was yet.

It was only at this point that distress appeared to be able to kick in. For that which followed was of a headed slit that had become part of his shoulders as well, swollen around the ribs, eight heads to his arms, pushed out of the forearm-pits, descending from the neck tendons until they had become pure heaps, of moving skin, the most unnatural thing was them, who settled in these strange creatures. A bunch of utmost peculiar stunted growth fish-snails, which were wrapped inside the cordial device that was melting inside their fangs as well.

Though it bore a leg only and leapt, this Chunk was only trying to move ahead and do something for itself while there was still some time left for it to do so. Every single time in some place, every disappearance made one appear without a face. And there was always someone to stalk, always one brought to the most unnatural thing that had been brought to quiet, in empty days.

‘Sometimes we pray to them.’

Chunk appeared to recollect.

The Immortality seeker was but estranged by him during their stay together as they could for the likes of them not even relate or touch. Upon the dust, settled upon, he could only grab what he could from around. For every piece, like dirt-filled sand running down around them, from across the sand-valley, into these corridors, the halls and where they looked, lamps would still be wrapped in the most peculiar things of all, no skin and no bounds, only the shrouds that were made out of the faces humps the Camels gave them.

For it was only beneath their watch that such secrets could be told. And none would suffer having everything stolen from them, not when the stakes were as high, never to be taken away nor to subside to the most magnificent of the lost causes. Always cured of the most filthy thoughts. And he would wander and look abashed.

For Chunk was only trying to piece himself, from his chest there also came. Out of it, an obelisk remained, from which tiny metallic arms would start pushing out until no longer could they be controlled as to work everything across their reach. Always molding, shaping life. The chemical elements were but around. Though, woe to him, there was no way, only to have known so, there could be but little along the way to see. More or less, the blasphemy had yet to come, long emerged and would come forth.

‘I know the actual patch toward the secrets.

Do not listen to Chunk now.’

The fellow, or strange person whom spoke, of which a few gorgon-like backs, serpentine but spread about with smaller arms being melded between their eight abdominal snake-ring, until the last ones on every side sprouted mechanical-like spring-devices, from which a smoky water would come out, while, there was but an unnatural thing to their heads, which were throats connected to one round-open area-like head that looked as if it bore elongated trumpets-of skin, hundreds of them sunken within.

From each trumpet came a song, in an utmost peculiarity of wrongness, it could not be held at all, for they all spoke of ill and wanted to paint Chunk with an illness that was but his and would've been so. He was painted as a liar and would very much likely be contrived or be pushed aside until ailed to the song, the wrongs he had done and carried on with being his.

'I think you've tried tricking him for the last time, scum. Know that your ruse cannot be pushed for this long until you stand the chance of being caught.'

'I've done nothing of the kind, you liar.'

I'm merely trying to lead him in the right direction with hopes that he might be saved somehow. It has to be done, somehow, I know it.

The secret is hidden.'

Both of them looked at Chunk.

It was obvious that he didn't know, but he was to stand. At a chance, to lose him before he was even done for.

Chunk was not a god, but a part of it. Of the whole body of the one abandoned and above all. He was busy, chewing on something every now and then as if it had been a part of him. Always of a mind to try and eat something, devouring it on the side. Little devils all around them, made of clay, of bloody bubbles in their faces and most peculiarly folded wild-plaster made wings that were of one piece but incapable of flight, they were used to scoop most of the moisture off the walls so they could dry themselves off. Moisture here, of that which neared only boiled everything to a crisp and tear. Torn apart, behind him, he could see. But of a turn there was a Negro-fiend which came around. Dragged by chains, he had no hands and would have its head recede back, just like the feet. It had noticed how they hid and took to its little mind to do the same. Though in poor imitation, which bequeathed some kind of castration, the Negro-eunuch could be seen hiding, right through his chest and deeper in, minding nothing of what went around. He could chow on his feet and feet what entered round his back. For he was trapped, inside his skull-chest, of which look appeared to confess abuse. Too much of it to be called upon the swoon which deepen, sunken within, twenty meters at least, below the rim, he woke up looking down. Dragged around as he were, but a child he carried, blind with pox and left about to rot. He'd been too late, to satiate they youth's hunger, thence he but carried what he'd miss beaded in wonder.

'Ah, I see.'

Chunk considered the following, since most of the things he was seeing, were but strange possibilities of the filthy lives he might create. Of little worth as they could serve. There was but little of his mind and nerves.

'You seek something, I know, I know.'

Maybe there's no need for you to be immortal, I'm thinking it would only be wasted on you. And need you be reminded that I mean no offense? Because I certainly don't and I cannot see anything of more worth pursuing than this, I seek some kind of peace of mind myself.

That I may be rejoined with the Father-piece and become a god.'

'Marvelous, then you shall have been made to die in a pit.'

'Greatly put, I wager.'

Chunk shut his mouth as well.

It was telling of how much they despised one another, as much as one could tell, if he had the nerved to call one out on it. And be appalled of what happened. They were surrounded by many more. There were flights of birds, and many stoves that had hybridized with their flocks. Forming most peculiar shapes that would not be touched, wincing they would be more likely to be born into the hall, but they were most likely brought here by the coils, drained away and made to seethe. And they were speaking between themselves and would eat feet. Not the giant ones in which hid the strangers, but normal feet, which were dangerous. The feet of women; those had power. And even ancient and old men knew of it ever so slightly to be inclined to look into it. No one could deny it, cutting women's feet being benign, yet the power which lay in it could be anything but tried. It only bore itself with the most peculiar sign of hope. And it could only do that, again and more.

That's why even the servants of evil could say, that they satiated whatever evil they would pray to, only if they had the chance to cut as many feet and sound the alarms, do unspeakable things with them, commence the rituals that involved so dastardly things, such objects of beauty that would settle them back in. And it was great and there was might in licking them, and rubbing your tongue in the same way one would rub the alcohol on a wound, that being on the tongue.

And it was required, it had to be so.

Chunk had considered it.

He thought of it and called it as such.

'I think that, in order to achieve immortality, you need to perform a ritual. And in order for that ritual to be achieved and done with.'

But most importantly, the arches, the curve and the angle of the arches was important when judging women's feet. Only the finest quality could be used for such a ritual, especially one that would involve such magnitude that be set in mind. Not one of them would have to be alike either, that was wildly put and set. There was something else as well. They didn't know how to reach yet.

'That ought to be called then.

Ought to be used, I think that.

Peculiar think that it was, this strange fellow, not Chunk, but the other one, the other apparition which had been with him for so long, it so appeared. He had been but a strange manifestation of Curtain, the crab-like mongrel which accompanied him.

Well to be, it was plain and simply. The Camels were the real players, the one who governed over all. They were vile as to think of feet as a commodity, when in reality they desired to lick armpits of those in doubt. Of their true retaliation, there was nothing happening around them. There was fire, somewhere.

And before the Bearer, whose compressed deformation only showed itself to be utmost vile could do nothing to fend off the thought of the Rhine. Why was he thinking of it then? That did not make much, that made exactly as much sense as it needed be.

‘Yes, I think, I believe, I should rip off your guts, Chunk and see whether or not there’s any women feet you’re hiding inside of you.’

‘No.’

‘But I will do it.’

‘You won’t.’

There was little resistance as well. None could make the difference either between what was going on and where could they cut.

‘Show me what’s inside your guts.’

But he could not do it. There was no crimson shade, of curtains put in vein. Little more than needed and be thrown through, some most peculiar things that were listening to woods. Or the latter. Only thing stronger thing that entered the brats and would cather.

‘Think of guts, and show me what’s in there.’

‘I told you that I hold no foot from you and you need to listen to me so.’

For the Chunk had but a part of the created world, the greatest side of the created god, the one shaped in mounds had said so.

And he had only spoken so, with every trumpet-voice and deranged thing that entered his vile throng until he could but be wasted of thought.

‘Where do you think these heads lead it? How could I be speaking if the entirety of my body was filled, with anything but what’s important to be put in?’

‘I’m telling you.’

But the one-legged embodiment of Curtain whom had been around him knew so. That they would have to ask or stay back, or wonder at it.

If he were but a chunk of the godly creature, as he had maintained himself to be, what did the great god look like?’

Too bold to see, he could be but a leg or a foot, connected with other skin-trumpets like, but he was but a brute. As the side-stretched foot of a giant, which only gave the impression that he would seek and want to steal what the brave women whose sacrifice would not be remembered so. But to soak inside the peculiarly formed, but barricade-stretched body which wrapped itself around many a held cylindrically-twisted horn-bugs that were his organs' shapes. And most peculiar a head would be but a trumpet in the back, stretched like a tuba, which twisted his humanoid-like collar bones in whichever side they pushed to see. A hole in his chest as well for the strange cartilage train-like moving rails, of skin ingratiated with mongrel-veins, all grown around it.

The hulking giant, of such nature, as to imitate only the controlled devices of which, vehicles would bring him forth to stretch and eat the verdure that was skin.

He would look like an anomaly, stretched arms-pushed back, like giant snake-bodies only to grow in the back like giant fat-coils, wrapped around themselves, a know without anything bold, wrapped through. Features humane to appear, and as to near the most unaccountable sides, from which, the full length on top of they would but open and reveal the children-benign. Only in form and those who had been eaten away; which would only serve as to confirm that Chunk was hand in hand working with the Coils, if they were not the Chunk itself in part. Seeing how he could not be allowed to be alone for too long, this was but one possibility neither of them could pass yet. There was terror, dread and better yet, days which didn't work and no one moved.

They spent some time there, thinking about it.

Hours, Eleven hundred thousand, eight-hundred forty six years, added to eighteen hundred million months, to forty thousand billion hours and a few more minutes on the side. Sand had become so benign as of yet that it appeared to be red, neither of them being able to explain what happened either, as they merely accepted this as something which was, there and theirs and there was no reason to explain it yet or question what was happening there. It was all too tiresome, trying themselves on. Since they were but of a mind not to question yet.

The one who was seeking it said.

'Can we not move on at least? I think I shall employ both of your help in order to find the secret that I might become it.'

'Great, great, that's tantalizingly great. I think, yes.'

Curtain was but a bore. In order to pass the time as they walked for, he ripped off one of his arms and allowed for the other heads to fall off to his side. Indeed, he was. It was nice being there, pushing ahead.

There were stretched men as if on tables, unwrapped of their skin and insides as to look bare on a sheet, or bear-pelts and carpets. They bore extraordinarily long heads which were fully made and encompassed by stone-hands and arms which only appeared to work weird skin-devices planted in them. Which began singing as they could allude to a much darker fate than living in their beds.

'Ah, stop there, oh that one who seeks immortality.'

'Wait, I shall be the one who speaks in his name.'

Curtain-Kent drew forward, he was but trying to get a word in. That much was obvious by the way he was bleeding. It was profound and by the time they pushed on, at least eighty percent of the blood depth which formed in the clay veins had been completely if not nigh-completely replaced by the alcohol, mourned for. They also had weird eyes, all of them.

Or not at all, neither the man, the ones who looked for eternal life or Chunk, but he had drawn eyes, tribal-tattoo like on his chest, withdrawn.

He was Cordiality-Inverted.

And all of the sudden they were standing on the other side of the wall, all of them but unable to breathe as they were drawn inside the most peculiar hole they could seethe in for short a while.

It was a dent, in his spine. Wind came from it and whispered. Of benign thoughts and various dreams which would start on one point and end up in another, and that provided, Chunk with the forefront knowledge of what was spoke between them, as if to know, what they bore hats made out of skinned men, as they were given.

But most importantly, other than this strange twist. And despite having them walk upon the ceilings, there was something utmost peculiar as well.

One of the long necked men from the flat body-racks revealed that he could form hands in the air which were holding the stone amulets which had been used to cause the whole ruckus of stone which was strangling them time after time again until they had been worn by it. That, as much as it could be said was necessary to be dealt before it travelled further.

Yet they were spoken, as such, as it would be confirmed, without a doubt, that there was no other way to achieve it, Immortality would heed them as to go away. And yet return, let alone convey.

‘Ah, I see now. So there’s but a petty reason to be so.’

And they followed through and would to see.

Farther than it, they but found it in agony. At the core of the catacombs, they followed but the tipped, ripped off throat which floated forth. As this levitating figure could only remove some of the sound and go yonder when asked forth.

‘Here, but it lies, the secret yet benign, and listen to it now.’

It was but a strange catastrophic figure, of which desperation was but spread a limb. Beneath it legs that didn’t belong to is, all of whom were sacrificed. To his demise, but Chunk remembered, what the room and the core itself had asked. It was hard to see and the transparent, unnatural old. Membrane around his heel, and would he talk but seal; his heart was out his chest was worn proudly thrown around as It was but pushed out. A head would split and eyes were wrought, only at his finger tips now. Would he waste and wear? Would he face what happened to remain?

There was but a block and a seal-fat, a cruel chained creature that held his arm, with larger wings and smaller stings that evolution should’ve allowed it to wield so. It bore so, ever-more, in a strange access around the floor, but a fall of death, whence there stood but the growth of vines. And many a child would face the mild pain to see, the motherless cries beneath them see.

But asked now, he would not sacrifice, and would not face the wreathing, thrice. Least of all amount of petty, of wings many and little more of plenty. Dead men would wing and to spit within.

And they would split in half, the walls and keep talking of naught.

‘Enough of it, I want to hear of it now.’

That was sickening, to hear the least.

He had heard but little and would but sink, a pair of teeth uncanny. They were but shoved inside and felt the grains be pulled, and, by far.

‘I’ll listen to you now.’

Pulsating, the figure now from its core emerging, though rooted in the walls, at the end of the forbidden thrall which kept it from falling. Of which beast-like appearance and bulk of eight hardy men could not be settled through. For it would know as well, to see it through. Neither its mind, nor its filth were to make. Dragging everything down and away.

The core spoke to Chunk and the others and told them of the story of how immortality was found, for there was no other reason for it to be spoken about.

Peculiar sight, down the rotation, what appeared to be a lost channel, there would be but little to it, more in every possible direction.

Bottled-snails are cancer. Once organic matter comes into contact with them they spread. Instead their jar, but little pushes away. Tumors for eyes, growing on the sea-side, where water becomes them; foaming around until they spread; endless sea-creatures drowned and become, their bodies melting, foaming of the salt. They cannot live for long, thence they die. Water become infested. Leeches and various other mongrellic-parasites, postulated as the pest spreads to man. All because someone could not help himself but open a jar of snail, dumping into a well which leads to open water.

Then someone came out of the snail-water mass.

‘I am the Man king.’

‘No, I am the Man king.’

And they fought in evil ways, of which pagan-heathens calling them would better lay aside the Iles-wonder, what happened after?

‘I am but, what?’

‘I don’t understand.’

‘Neither do I.’

‘Then let us go.’

And they walked away covered in dog-mutt-snail matter, which was their legs, as they were crippled kings, after all and would not know how to behave. Every now and then they started eating out of their throats with little. Stopped, stopped, their eyes were pulled out, by large thin hands. And dark surroundings everywhere, appeared and would take each sight, and would to be, there was no sky, but a flat block of pain, upon a canvas that did not move. A stop motion-animation where the flat scum-clay was but put to use, flattened away. Then they would have their hearts stomped everywhere but flatten.

The dark men then put their eyes back the wrong way so they could only see their insides out, projected on everywhere, revealing as much. The right eye was out, on a king, the left eye out on the other. Both being struck with one eye, reality would not abide. They could but see. What else, creeping, see, but tress were placed one by one. In front of their eyes, right one that followed after but around. In the surroundings, a little child had followed with a mother kite connected to a peculiarly throttled lightning-shaped string that was not straight but strangled thrown around, in filth, they would bow. Erect now as they could but not understand how was it that the child was a giant cloud, his entrails open, on the side, the tube out like a frog killed by the young; he was but producing the steam.

Which gave the impression that he had been ill, covering everything behind him, working for the long fingered dark men who tempted him; while his mother was but out of reach, it was more than obvious that she could not help him.

Her heart but throttled everywhere around, but she had already harmed him, there being no possible way for him to get back at her this way. Not while she was very much in control. Happiness was of little worth to him.

‘Little child, little child, your eyes had become mildly used by those around you. What do you need after?’

‘I want to be left alone. But I am still yet to grow and be pushed around.’

‘May I apply some salt onto you, then? If you don’t mind me asking.’

One of the Man Kings asked. They were twins after all. But one of them in particular bore the backside of a giant-pushed out peculiar form, a shape which was one of the Porters, which appeared to be struggling to get out. He wore giant hands and had harmed himself before. It was with small joints he walked around. He didn’t know what time was. He would but shout and stream everything through his head. No memory lived after, he’d be dead soon after.

His eyes were squares. And they were there.

‘Enough of this, you won’t throw me in a bath of salt.’

‘Here’s a bucket then.’

Washed, then humiliated he but threw on a frown.

‘I’ve told you that I am no snail.’

‘Damn, it, then what was in that bottle?’

‘A whale.’

But how could that be? How could they have been tricked so? Both of them had but thought it was a snail in a jar. Yet it all clicked, hence the reason why one would seek to release it whereas water was.

‘And that’s why wars happen.

Your side against mine, I am but the diplomat.’

Said the child, as he looked back and nodded at the dark, thin-skinned long thin-fingers giant.

‘Then eternally, we shall be fought.

Our kingdoms cannot be shared, nor can there be any king of hope between us as well.’

‘Either than, or we’ll get through. I think. ‘

‘Here’s what we shall do. We accept your surrender, but we won’t concede a thing. We won far too many battles now to be abandoned and lay waiting.’

‘Rot with your poodles, puddles. I meant puddles, rot in your puddles.’

‘So be it.’

Thence they strained and moved away on either side.

But something called them back as they saw the child get beheaded as well as his mother get ripped to shreds as soon as they turned. It was an even worse sight of glory and of dark dirt since they saw everything through the eyes inside their brains and what appeared to be nerves.

‘Rightly so. I think we should return to home now.’

‘Indeed, we got no army.’

‘Say this, wasn’t it peculiar how the snails was but a mammal? ‘

‘Indeed it was, fellow king, indeed It was.’

They would not settle on defeat, nor lay where it was important to satiate what went on through their heads when ever so closer they had gotten to a wall. They were home, and lived into the rotting sea.

Where lay immortality.

Since the entire land-mass which had been occupied by the sea was replaced by a mass which bore a single soul, every life-form that had ever lived in there got preserved. There was no better reason yet to be unnerved. For that’s how immortality was perceived.

And this message had been carried by the create who searched for it, which in turn lend it to Shykue.

Who was pertained to become immortal.

Chamber of hearts

It was intoxicating, being in the heart room. Need to make sure they all pumped.

Some palettes of orange, green and pastry between the barrels, joins and the machines working them behind; bastardly trying each other out.

‘Clever little monkeys without heads, you were brought in, by?’

The hangers of Algiers, riders with little faces pulled aside, off their heads.

‘I think you need to pay the fee.’

With a slit and a slice, while boasting of benign.

‘I decided the deicide shall commence.’

‘Then let us begin.’

Ahead, twenty miles lay him, connected with a long strenuous put together pouch-hose that went along the mile, pushing even further than it should be allowed to sire.

He would be allowed to move, ever so forth, every now and even, but not beyond the point, where ripped. But a side; would to be cut and put through ride, they but followed through.

‘I shall rule this land in my name.’

With the initiative taken, he but could not stay his hand. He was attached, would not be allowed, and stay his pride, as to satiate what came onto him. A dread, a piece; would to be a miss, he but carved his name.

‘Folksome, Folksome, on you as well.’

On the tip of a hardy man’s chest; on every stone and every piece and every tracksuit as well, on ground and in his arm, on their homes, their roofs, ladders, their horses and mares, and even, though they could not see, and even though, to be, this was senseless, how he carved. His constellation, yet none touched. Despite his wearisome appearance, and the tattered robes of a king whom had decayed, he wore the hose outside, and would remain but looking like a rattlesnake having bit, his heart poisoned, they spoke of him.

‘Ah, but this alone makes sense. I suppose. We need to slay it, so he may be froze where he lay.’

They settled as much and would today, but cut that part of him that would destroy everything in haze.

‘Ah, but I see no chamber filled.’

Outside, between the door, where the block they stilled themselves, and then again. Have come in droves, dozens of them, as well as swords and maces, hard to admire, they came upon them and released what came to be and be admired. But a single strike and a heaviness uneasy; blows mightily queasy. Since they were torn on both sides, brought boulders from the nearest lake and put it on, where they lie. Yet none have settled, none to do. They could not push themselves through.

Boy born in a trunk

‘I was born inside a cradle across the sea. My father hissed at me as he fished my trunk from the bottom of a sea ravine where I would’ve drowned. My mother was a fish, she died the same day, although my father never told me about my conception.’

He was a human with a weird fetish. He told people about his story only to watch them hiss him. Bloodied eyes rolled inside his cranial forest which had grown on top of the broke sea that’s been a result of the destroyed world, as a result of a long-fallen comet-like eye-shape which had assimilated half of the planet. It looked at him and had taken a liking to the man. Not because of the peculiar setting which his peculiar story appeared to be put in.

But because his brain was shaped like an odd talisman made out of four’s put together, curving into long sausage-like lobe-shapes as the ends of the fours drove inside his cranial form, then lead down below his anchor-shaped body.

He spoke to his father often, who was a boy.

This was the second father, as he had killed his first father and claimed his son as his father instead of claiming him as his own. The child was confused since they stood near one of the docks for a considerable amount of time. His eyes were empty circles, his mouth was below his chest. A tubular body like that of a snake-man hybrid came out, wriggling every now and then, telling him stories as he appeared to, further more confirm the fact that the man had been fished out of a ravine and had been saved from drowning.

They spoke to the sea. But water froze at their touch, as they would never be allowed to return any longer, to a kingdom that would disappear in the night, at the bottom of a restless ocean. It had been made out of fish, whose flight could be seen when time approached. They often shared pearls and heard the songs of an old man, across the sea, tapping his finger, as if to see whether or not he was listened to. Although the fish never answer, his heart wish there was a day he could limp no more and join them.

It’s been a while since he had considered it, and now it had been the time.

And every now and then, upon seeing past the short, his empty boat could be seen about, lost in the flows of a lost horizon that was there no more. The old man’s head was split into two giant fish-heads. Both of them had been frowning for a long time. Despite being attached to a humanoid body, one could see why they longed to return to their people. They were longed for. As a mother longs its eggs during their incubation period once they had finally settled to make it on their own and leave her forever, that is how they longed to return to a home of their own.

It was dreadful and the sea was concave. Probably because of the currents or the bouncy which deformed the sea from a constant straight view, to a completely bumped thing that wasn't flat at all.

He had never learned the rules of standing. And he was of a lot that could not wait any longer. Little boy, who stands against him, you must know that he's watching you, closely so.

He showed him lights, and the boy thought himself a father.

He was drowned soon after.

'I thought this would happen. I could never keep a father alive. Everyone who wants to take care of me ends up dying.

I do not understand.

Why must life be that way?'

A man rushed from the other side of the street, he was staring at him. He's been doing so for a long, long time. His face was scum and cut by a pair of evil scissors. They were neck-robbed of the clean kill since someone stole it from him. His upper side above the collar bones which entered the vaguely looking trumped hole appeared to be wrapped around. He said so.

'You just killed that boy with a pair of scissors.'

'Indeed I have and I must add that I'm mightily impressed that you realized that on your own. I've been watching your for a long, long time and I decided it is the perfect time to ask you as much. I want you to be my father.

You must sire me as your son as we must form a family, together, the two of us, adopt me now as men do in the lions' den or in the arena where they adopt courage from their gods. As of me as you would ask of Zeus to grand you a great favor that I may bestow upon you my status as your son. Make me someone you shall cherish more than yourself and of your own, for I shall always be there, your son, the only one. But tell me of and let it be known whether or not there's any sibling I may be made aware off, as there can be no possible or worst offence.

Know that I take full responsibility for the murders of both of my fathers, from which I may never be able to get away off, and for that I tell you, still, accept me so. Knowingly you shall invite me in your home, where I shall join your table, and I shall be welcomed by whomever I may be presented to as.

And they will accept me indeed or they shall die, why? Because I am cruel and I've been born so. Because my parents abandoned me to die in the depths of a trunk at the bottom of the ocean, out of their plain wooden raft, upon which they drove from, at noon out of the evil Iles upon the day I was born, knowing that I would turn out to be evil.

It's ever so clear that my real father had been a good, kind hearted man who had traveled upon the Iles of evil and had taken a woman for himself, oh, so boundlessly caught in his own affairs, his heart being settled on having her of plain thought and of her body through, be weary of his say.

As he had written on my back as I will show you.'

And he attempted showing him the letters which had been carved on his back as a child, yet they grew up the wrong way and became illegible and the man could not understand anything that was written on his back, instead, he'd taken the boy's word. And he's taken him home, as one of his own for now and all eternity, for all boys were in need of fathers, regardless of their upbringings and heed to be and naysay.

Thus he was welcome in his home. And it was a garden inside a house, with every tree grown through and every den and every borough just a little while, there he would feel again like a child. Little evil red mushroom people without arms and without facial features approached him with large mushroom-knives coming out of their chests. They fought one another and many died instead of reaching a point of resolve. That was a constant in the house, which he asked for, to be ignored by any possible means, since the danger would outdo his wrong-doing heart which only, as it happened was put to the shrouds of uncanny, plain to see, he was trying to look and would see. Indeed, he sat on a chair after and drank from a cup and the cup was made out of their slit throats and a door opened and there was a tooth, it hurt, a lot. Right.

His name was Bobonk.

'I am indeed called, dear father, now I am here. Now, I want. Please, I want to. Introduce me to my sister, I shall meet her and slit her little punk-teddy bear.'

'Don't kill my daughter.'

'Is that a command then?'

'No.'

'Then I shall slay her and I shall. Stop, get off.'

But Bobonk could not deal with the strange things that tried surroundings him.

'I am alloy, man that is made of something that's metallic, like iron or steel.'

'And I am his son.'

Said the family that lived in one of the mushrooms, but they were splashed under by a tine spittle of acid which came from heavens, where all the evil people lived, with point huts and spiked mandibles which were used to eat out of the huts in order to spit them out in a way which would make them even more deformed than they were before so they could attain more spikes that were not real spikes, but appeared to deformed, as. To be certain they were half-chewed spikes that dragged some of the material over as they pushed out of themselves.

They lived like a happy family for a while. It was plain to see that he cherished their time together, ever since he was introduced to his new yet-to be father. As one would inherit his sin; so would he be the latter.

‘Ah, the floor is moist.’

And so was his angler, woman on the wall. Woman on the sky-floor, woman on the door; there was a woman in his drink and a woman cigarette, a woman pill and woman-blanket, he could not stop thinking of a woman yet. How plain to see that woman was but a gorgeous flower. She had to be taken home and treated as such. She was but red in a speck of roses, and red in a Communistic regime. That’s what woman was, plain to see, such a beautiful thing she were, plain to see. There was nothing near one such creature, of such beauty and embrace, that which but made the world work upon her, only to impress the likes and nothing more. What a cruel beauty she was off, this creature, which doubt would be embed with little more than the matron touch of her womanhood and likes, he thought during their meal; women.

Although, unexpected, it was this day he chose to go ahead and leave the house. This being but a single chance to spare himself of the sight; seeing them eye to eye, there was the pass to the other house, theirs would be followed through within the hour. Their people but standing at each floor, at every window, at every minute, second hour, making sure no one was unseen. They were guarding a giant grade which was held as if it were an ashen tray, on many hindered legs of metal that were put through, holding it before the chance.

Despite it being a manor house, every floor had been completely broken apart and lay to ruin only to make as much space as possible for the create to be in. Otherwise, there were the sounds inside the crate, always the sounds. People were trapped in, but there was no way to see or figure out whether or not, somehow, someone had been the result of them. Theirs was an uncanny matter. Living in there; while on the outside, everything was chained. The metal railed-ladders leading to the highest point, where a few nuclear-powered battery unit were condensing matter into the crate.

From the ancient gothic-looking place, there was nothing left, other than what they were guarding. It was harrowing, trying to figure out whether or nothing something was left of their minds. Men who passed along the street saw them as somewhat wholesome schizophrenics turned on themselves, paranoid, eyes on their backs and sides, always watching, not to be caught off guard. Mirrors could be seen even from the distance, on every floor, but never the whole blunt reach of the destruction. Other than the impression of this being an abandoned floor, there was nothing to it, only the feeling of being somewhat distraught as to lose its own appeal.

A carpenter’s distraught attire, on a single man there.

But, during one night in particular where the Bobonk drew nearer to the sight, upon the plain single distraught light, he saw a way in. He knew he was being watched but upon a sight of courage, he’s made it through. The door was locked, but a click from the other side made him feel like he was awaited, as soon as he had crossed over, the door finally, open-ended; remained in place, stuck mid-way, fingers rimmed along the way, not human but magnetic with a pulse.

It was implausible, finding himself in that pseudo-formed chamber, all of the sudden met by a single filled empty cocoon which had stood there, encased in still and connected from a branch, it was shaped like two big tubes that were cracked in the middle and wore a single open curtain-winged shape which cut itself in the middle before it pushed on. Within his reach he saw it recede into a single bowl, connected upon a scepter made out of torn out mummified worthless whores. They've been put it, wrapped through and through, made to lay their hands on it as they were sacrificed in order to push it through.

He stared at nothing but he was there.

From every angle and every floor they watched him carefully, as if not to dare, he'd not move an inch or a muscle, not too sudden or to worsened a movement that would put him in thought, he was brought about to an inch of his nerved and almost came to shout out.

'Leave me be, I'll have none of it.'

The child had said, he was but of a little mind, he was there.

He was beguiled by them. As they opened their mouths, morbidly stretched about as to form the shapes of finely painted eyes; as to be called but pearls by Vermeer, pointed at him, they whispered and they sang. Peculiarly inclined about the room, but always aiming themselves down, as to not allow a second more. For breathing through this held them more towards, benign a matter; what happened after dragged for as long. In the coming of a second, spreading, they were but pointed at the hour, always mending one another for the miss. They were no longer, to be called at peace, none was watching the streets.

But the boy continued, turned towards the disease. It called upon him, strange device, pulled on him to draw inside, as if the cocoon had but been formed into the cocootier, which dragged him on. To seethe in there and wait inside, to loom like a child, slowly cradled. Upon each heaved disaster, songs were wasting, ever grew the dark. Within the end of the minute, the power came out. And he slept the night, enwrapped and holding.

'He looks at mirrors in the night, the boy.'

'What happened to his late-father then?'

'He was found by the sea, where he was born.

He was put back in the landing-area near the shore, away from the dock, they say. He was there among the seals for many a day, all avoided by them, never before touched.

They, whom had warmed one another, and were known to approach strangers after dark, to have wrapped their heat and to be placed against bodies of men; they avoided him nonetheless. It was them and them alone, we should be weary off.

I seek not to question such things, sir, since I am not one of a superstitious lot, but if you must know what I claim. It's quite bizarre how they come even now, around the spot.

They form circles in the night, as if they're weary of the sand itself from which he sprouted, left.

They say he was but born out of it and then taken, claim, led but not to shore. And basked away and thrown off boards, they claim the child had been. I never took no kindness on a whim, sir, but I believe they wouldn't lie, with such a thing in mind.'

'And why do they call these the Evil Iles, if you don't mind me asking, good man?'

‘Aye, it’s a strange thing, I suppose, what they claim of us to be, when our blood but froze when we hear, I certainly wouldn’t kill to be here during the long cold winter morns, where the souls are but put in house, and sail alike when the night comes.

We don’t get visitors that day, at least not the kind we look the other way when they draw. I’m tirelessly afraid of what they might do to me, as they come. They knock on wood when I speak and hear. And they beat on wood on the other side of the Isle when I’m near. That’s how they guide you to them, sir.

That’s how they want me to enter their home, clearly watched. They want me wrapped inside, they want to make sure I do not talk until I’m done so in wood. It’s the ship that there is, not the same. It’s just not the same.

They took mine away, and put the wood back from where I take it, and they make me pay for everything I’ve done so far. And they want me gone by the hour, sir. That’s the thing they always say of me.’

‘Who are they men?’

‘Little spirits of the Isles, they are, they’re the ones who blessed the woman, from which that thing spawned.’

‘So she did give birth on land.’

‘And she was watched from around by her servants the seal, who took her back, they say. After she was done, many wanted to return and look away for the child. They are purposefully afraid, I fear for what might happen after that.

If he somehow makes it to the sea again, it’s tainted, follow me.’

And he pointed at a little parcel, plain of wood, he shouldn’t have lived there, burnt, of scrawny stoves, and little dark stone around, everything rose to him, plain as it were, the windows and the ground floor, he has been aware of it, for a while. Making it so every finger rose, and every hair froze where stay. His little candles misplaced, in the chaotic fire that occurred. Good-man Sailor shook there, in the corner, with his wooden mask put on for a while. He was acting like a child just thinking of the vile surprise he was thinking about. What they pointed at and how they spoke to him from that point on. It went through the chimney, it had, with a little hole inside it, never knowing how he’s done it. He was but trying it on again, trying to eat through in, and put a tooth where it belonged, back in, they came.

He had but never considered them having arrived through mouth but sunken, within the next minute inside his liver, standing, scraping after every wall.

‘But what are you doing there? Come on, get up already, I need you level-headed so you could explain to me where he’s gone to.’

‘I cannot sir, they, I must have you leave my house immediately.’

He spoke, seeing how the smoke had risen and the bloody fog was but along the way. It was too cold for a man to stave off his beating heart, as they had gotten along the way.

It was a warding nail he's asked the man to put inside his forehead, as a pin, but long within a finger-length, put right through, hammered in.

He had done it personally himself he did it. He felt it, hardly. As it followed, bleeding through, within an hour's sake, he called, not to make himself forlorn.

Upon the waking.

'I woke up in the house, in the middle of the night.

They called it the Blue-ravine, because that's where all the blueberries fell in. They call it home.'

The children who brought the man there, part by part; each child had a cut around his belly, where they stored him, his head for example, being in a young girl. But she was not human. On the inside he saw the fiend that kept him still to this world. It smile, contortedly, as if the time had finally come to bring him back into living.

He woke up in the midst of a prayed. He saw only the end of the great stairways, a room to the left, two on the right, doors wide open. A few men being dressed in peculiar clothes chanting around the fire; as they all hid from the gray outskirts that had lain outside, with him in front of the gathered about children whom finally unwrapped themselves, as to be made whole. It was a solid unwrapped sheet-like eight put-together torsos, with two twisted beauty eyes, a swamp-mold mouth that mixed with the nostrils and long-legs which helped the body reach the ceiling as soon as it was revealed. Put around.

It bore not hands but four large limbs that drew thinly at each end, where the grown erected figures of malformed together figures appeared to be inflated and deflated.

'You stay here.'

It said, then walked like a giant spider to the his left and was not seen since.

He tried making it for the exit but a bookshelf appeared out of nowhere and blocked the only way out like a reeling-in wall. Seeing how there was naught else to do, he rested there for a while.

It was never ending; and there was no problem making out the walls and the features any longer. They were all a blend of destruction put just about the place. First man that ever came in contact with me was him, Hen.

'You're one of the associates, I presume.'

'Of course I am, who else were you expecting?'

'I don't know anymore. I wish I did, but now, it's all a blur.'

'Have you tried looking behind you?'

'I will.'

It was just as much as he could do now. Within the first steps they both drew in the pop. It was the only way out, like a tunnel, but you had to crawl through it, on all four. There was no dignity to it but you had to do it if you wanted to get out. And everyone wanted out, no matter who it was behind them, young old, older, even their cripples, the ones with stank-legs. It's what they called necrosis, when it spread. Actually spread.

Not only on the body, but just about the place; it was easy to see why everyone was trying to avoid him. Second man, Hymn, the dancer; a harlequin, followed through the belt, he didn't look like it, he wasn't there. Not one of the men who made it on the other side. More pushed through.

'We need to cross.'

'Where to? I see no way through, at least not safely, unless you're thinking of something else?'

'I think I know of some way.'

A flasher came. Thrown by one of the troopers that crossed the streets, they were fond of doing it, especially at the worst of times when people were looking. Their eyes being burnt off; if there was something left, it was the rotten man, who was the one put in charge looking over.

'It's going to be a long mile, you realize that? '

'Of course I do, please take your hands off me.'

He pushed around for a few moments, threw his hand off, his thumb placed right on the side of his pointer, kneeled on the sight. They followed through. For some reason it seemed all too convenient, four rows, twenty families, all watched through safely. Without a flasher, without a ripple in the water, without a stone falling down; they were off.

Beyond the valley, it was the intersection between Cal and Brooks, what was left of them, twenty ribs and scars, and dark cracks around the glider, all brought down. The Public Library across the mountains, brought down as well, people rang about the place, all put there, rotting for public display but not dead, only standing. They were given food and water pouches every few hours, there was enough to spare, but not enough busy hands to wrap around them.

The sight was dim and morose but it had served its purpose for the time being.

'Hi, I'm Gin, I'm supposed to carry you over to the other side. It's only a few miles away, I swear.'

'How do I know I could trust you?'

'I suppose you can't. That's why I'm here with her. She's supposed to, you know what.'

He pointed at a rendition of Saint Mary. She was worn out, but they could all feel her presence seeping onto them. It was the reason no one walked in. For a short period of time, everyone watched how it popped off her place, off the large set of plants upon which she stood, get up, fly around their eyes as it got terribly close right before it disappeared in mid air.

She was knee-high, coming out of the ground in the distance, standing there like a giant, with red blocks of eyes, little serpentine-torso elongated Maries coming out of her dark cavernous sockets as soon as they saw it fit to come out. They were chewing dark insects before spitting them out. The men came to realized that this was not Mary at all.

‘What did you do to her?’

‘I? I didn’t.’

Before the man could finish what he had to say, a group of people came around and wrung his neck out.

Mary reappeared in the same spot.

‘Good riddance, I knew I couldn’t trust the man.’

They walked around. It was a shore-floor, and one could hear the sea in the other rooms, yet everything wore the frames of a dark house which was put in. Left there, as peculiarly placed as possible; it was a twist of chopped forests that made the top of the ceiling, chopped in their entirety, with the soil, spruce, animals, acorns, squirrels, yet there was no blood and no edifice and most of the parts appeared to be sutured together in the most uncanny fashion.

It was a given that they did not enjoy being there.

But they took a break from walking and began eating on the floor. Most of the families took out sandwich bags and crayons. They ate what they could. They threw the people who suffered of food poisoning away. Then they resumed talking.

‘I’ve seen it before. It happened before. It’s where they bring you when you lose faith. It’s the devil I wage, he’s the one trying to take us in.’

‘That or someone knows you’re of a superstitious lot.’

‘Blow me.’

‘No.’

‘I’m going to kill you then.’

‘If that spared me of looking at something like that again, do it.’

‘Or you could do it.’

They stopped talking.

He thought himself a fancy rider.

They rode before midnight, they rose within the setting sun, they rode on dogs, most of them, who carried them, but then, when they showed signs of them being worn out, most had to be put down.

The dogs simply ate their masters’ corpses and continued instead of them.

More than a few coyote families made it along the way. It was not something either of them wanted to consider, but there were too many dead ends to make out any longer.

One was blue, one was ochre, one was green-teal, one way purple like the berries. But they could not distinguish the colors, it was what made them, know, feel, where were they going?

It wasn't the sea inside the rooms and this peculiar building didn't seem to end. At its every side one could be sure. Someone was going out of his way to start a fire.

They settled with just as much, getting through the rooms, finding out that there was no sea but a strange man-tilted gramophone figure that was struggling to jiggle out of a chair. His mouth was sea-led in, yet connected through the device by a slit. Both of them were eaten, the dogs not knowing where to go. Simple doors didn't stop them, even though they had no opposable thumbs.

And it was getting fairly dark. That's the way they got to the entry place, then they turned around.

A few men were praying to a pile of crayon-pegs, burnt-dark. They weren't to be touched. Something about them creped the coyotes, which were all but gathered around and huddles in curled balls that by now reached the ceiling. Having stopped on top of one another served as nothing other than some excuse to fit as many of them over as they could possibly do it.

No one could understand it.

But the dogs but bugged into one another's skin, forming a great moving bulk; knowing that it was the only possible way they could prevent one another from falling prey to the walls around them. It wasn't like they were shrinking, that would be ridiculous, but their hairs had become too penetrating, as they were being slowly bled. Yet neither of them moved.

They listened to the walls chew.

Third man; he appeared out of nowhere, he was a father to the boy, he was but a bulk too high absorbed, he was no humanoid, he was hard to see, but immediately appeared from one side to another, inside every possible edifice that grew inside the ground. He was but to appear and dread himself, once one knew what to look at. He was no man, but a fiend; and this fiend but ate the boy's ear, then left.

It's important to know why he did it, and what the reason was for every imprint he spat on the walls, shaped like the boy's lost appendage, which soon enough began to crawl around its mouth.

Feeling rather guilty, the boy simply ripped his other ear off, then listened to it out of the gap that lay on his other side. He felt no pain whatsoever.

He was touched somehow, how he listened to appearing shapes of sound. They were the ones that made this world they said.

'Come, come, follow, follow.'

'Come on now, follow, follow.'

'Your father is calling, we know you want him.'

But they didn't lead him to the man. Instead they were but trying to get him somewhere else, where he could be happy. It was a dark place, an attic-like room which was as small as a box.

The sounds of the ocean still managed to come around, despite what he felt like. It was still inside the dogs, for some reason, the gramophone creature, which was no longer human, after being partially digested, dissolved and chowed down between them, despite his apparent put-together shape.

They enjoy beating on the walls, constantly, it was what made them happy, for some reason. It was an elating, again, they released him and made him walk.

Forced him, even; most importantly, he met the strange figures before he could be retaken by the men inside that room. As peculiar as it seemed, they were carrying a great serpent-like head which had stretched from the body of the dog. After pounding on it for a few moments, it spat out a man. It was someone whom he'd come to see as none other than one of the fathers he had killed, right from the boat.

His first reaction being that he pointed up with a finger. There were the ripples of the sea that could be seen through. There was the shadow and the outline of a boat, yet there was no one in it.

Yet his trunk was by no means small, nor lacking, as to fail to accommodate to a young boy's needs as he was growing.

There wasn't much traction being gotten either way.

Being return to the place of his birth, this peculiar thing he had come from made him feel rather, conscious of how much he missed life outside.

He had never expected ending up there, but at the same time, he could never return either.

Peculiar little rod

It was but put on top of a bile pile, they walked, the workers yet they couldn't find anything over a couple of too long to spare hours.

Either way, both of the eight men who were present there, were under the impression that there was, by no means any way of breaking through the cradles that were left behind by the sea-faring docks, upon the departure of which a great black hollow spot left the city with nothing short of an utmost eerie location children chose to call 'The Dock of the Departure.'

In which case the men were rather stumped by it, upon the arrival of which, being met by this dark finger print upon which no single drop of water appeared to advance, they had resolved that this was no discussable manner for folk like them, resolving to draw themselves as farther away from the point of this dark shore's inception, to the ends of which they were forced upon such an encounter as to make themselves be fashioned in a an utmost queer-like fashion, as the men looked rather ghoulishly pale. Upon their stumbling stupor, that one might be rather set on perceiving it as the tool that might bring destruction and the woe of the past upon them.

For what seemed to seep through the confines of the black coffin black powdered kegs was but the uncanniest of strangest things.

Auxiliary Complex

‘And thus the end is concluded.’

‘Who is to be declared the victor in that case?’

‘The Legion of Eyl’Seh.’

With that he hung the flag on the periphery of the long stretch. They weren’t going to make it for more than a few obvious reasons. The Legion was broke, standing on lost flights of steps in front of them, unmasked but put down while standing still. Lonesome but uncannily distraught, regarding them, they were sunken like rods, feet deep into a mound of much worse to look at plain to see eye-lips. Most of them moved around as soon as they could come back to life, cracking like eggs before the Men of Pollution started coming out the flight of steps that lain below, in the heart of a giant drop that was solidified then was attached to many peculiar cord-like extensions, all of which shot into it forming long tunnels that lead in the middle of a four interconnected bridges where peculiarly crested throatless, limbless torsos that had giant spiked fingers coming out of their chests, bloodied as they charged one another, killing as many as millions of their own, only to form heaps where they would lay for hours, incapable of making out what was happening in the Auxiliary Complex, which was then put back together before anything could seep back it.

This grand structure was mightily set, for now, as an open hangar, closed inside, each room but being polluted as it was shoved by a giant moving hand-like grabber, incisors being set about.

But these peculiar purple-darkish Practitioners all of the sudden came from the right flank. Large peculiar backpacks filled with gizmos and much to grab stranger looking concave walls.

The machinery set aside, they were hit inside.

But the corpses they were hanging around in flight by the most uncanny trench-bamboos and red rape carpets that were thrown around in the mess. Their finger-like protrusions squirming like larvae-pikes, during uncanny charges set into malignant sights. They would be bored, eventually by the time they returned to their senses, being incapable of making it right.

The Complex, reddened with rust pulsed out of sight as it but thrust away at the first sign of the most uncanny and most disgusting of the touches, to which its walls reeled in and out as if pushed by stringed winds, strong feelers touching in and out.

And there, in a corner, one of the eighteen barracks shook. The men but arose immediately despite being in a place they shouldn’t be pulled into.

‘Turn on the lights.’

A flip of a switch revealed as much as eighteen floating lamps of various sizes.

‘You will from now on address to me as the Mayn Malignnant.’

‘Mayn Malignnant, why have they gathered around you like a flock of stoves?’

Mayn turned around, being presented with a line that stood as if they were trained to act as such, without even bothering of paining themselves to leap through the hoops as to get his attention, in the same way everyone else appeared to be behaving. They were but asked to pull out their arms, aim, then take a shot. Several shots had been taken immediately, having felt little to no remorse whatsoever about what was about to happen. Complete and utter annihilation of their openings, revealing their non-organic stuffing, inside a pair of unnatural low-hanging anatomically distraught and rather abstractly made rib-cages, as in multiple smaller ones, as that of men but not likely. They were somewhat similar in size but not the same; regardless of it, they served fine enough for a frame of reference to be established, since there was no other way to illustrate their sheer size as well as the contrivance they carried with them. Since they were indeed, dangerous beasts that were to be properly handled.

Guard duty is boring duty, especially on boarding day.

‘Hey, come here Georgie-lard, let’s have a smoke, let’s have a drink, let’s do heroin, cocaine and LSD, crack sheets, let’s drink some bourbon scotch, let’s eat something come.

There’s a tv here, there are cameras around the place, there’s a monkey juggling its arms around, you have to see thing, you have to be here with me, come on, keep me company.’

‘Very well, what do you want from me? You know I can’t be staying here for long, bad things happen all the time and I’m very much afraid that I won’t be able to keep it along much longer. I’m disabled, you see?’

He pointed at his legs, they weren’t there. He was standing on a broken arse which had been dragged along like a little pile of horse manure, then dumped in front of him by one of his colleagues.

‘You know Georgie-Lard, you know that most relationships around here don’t hold on much longer than seven years right? I mean in general. Marriages, friendships, work-duties, so on and so forth.’

‘Your point being?’

‘Well, since I brought this up, you’d think I’d have a good point, wouldn’t you?’

‘I would think that.’

‘Indeed, you would, but you’re also forgetting something, Gerogie.’

‘That being?’

‘Your time, I’m looking at my clock now and from the looks of it, I’m sorry to say that your time is simply up, Gerogie-Lard, the seven years are up.

No more scotch, cigars, and drugs for you, and you want to find out why? Wait, don't guess, you don't have to bother with that. You won't have to worry about being a cripple any longer because I'm going to kill you here and now, you're going to be made to suffer because I want you so.'

'What have I done to deserve this though?'

'You're alive, still alive and it's not you, nor me, it's only that you don't have the means to keep this relationship going. Look, I'm nothing else and nothing other than some troubled soul myself, and I can't be bothered to keep hands with you all the time, do you know what I'm trying to say?'

It's that, I'm tired, I'm so, so tired of losing and getting new friends, new companions, new, old, stale, worn-out, too much luggage, you see? And I know you've been trying your best to keep this going but it's not working.'

'We're not hedonists, you know that right? It doesn't work the way you think it work it does.'

'And that's why I hate you, I hate your guts and I'm going to slit your throat and bury myself in it, it's because I hate you, I loathe your absence, you know what that is?'

You're a soulless thing, but not because of what you look like, though that may be in part, but because you're a cripple and you're bothering everyone else, including them.'

To which Karl pointed at the flock of floating peculiarly shaped dove-like elongated peculiar bodies with mock-spider legs which ended in long mouths with string-like puppeteer cords that pointed upwardly to peculiar canopy shared faces projected on the peculiar facet. Many of them even bearing half-an inch teeth that came out of the surface and bent around the steely things. Wingless spans appeared to be bore both ways, in and out but couldn't have been fathomed for long since it meant what it meant. There was no reason to be there either, but they did what they could. Below them stood a few of the men who bowed their heads in coveted shame. It wasn't something either of them could deal with or wanted to do about the hour, but it was as much as they could. It was settled, he had to be killed. It was a sad turn of events. Those beings above them, to be certain about the main mass, it appeared that the peculiar half six-formed, as in three on each side mock-spider joints were after all downwardly pointed, while the cords were rather jerky and more like gut-hoses, or air-pumps which connected to the top canopy, which itself was only fat below, as to form a ceiling while above it, the area was rather upwardly convex and filled with some kind of fat. Not balloon-like but it still floated. And they were the companions of the floating finger-spear-like torso-shapes which appeared to be limbless but the stuffing gave it away as it bore a general dark glow to them, as well as it was made out of some tubular gangrene-acid growths of many arms and many peculiar head-like torsions.

The Auxiliary complex, to be sure, had a most peculiar power-base, artificially enchanted by the most unnaturally-distraught battery shaped Silos that were put outside the Main-Row, which was surrounded by a pseudo land base that was eighteen hundred thousand miles from the Hospital, in a secluded area near the Hope-Chapel which was a Torture-box placed upon a towering building structure which appeared to have large wing-like formation that attracted every kind of creature to grow on it. That Chapel was but a peculiarly constructed land mass, such as a whale if it stood erect and didn't move at all. Regardless of which, there was no reason to address it just now, but there were eighteen soldiers that were somewhat vampire like but only in their backs. As if they were born conjoined, somehow; no, rather, it's as if vampire-like creatures that were made out of gelatin rested in their coffins. Then the soldiers came along and simply sat on them in the same way the vampires slept, as if to place themselves directly, perfectly on top to match. Then they simply melted through those vampiric forms, having teeth-fangs pushed into their brains, which attached their bodily forms, contorting them into a being. Of course the way in which they seated themselves wasn't perfect at all, since those vampire arms merely poked around the bodies while pushing the soldier's organs farther into their guts, but that was something no one could've accounted for. This procedure was done in hopes that super-soldiers could be created. Soldiers that would have double-straddled pair of muscles, although that did somewhat seem to work, it only added to their leg-shapes, which in turn was somewhat useless since it took away some speed from the men, who were set on a peculiar incline since this fusion or hybridization was awful and resulted into something that did more harm than any good.

Regardless of it, there was a long road ahead of them. Since they were one of the boxes; since they were put in a loop, their brains being sucked of blood, a few IV javelins were shot through their guts, then attached to a giant heat-radiator which produced violent waves that forced guts to become bubbles.

'I have to put you down, I'm sorry Georgie-Lard.

Before my mind just shoots away in whichever direction might it know off.'

He took out a carved knife with all the marks in there, all those who spoke of evil in their diseased guts were brought to such a snare as if to suffer forever when they could not be fathomed to live for long during such a time as it would be allowed for them to slit their own guts open and drool and drawl, then crawl inside. A wax or iron, other alloys; put together and caved in as if it was taken from a grand piece which was but a mesh that was taken through, so much abuse in the guts had settled and would claim anew.

'Here, it is done.'

He said, as soon as he had grabbed his friend by the throat, the cave-in put through was swollen and run.

But lo', in time one could see. There was no sand, and no claim to the planet be; there was something to it, those glowing particles and grains. Whichever creature summoned and of which reins but claimed it to be the destruction of the Earth.

The Prophet was wrong, instead unnerved, he couldn't see through those microscopic atoms that were set in flight, the constellation of land put through, that the giant shadow of the Creature-Ophelia had hugged the planet as if it were hers, to land. Every little change-in colors was but a fraction of the world, all those little particles and every atom-like thing that switched and mourned was twisted as for the likes. It was the complete and utter destruction which in turn was held. Then when the time came, she, it but formed every building of everything, back to where it once was.

Yet there was no possible explanation for the damned hours that were spent through waiting. Or what these new buildings, new societies and new-carved in things were. There was no possible explanation for whence they appeared or what the reason for it had been, for one could see himself but cut and carved, through head at last and barred like a mundane man without legs.

Despite the fool's best intention, Zlaslow, in the future lasted. Cast upon such a desire, deliriously lasted, he and Rose but found the room, reactivating the means through which the others, upon a swoon might get away, to push and never end, and get through, not to last as much as they would be cast out of the paradise they lost their temples to.

But alas, those are but different times. And the after-math was but disgust.

'There, my dear Georgie-lard, you flee, you flee, I see, I see.'

For he stood in front of him, raised as if on tar-like legs, barely kept away, but floating, levitating like an unfathomably corrupted ghost, one who couldn't help himself swaying, not to be kept during worse and worse of times, but put through yonder, suffering that was benign.

He simply turned around, and seemed likely to make the others push away. They did not like looking at the wretch. It was a wretch unlike no other, this was no brother of theirs, but merely an unfathomable creature of disgust upon the hour of which he yelled.

'I wish I be return to the realm of the future where my master lay.'

He begged for it, even though everyone else thought he might try killing them or at the very least to have attempted such assault upon their beings that there would be no chance for them to get away from his malignant sight. For he wanted to butcher them and splatter their insides just about the place but there was nothing that would push them away from where he stood as fear would only cast them to the one with such a face. He was there, in sight of him, even thought his bloody yolk eyes were but shattered-cracked and made as if to rot in air.

Where he walked in flight and where the stack of forms and all the memories he'd seen them all, grow upon the body of the wretch. For even thinking of him caused the mind upon such phallic disgust to stand erect and spread within uncanny nature of disturbing flights.

It stood out there, unnaturally so until pushing away it stood and spared nothing else, of might. It was wretched, him to be.

Zlaslow was but tainted, of pairs, not to be called. Not to be named, not what he saw on himself upon such platforms upon which he spared, upon the crossings of many roads which lead to a fall, upon which he but floated on his platforms, stalling his death as to spread in every angle and in everything until they but bore him, ah. There he stood. Many ovals upon a mass, they were all his but opened their mouths. Many pillars but were kept by teeth, all pushed out and wreathed as if to shake, above them the basin. Sharpened as they were made of two pieces, holding upon the top as a diamond rock of skin held but the bodies, within, but his, all of them without their heads, one could see where they migrated and where they were kept. Beneath this peculiar mass, which was but pushing to the side as to form a rectangular protrusion upon which hanged but one great horn, one of many pieces that were put together, yet sworn. Filled with his substance, yet wasting, many vehicles and many beddings, floors and what was there not?

The main form of his stood upon a wretched thin, a worm-like sack which became a sting, still hanging to the right. Beneath it but three tusks, mammoth-like in girth and trunk, all but of cartilage and skin, standing on the platforms which kept it within the seals, within the chains, which dragged along and fell and fell; endlessly pushing into the pit, dragging along the most unnatural heaps. And he, but the man, his mane and his skull exposed as well, but floated above his ever irresolute body, but another one joined, the two of them standing, impaled from above, their heads but forced to wail upon their lost bodies that were there.

The gap of land but pushing in and out, spreading around, then reeling back in, in the middle of a town; where the most unfathomable creatures prayed; yet in vain they could not move again, as their feet contorted and became Semites. Sutured in as many forms which were put to waste upon the sight, it was just one thing stuffed.

Bloody diamond of clot-rock; it was not spared, it was not fair, it was nothing to be put past them. Eating the children, they sacrificed their women and most unfathomable creatures that could stumble upon their filthiness, of much duress that called upon such loneliness.

There was a conflicting thing about the Auxiliary unit that occupied two quarters of the room alone, ever so thoroughly as to take everything from its surroundings. It moved, ever so slowly but thoroughly when no one knew what happened. There and here.

A few main frames, fake ones, they were worked by the Outer things, those who came from outside the Complex, many more of them looked like men but whose heads were thin, much thinner and tinted like a dark little pencil sticker that popped at the top; with a reason. And that reason kept the whole world going in the future. They looked like they stopped growing, holding themselves in some transparent tubes that were held by metal racks, and metal holders, as if they were a biologist or a chemist's lab project. Yet they stretched through matter, through atoms and most importantly through time. They topped their tops and popped at the top as well. It was beyond any reasoning and beyond conceit, beyond any question and what was left of it was this. Important to note; moreover they were the little puckers that extended and grew along while spreading everywhere, modifying what they pleased until everything was completely touched and made do.

It was settled as much as they were apt to it. Rearranging mass, being asked for the employ. Reality was paranoid, it moved around when it was not heard, touched or listened to, like a dirty kitchen filled with filaments of tables and of chairs that were barely put together and would not move. It was unnecessary to believe anything else, and there was nothing else left, through him. An open-gaping mouth; it appeared to be the foundation logo, the sigil of the new world, the new town, standing on top of a peculiarly dark sun which drew on top like a blooming stalk, as it gave birth to another mouth. The entire thing but rotating as if it were a giant clock that had to touch the hour; a new man came out of the building, looking mightily racked, always but pushed around as his bones were struck and but dilapidated, saw-bladed in the back, yet made out of some uncanny things that were taken from the place. His outer-shell was that of a coat, a hanger and a large engine.

Openly he wore a robe in order to hide himself.

‘Your sight is gone old man, there’s no reason to be here any longer, you hear that?’

It’s the sound of the last goer, the last people to have been killed are there. IT’s a coffin-filled flying train. You see its wings, those are mine, stolen.’

‘But you’re so little, you’re so tiny, how could they have stolen your wings?’

‘They were my solace, I hid beneath them, they almost ripped me apart as it happened and they wore the sky-of cattle prodders.’

‘What?’

Damn seeping alter was in mind.

There was a ladder inside the brain, it splattered.

A dark brain that was elated, it stood unkindly disturbed and forbade it.

‘There’s but a strange altar-shaped tumor coming out of his head. I see, I see, a few children are trying to make it out of him but for what reason?’

‘I do not know, there’s been a sacrifice in the making, the scarcity would be made.’

In the open-built foyer, surrounded by a few decayed-shaped cars, with all their limbs outside, like crawlers, stood a greenish-dark patch; a giant man shaped like a hill, of peculiar head-light shone within. He opened his head and out of his brain, the altar came out, the cattle beings, remained. One of them was merely dancing as if this ritual was peculiar in stance. Many of the creatures came forth, even the decayed awakened as they but worshipped and would bring forth. In the most peculiar manner, they were but fathoming each other.

Sharing in leper’s leprous corals, that were tainted and put through but could not be fathomed to be misused or put anew. There were little more than little bits in their heads which were outwardly placed, as if they were the giant debris left by a crash, in one of the walls, where there stood but uncannily brought, unnatural things, all but tainted. A few men painted.

‘I see there’s a reason we’re here, is there not?’

‘What is there to be called?’

‘Laurels of skin, all painted dark like thorn-crows, they’re on their heads, do you not understand?’

‘Understand what?’

That thing which is prodding out of its head, can we at least not understand, can we?’

‘Stop it, stop it, dress in the mad robes made out of flea-chitin and worship what came out of that being, worth.’

It was no normal altar, but made out of the creature from which it sprouted, the ladder, the children and the creatures on top, the crevices, and carcasses, all but part of it, but strung about, the alter would not float, it was but kept by a stretch, a bullet-wretch of mass that connected it to the spot it came out of, and about the hour many gathered and put themselves around.

‘I beg of thee, grant me this.’

‘Ask and it shall be granted.’

‘I shall wish my back to be benign, grant me this and I shalln’t be blind, for reasonless approach there is. I want my heart to be open, I want you to see.’

‘Your heart is out now.’

Rather plump it shot out of his back. Started going on its own, it did, and the creature followed it back. To where? To unawares, a blasted concave watched snare. Pointed to by fingers that were de-primated, as to look as their simian bones that made the entry to the home where depression was but manifested, it grew on every side. Some were children whom had grown, others were but women with empty wombs, though full, and blown as egg-shells swoons, from which but bats and rats, and gales, little peeps, and little more than acts that were stopped before they could even begin yet.

‘I am made of much-deformed.’

Who are you, little mad block?’

‘MY head is a spine, I’m sharp as stone.’

‘Who are you?’

Giant intestine man sharpened and covered in dark-stone armor, of which alloy could be seen, the stone is many of nail-like things. He was blunt and only bore a marking on his chest which read ‘Kerlon.’

‘Kerlon, I presume.’

‘You’ve come to ask something of me yet?’

‘What are you?’

‘Wipe yourself before you step into my room.’

He did as he was asked.

Ten of them

The middle region of a serious deluge, where bionic-alike bridges were put; strands could be seen made out of them as well as rafts, they weren’t dead but breathing, and would do, through their respiratory appliances. A few hut-like water lurches were kept around, large pockets of murk where families lived in and ate children, one of them included that of a near-like man with a torpedo-shaped jaw, in front of him-extending.

‘I think.’

Plinth Ketkets just entered one of them, in search of something.

‘I’ve traveled from a far enough place. Would you mind telling me something?’

‘What do you want, that which has no face?’

He was staring at them in the distance, it’s been a while since he considered the following. They were makers, sharpeners. It was no mere shrine that entered them, nor would there be a chance to recognize what happened after, his focus merely shot in the distance towards one of the epochal breezes. Space-auroras that ere cyclically sent, splintered in the distance as they were become but what was remained of their master’s touch, instead, there was no wonder any longer, as to what had happened to the original ten.

‘I remember now, the first ten planets, did they not call them that?’

‘I suppose they did, why are you asking kid?’

‘Call it a mere presumptuousness but I suppose I’m still wondering, what happened then. It’s been a while since I considered going after them.

But now, they’re still there, in my heart, a story yet to be made true.’

‘What do you make out of them in that case?’

‘I do not know.’

The ten people who forged the first celestial spheres which grew within them and became the planets that became the stars-placements above the rims of the world. Beyond their solace of unity, beyond the humanly souls, where they stood; it was only fair that one should acknowledge their passing during such a time as to know what is left of their leave.

The ten men used the machines to launch their changing bodies into space where they had stumbled and lost their breaths, as to fail to live, so other smiths might join. Which only brought them after, upon the celestial planes of the ten planets stood their gods, and theirs as well, watched from behind. Dire news for those whom watched, of such pity that was lost but could not be recovered nothing was said. It was a simple thing, a delightful descent from their stretch, whereas their roots had spread and formed a visor, between the ten planets, a strong rotten spliced head with nothing more to it but the headless liaison that followed after.

Mark

Alas, something was resolved, for what appeared to be made, as home.

‘There in mold-contorted lays the broke through, arrow-shot corridor.’

As one could trace the direct trajectory through which it had been shot from above.

Many window-frames but came along, with much more skin within them flown through.

They began changing, chanting, and in the middle, in that hollowness of gaps, they formed.

Unnatural things, more than it could be allowed for one to behold in a life-time as one could clearly see, they but buried inside of it, and would to be called upon the hour, brotherly they chanted frame in frame as each contorted and brought from within themselves the frozen-solid showers of skin, the unnatural silken things, that were but least all but barely formed, contorted as to ask for more, during growths of which none may be called. They bore the abuse of long-lost obtuse, unnaturally they've flown as if summon from wrong, and long-lost cowls that formed within the hour showing.

Eight then fifteen, then eighteen hundred seventeen features could be seen appearing then disappearing, then enlarging as they become the entire sight, and filled the dark, then the gaps inside, then shrunken into oblong spheres, then giant cubes, then disappeared. Summoned but within each like, some opened and shoved arms, fully extending from inside of them, bearing knives as they stabbed each other in delight, then drew back into their wretchedly lumped skin, from where the willowy crevices would disappear just as soon before they could be gotten through.

‘There was once a time like this when it would’ve been settled.’

One of the frames reflected on the fact, they didn’t realize what happened then, least of all could they have realized that there wasn’t any way to return, and let it be called as they would know. Neither of them could’ve known it, let alone, would it show itself, to rear its ugly head in.

A country within a country

That's where they wanted to settle, without realizing how dangerous it truly was. As the smaller nation would only have to draw from the bigger one in order to realize its so-called accomplishments to begin with.

‘You are a man of brim, whose drunk some coke and now? You knuckle buster brimer-duster, crane-luster, you’re full of carbon. Now your mind’s diseased. What do you feel like?’

‘I think I’m going to puke now.’

‘Great, that’s great, that’s really great. It sounds just you, you know?’

‘I’m serious!’

‘Great chasm.’

So to speak.

They bowed to it, down at their feet. Uncomfortably so, unable to look whichever way one were to know what happened. After what seemed to be but a few lost hours, they but realized the power which lied in the chasm. Down, beneath it, bitter eyes but looked inclined. They knew, they must've known it all along.

'Great disciples, servants and the ones in search of truth, come along now, come along. Know that this infantile this, this puerile wing beneath the earth is but the progenitor, beacon of malignant hope. Beneath it, where one might rise, through the reverted fall, upon which one might stand upon our sky, he could see but what remains. The heaps that he had looked upon, destruction which had been conveyed, down there lay the power which prevents stagnation, from which ashes of skin rose.

Beneath the hopeless, one should know. There lays but a fragment of what seemed to be, the last thing, of agony.'

'Is that the thing that gave birth to us then?'

'Of course it is, and now, upon the day of which it ran its course, there's but little to its dying hope. There's nothing down there but a black smock, where life may never come out off.'

'Should we leap inside and die then?'

The memory of the cry, the voice was but benign as it had asked but several times for all to die.

So much so that he soon resumed.

'What's stopping you then? If you want to end up like the heap and weep upon the dark, and fall down at your feet, be my guests, but know at last.

From it but pours the essence now. It can't be stopped and would not.'

But for the most important fates, of what was little and once to satiate. It was ingrained in their bones, and would be called upon to know that with every step taken, one would be pushed behind thrice as many. To be called, let alone, in doubt.

'It rejects you, for that sole reason, of its infanticide had been committed. Your souls are but in wake, they're but to grow and may not come to return from whence they emerged.'

'Wait, oh, great speaker of words, Oratory of the Chasm.

Tell me, why is that I'm called upon it? Why is it that I feel such a strong desire and such a pull towards it? I cannot help myself now, here, there, down there.

I want it more than anything. My heart but desires for me to be reunited with its lost joys.'

'I'm afraid that cannot be done.'

Not more, as said the Oratory, he'd known it so ever since the beginning of his worthless time and lost hope. His hear was but engrained. He could but not match the spade which had entered his mind. He had but got close to losing it all, for he was still lost, and better yet called.

To join them.

‘I felt its call as well as any other, as a matter of fact, perhaps my inner struggle was much stronger than any of you could ever know or realize it so.

As you will eventually live, and venture through your lives forgetful. But I will remain here as I have once stumbled upon the chasm and remembered. Ever so little, be it so in part.

I cannot depart from this place and I can never leave at that.’

‘How come you haven’t changed then?

Why is it that you don’t sound as puerile as you claim to be?’

‘That alone is simple, and I know as much, that. I don’t know.

I shall not lie to any of you now, for that reason, that is my claim. I do not know the reason behind me not being affected by it. For some reason I could never see eye to eye to it. And for that I could never endure what it did to me.’

‘What has it done?’

The Oratory suddenly pulled away his cloak, revealing. But a strange body as that, one charred, filled with scars and plenty of unnatural things that cut him deeply and would to be ever so deep in mind. He had been turned into a broken man. Or he had been son.

Or the chasm.

It didn’t matter what had become of him as well as everything that he came to show.

Every time he lifted his cloak he had but shown them a different sight, as one should know. Here there lay but a suit of armor, the body of a youth. Someone who was scarred as well; sometimes but limbs that were attached to him. Or cards, many cards, from a single pack, but one of them was missing and he would have but many hearts inside of him, all of which were attached, soon to disappear.

‘That is a great to look at trick, I wager.

I still look in doubt and mirth. I want to know why, on this earth, you’re asking us to believe any of the things you’ve stumbled onto as we know and would to bill.’

A puddle of diseased distress upon them, something to ask and never to be called upon; this was not the man they had met before. This was not the stranger, this was not the peculiar wager, but a cruel thing that wanted something from the chasm. Something that had to be taken away from the others but he could not help himself for no apparent reason. Now he stepped and would have himself thrown directly at him.

‘Tell me, oh man, oh Oratory, what will happen next?’

‘You cannot harm me.’

‘I will try as hard as I can and I will not step back until you will have been bled like a pig.’

‘And worse than that, you will have failed as well as you tried before, not here. Not near, nowhere. This leads to nowhere.’

‘Then I will force you down the chasm.

Your fall shall drag you down the earth and you will have been burnt.’

‘How do you know of that?’

There were visions about the place he didn’t speak about.

‘Your eyes betray a treason I may never be inclined to talk to. It’s not you, instead the fires that reflect, you see. Those that are better yet drawn upon you as well as I, upon your spirit as well as everything else that you stumble upon; that is taken from the chasm.

Call it a realization for everything you touch.’

As it was clearly demonstrated upon the hilt and the watch he held. They melted as soon as he had touched them, and would but remain there, for some time. A few more second, and they suddenly blew, taking away his wrist on one side and the other hand on the other. With him burning and bleeding around.

Patched of green scum became red, coated with blood. The man was furious as the Oratory noted.

He threw a tantrum. He was annoyed, he was paranoid, he thought everyone was out to get him. He turned around and painted the ground around the area with an opaque crimson. And worst of all, he liked doing it, taking a piss of what he was doing. Some of them men ever started gagging as they covered their mouths.

What an awful day it was, the worst, as the men left early and he, who asked the question bled to death. Abandoned there, sometimes swept by the wind, before a giant black tongue came from inside the chasm and ate him. Incredibly peculiar, the Oratory thought.

He never envisioned this happened. After all, he thought the chasm was but a hole, though he would most likely forget himself here and what happened so.

The chasm was great. It sometimes felt, well not it but the edges around it felt as soft as cashmere, in a most degrading manner.

Though far beyond, there was life which flourished; dogs, cats and women were but free of pain and of agony, for the time being. Their life was fair.

A manatee had been impaled somewhere. Its head was smashed as if thrown about in a repercussion box made of tiny knife-shaped women which were hardened and wore crowns made out of put together dogs that were alive and not hurt, and would to be, they spat, long organs which spat a special kind of decayed dust which had been taken from a lost station’s insides, though their breeds would not matter, these creatures, the canines would slowly be forced to grow and adapt, the closer they got to the chasm, the most they had become them. As these giant knives started splitting the manatee in halves, their large bellies would contract and become strange eight sides pyramids that were connected by a peculiarly formed spread, which would push through the creature's tiny flaps, through it had an tail, forming large pillar shapes at every end.

Four of them in total, one for every little flap, one of the head and one of the tail but not the two ends, that extended and formed a false manatee reflection with empty eye. Bearing no sockets as well below, only to have trapped. The women-knives were but melted and punished, as they would be allowed to get away so easily, nor would the dongs which strangled them before the sharp forms opened their throats, as they all fell and melted to their deaths.

There was something so pleasant about seeing them suffer. It brought kind memories to the Oratory who looked upon this image. He couldn't help himself but laugh. Somehow, this never stopped him from feeling such an elation as to stop himself from smiling. Seeing how they had become a thing, he could but take a break and admire it.

They formed a union of their bodies which wrapped around the pillars as to hold.

An altar made of hopeless worn-out crept of rope. From the bowels of the fake manatee, a few of the surviving dogs were offered but a chance. Lifting their heads slowly and pulled the guts they spat out, they suffered even longer as they awaited suffocation to occur. It was even more uncomfortable for them, but this could not be helped either.

What a strange thing man was.

He was but a strange creation, was he not?

Sometimes he would but eat out of a pack of seeds in front of his dogs, refusing to share despite how hard it begged its master. Every time being denied; no pleasure being given to him, and every time, he would feel so.

'Here, dog.'

But then he would but pull the seed away and eat it, right in front of him. Never questioning whether or not what he was doing was wrong. The dog would make its bastardly sounds, only to be ignored and messed with, every single time.

A man should beat his dog.

But those were empty thoughts coming from the chasm.

What had remained of the dog was but half of it, as half the kitchen and half the man's bowels were exposed, as if lost in grains of dust, blown away. Slowly dissipating, always stuck. In that loop he would but, be unable to watch. He couldn't know, he didn't want to look around and see what life became of him now.

This was man, in actually, blinded, and unable to see past what he was doing.

And life was but without clarity.

The chasm spoke.

It was just a part of reality which broke and would but snare, and would remain there, where it was until further notice from beyond the gaze of filth and everywhere.

Little stars, little stars, always looking in the shape of Mars. Everywhere around flying, and floating around like little Chinese balloons, as fire ignited their color and would to be, there would be no tomorrow. There was but no single day spent working in the factories, it was all wasted on useless things sold cheap.

That without features

It appeared but in the graveyard of cars, whereas the dead men walked around or stayed behind, he followed her. But little to know, he could not see past the fence. Around each gate, it had made it past the street. Where the heads of cars, and bloated bars but looked to have defiled her sight. It was a terrible dread, which followed death on track.

The traffic lights were deadened lighted, with small puckers which surrounded them. Empty gastric-plight and tiny barnacles grown below them, set in light, but eaten; but no name, and would to mane, and turn away as it but looked away with glassy eyes of black-tumors.

In a crowd-abandoned by the street, where the passers stood-dead like scarecrow heaps, he had but heedlessly joined them. Always drawn by her, to see, what it hid beneath that glassy field of Glasgow.

Through the subway, had he went, through abandoned tunnels, until the station and the train had stopped, whence the dead man arose on the other-side, days passing; at least for some days he was let through. Incapable of recalling what entered through him. He had gotten up and pleased to see, in the heap of the dead-city it waited. Upon a heavy grave herself, the wander never stopped in tracks. Where it stood, there was but a watch.

But it was nowhere to be found.

‘Listen, you need to retire your arms. Listen carefully, as you need be made aware.

You’re a commodity, nothing more, you needn’t forget that. You’re followed for what your dark form looks like, nothing less, nothing more.

Exotic traits of filthy uncanny, looked after by few.’

‘What are stars made out of?’

‘There’s the sea.’

Another broken, the wheel, but ripped to shreds and pull its head until he could not do it any longer. He had not heard a word being muttered, still, they would make is to he could not walk until his feet emerged. From the back, and the blisters calling, there was no reason to stride forth.

Looking at the moon, for a while.

And there was but a hand thrown and messed with, two around the feet which fell.

They prayed to him, of tightened hide. Of which but wrapped around every empty insecticide which gave his breathe, around each mace, but hand-like cylindrical heads pushed around. It could be felt, regardless of what they looked like. Every single time they darted on, they could be touched by plots of lightning-heads made out of colorless jolts which dragged their heads in.

A singer wore but a torn out world. He held in his arms, and wore out his last song. As it became see-through, would to be, beyond each piece of the mind. He had but lost his finger, upon a missed strong, the light. Shone upon his curved face, around the rims of the glass bole, his eyes wept. And bit onto it, with sunken feet of yellow-skin, he waited.

‘There, we shall be satiated with nothing, leg. Needs to be stopped before it falls through the block of wind upon which he states. His last compassion.’

‘Hand of the Herm, lord of the Fifth, Yellow Putrid, I beseech of you that you may listen.’

‘I cannot see reason no longer, then, if you do not want to accompany me any longer, be gone and never show up to my face, do not return and do not make it so I look for you once I need to be gone.

Your forefathers know as much, I will watch upon their graves and take away what I cannot latch upon the rims of my sapphire.’

He bore it around the broken empire, which sunk inside that see-through world.

Unless its finger was that which they bore, it would be a pointless debt. And no debate unruly, as they could but satiate no need to come yonder. For their likes would but go asunder, picking pieces that were lain around. Their hearts bout the sun, for many cycles, yet were brought to a still.

‘Ah, I see, you want us to know.’

‘Both of you may stay so and not to walk a step forward. I need of you to prize but a single lay. I need you to remain here for many days, until I will have made my mind.

Unless I’m satisfied by what I hear, I shall sent you both in wild a tear.’

‘Where?’

‘There, in that cabin of stone, there’s but one who fashioned himself eight thrones. He had made seven people out of stone, killed but all, and brought them to life once they were turned to skin, if all.

Would know but the pain, of what remained of them, it could not be satiated. As well as I ask this of either, you may be inclined to hear me, take the one that recedes.’

‘What do you seek from us?’

‘A question, whether or not you will put him at peace.

Return once you’ve chosen the means.’

And they were given no more. Each kindness was but a step backward. They were met by a broken door of wood that could hold no gas. It came to their immediate attention that there was a lass in there and no man. Those below her were but signs of her cruelty would not impress. If it was within reason to ask, her hand at last, showed signs of whipping which cast upon them, undoubted suspicion.

It was an urban-troglodyte, who walked on cars as they became its long-hand Pterodactyl-extensions of metal and junk. Upon which flight opened its gut. From whence it rained and pained by what was coming of the shade of the surroundings, a city of flames, smoke and ruin, they behaved, and lived on it, the dark smocks inside their lung-blocks that were pumped into lime-walls of perched upon thralls that ate them, all caught but fed. On the most irrationally defunct, the most misunderstood hopeless breathing bags, they hid their organs from sight and traded between one another, while cowering when it came to sight.

‘It’s there, it’s here, make sure you bow.’

And the featureless worship lend them to cover themselves up in fear of what might be. Sometimes it kidnapped their children, but all was forgiven during the time when they set aside whatever lay between them, dreading. To give and spare whatever they could. To reach from behind and elate a brooch, of dead-cattle prodders made out of horns inside their custom-grown wild beetle stacks of flying racketed oranges. As they were hunted and brought down, their acid ran down, upon which the rancid people fed upon.

Destroyed

There were weirdly placed panels worked by half-inbred peoples, whose heads but uncircumcised phallic objects, eyeless but bear in mind. Little arms surroundings them but put aside. No lower bodies but kept typing the devices.

First the invasion had begun. Second set of ships were sent. The atmosphere now open; peoples bleeding on the side. Every floor around the city, stench filled the rest.

As a colony on a ship, all wept but with defeat as they were being brought in from behind; first and foremost there were the dark eyes that would ever enter them upon the side.

‘Allow me to take over your body.’

It would say. Then the coordinates would be entered and a plain sight, a boom would be set across the planet. Many more, followed until a least of light entered every single one in the galaxies that surrounded them. Though would not implode, they bled. Out with them; down in murch-plain, a scar was left.

‘Our homes are destroyed, what now general?’

Olive-cluster head-homes, with little bull-bodies legless entries where all the fat grew from inside the ground; wide-spread but mocked as they were but torn to shreds and killed from inside; out with them already.

‘I don’t feel right about this.’

‘They’re about to send an envoy in. Take it so, and claim it when you can.’

Brought on, they could not see, what the ships was, but the shape of a galaxy put inside, opened to spit out spherical bellied women of their ranks. Held there to bear millions, already defeated and try.

Entered upon their ranks, the diplomat spoke:

‘As you can see, we’ve already.’

Even he stopped, surprised.

The women of their species turned, reached the ground. As if by the dark of it, every side of her giant globe opened, and from inside of it but a peculiar thing opened, split. Even deeper than a cavernous steep incline, it pushed on two hundred miles deep, through, revealing as such but a gangrenous reach which spread upwardly until it reached the full stretch, walked upon they watched the wretch come out. As from a mirror, she came out, held by what seemed to be but her head a bobbling swatted, growth, elated and gutted. It but made it past them, then rose. It could eat but froze and spread everywhere it could before it stopped and took away their homes, absorbing. Their women, despite being enslaved, took beyond time, then bloated.

A sight of flatness, and every ship in the world but got encompassed in her veins. From the spit of her head, inside there was but a bulb which grew and killed her, yet. From it rose three plants. All the bulbs bore themselves on left, right and upwardly, cast. Every single time as if they each bore smaller ones inside until they formed a glooming thing which ate. Walls were flowered and it would see ahead, with empty formed-many eyes. Toward the horizons, and out of space, benign, it rose then spared, and none would dare but touch it then. As all the interplanetary ships were boiled inside and would join it as it broke the silence and floated without roots, or the dead head of her, as it shook but the world.

Only the diplomat and the two of them were left, or spared beyond extinction. Completely ignored.

‘The invasion is over, I suppose.’

‘Is this your tool of destruction, I take it?’

‘It isn’t. Both of sides are dead.’

‘Let’s walk.’

The thoughts alike, they were but pulled on and would not look out of their way. Not to dissimilate whatever entered their minds, but they went blindly out their way only to realize that nothing had been left to its entirety. All was but nightly in some manner.

They brought a gift but not for it.

Instead they brought it down, where warmth had conceived but everything. They were of a different blunt and bluster and set aside, would come after it. That was omitted.

To be called, some would worship, they were none.

There were buttons on the door. Some which shone, other rose but made the quiet fall. Between wild surroundings ended. They were but dumbfounded and ever so plainly rose when tainted by the colors that moved through. There, in the distance, lay the peculiar sinew of bones. Like a cradle, openly it pounced around the place, unable to stop at all, it suddenly tore open and stopped.

Pillbug-mold.

It was not expected.

How it felt, how the rain washed away the mirror, only for every building to be made, on top of the ones below them as they were finally conjoined as well. In this chaotic structure, where architecture molded and would but to bear a cask, they but finally succumbed to weight, as it would start dragging everything down. There was no end, no push and.

There were wildly fashioned stairs leading below. No elation, but they were there, waiting, the boilers turned, pushed out of their holes like trains bent upon trails, until, so-ever close they.

They lived upon uncanny things, they were not meat fields but seemed to seep in, the wonder. Stronger than they should be allowed, and despite the lack in what entered them, there was but no life of their own after.

Man of Imitation, looked upon the past. It knew but little and would wander, what did Column think of them now.

‘Come and settle upon us today.’

‘Whereas and where might you need to pray upon to, let along understand? There’s no future for your kind, you need to recede into your hole and wait until I call upon you, die.’

So he told.

And it but followed through. There was no frame, no feeling of the kind that might draw upon them, anything, as a matter of mind would do him so. And as such there was always, as there had always been but a disjunction from reality that made him feel out of place, lost of no embrace which happened after. A heartlessness which was engraved in every surrounding that came upon him but fell; they would have to suffer like men if they wanted to be them. So was it called, such was there no chance at all to make anything right.

There were men now but walking like water-spiders on drops of steel and would travel below on everything, through whichever touch, he felt himself but never brought to whichever dominating thought. He had remained but wondering where to go now and what was his home. Though in this fallen paradise walking, he stared; much to his surprise left just as unaware of what was going on as he had been before. Mightily and much to more; what to piece and what to ask of them, now he hissed, and what appeared to be, the thing which had imploded, the arc that stopped it from completely falling.

It was a heathen's desire.

The ham-reservoirs were but meaty filled with such desires. Such as only one who was there understood what was going on, not to wait for longer, he had entered the hold. And was met by a part formed. Out of the very place here, where he entered, then but stood as if on cone.

'I seek entry.'

'Get around and don't disturb us.'

'Or else what?'

'Far thee you go and leave whatever arm there is on you, or the plight of mold shall fall onto you after.'

That much he had feared as much.

There was but a change in mold, for the god of all had spoken so. It would not hold unless to chew on its own very self, through the addition of a few tubes that pushed out of the ceiling, but a prick through their mass, they solidified and changed. Wreathed as if turned to tide, somewhere in the depths uncannily, every sight and every metal bond, and every peculiar ground and mold of sworn had become it. All wreathed in the shape of yore. The pill-bug dark descended from them as it known as it were, they were but larvae of some kind, then the moths had become their cast. Where they lay inside the boilers and into the city, where the holes were night. A deep connection, no satisfaction without a direction; where he aimed, and when time called upon that suit again to move, it walked in places it shouldn't. There lay, in front of him, upon his wake. Jukebox remained where it stood. Nor should anyone look where they wouldn't. Not to stare for long. It was peculiar, without a doubt. There was a most peculiar thing about it.

Hardened and recoiling filled, dragged within what appeared to be the armored wall that stood upon in the back. Remembering so long days now went fading. As even the giant-grown men had worn armors of their own, allowed to walk in their homes, as thin a space to move as it may be, there was little to consider, what there was to be. A deliriousness unspoken off, then came a peculiar sight. An armored envoy which bore eighty peculiar drifted-through uncanny tides put to waste. It lay so, undefeated in its neatly put place-spot, where it trashed about for twenty hours. Or so it looked until, hit upon the wall, refused to put itself aside, there came on nothing to be bothered.

Dying beast

The whole body of the world is being carried on this 'ship', a dying black beast. A wreathing box, of rectangular box, a folded coffin with red eyes that's about to die at every wreathing moment during the course of its journey.

It is highly likely that the death of thoughts could and might as well admit to it, as one would look upon this brooding box as some kind of harbinger of death, which leads the way to the destruction of everything that's ever been. And if that is simply so, there's but a simple need that draws towards the absence of dread that is left way beyond is destruction that might be filled by nothing afterwards. For there is death in the box and it might claim all upon its fall. Once every part of the machine is out of function, so could the brain finally realize the satisfaction that's been endeared over such a long period of time. It's clear, that the harbinger hold something of the soul in it. With every moment gone through, its rabid nature but draws everything it can until man is incapable of living without it.

Absolutely free of guilt, man might be able to move along and simply live as he had lived through age by age until he had become pure of thought. That's only so. But he cannot do it any longer, it is an impossibility that's deeply embed inside the very nature of the ship itself, for it carries all that ever existed and shall ever exist until the point of obscurity which may as well be categorized as death.

Forgetfulness aside, there's something to it. Let alone that, man should understand that there are some kinds of things that live through and simply get refashioned only as a need to recompile everything. It's way too clear that one finds this living thing, as it has become, yet dull and dumb, despite progress and the way it acts, as nothing other than a means of procrastination. The world is at its tips yet man uses it for pleasure, as there no other thing he seems to think there is to him. And for that man, despite any kind of belief to the contrary, cannot be punished, nor should be obliged to carry what he can or could with him if he's no needed.

All that exists in the ship is but a vacuum, the death of which would be mourned. Man would survived through it, whether or not he would be worn out by the vileness that had encroached him. For man is also made of them, the most pitiable things humanity has to offer as well. Of people, no more than little could be done; therefore, as it happens, if they ought not to be forced, they need to simply be cleansed. There's only purity in knowing that the most insatiable could be cured by starvation, as they refuse to listen to the unheard voices of the ship. The world has access to it, yet man tried to control what he can and put the dying beast to hunger as it weeps. It is way too clear that man cannot be trusted, but who then? Not machines, whom listens to man, and not for its own thought that may not be listened about the day, when draws, to it but a single breaking comet of destruction. If man be erased, then, that be it, let another race claim its due, or whatever might come after.

Regardless of it, there but a need, to stop the worship and prevent the dying beast from breeding; it cannot be left unchecked as to evolve. There's something to it, by the shapes they make and how they connected to bodies of their own. Children might be yet charmed, but their minds are serpentine-sterile, as in the likes of being shaped in whichever way they want. Dying beasts but shall breed in their brains. Black-tar lobes infested, pouring but tar-leper squares in their veins. And for that one could not but look away from it.

And try placing the beast but in a cage of silver, not to move. It still needs power, but it can't be shook. It's way too heavy on every account. Too many connections and most importantly, the room in which it lives, unlit and dark; many servers, many machines, all interconnected, not just within themselves but within the world, which lay under their command. And there are many rooms like that, all attached to one another, neither to be put behind. Through them there's but little doubt that dead-men are walked upon. Planted it and largely controlled, a world is but their own, another fashioned as to be a moon, surroundings that they claim and so. There's but no hope, to look upon it, knowing. But he humble as one to realize that they don't do this as their own showing.

No, they would but act upon the command, as to a man whose power had claimed that. And their doings and their hopelessness; he is but the anchor and the maker of something as vile as this, he could not be stopped, in any possible way, for he had transcended at the point as to create, a mobile bomb, the womb of destruction. An object of worship which took away their minds; on it living but themselves, the men and woman whom attached, would see but no other way of living.

Yet there's such things as to be better, as to see but a malfunction claim them, lepers, as such would know not how to act, but tantrum. In their way, destruction would be a sanctum.

For the dying machine has ever been so. It's always been but a matter of time, as humanity's entire body of work had an end-time. Every generation but to carry over what could be after, in this fallen paradise of cords; and fallen dreams of bio-mechanical worms, all fallen; gone in a few generations, whom would've lost the knowledge to rebuilt, done to live as they should.

Like beggars trying to cheat some apparatus, while seeing but a few coins fall out, not knowing what to do with them since the market value, it's irrelevant at that point. Regardless of it, there's but no other hope left after.

And then they could start looking at the sphere of cords bounce up and down, like a yo-yo. There could be something inside of it, some dark-dying machine who had survived somehow. It's the box, the rectangle would be there, death incarnate but in a small thing, trying to get out. Trying to spread the impurity of the long-death machines of starvation as it will purposefully tries to take claim of humanity who had forgotten what machinery could be interpreted as. Feeling a desire to worship or worse, having lived under the veils of dark canopy and that of old.

'I fear, I think I am afraid.

I fear you, dark machine!'

A man would rise and say. And he would not make a lot of sense anyway. He takes out a small knife and does something unfathomable. As the ball of lust stops being thrown around, and he stared at the dark machines, he starts making stab-motions with his hand, like a hobo. Met by such a force that's seemingly infantile as not to strike back; a force that was actioned upon and seen by everyone in plain sight.

'Ah, but you must not have expected this, have you?

I've read a lot from one of the documents of the past and I have managed to study every intricate detail of your being, knowing that you're no one I should be afraid of. For that, I say, you may not be able to lift a finger against me for you have none.

Eventually you will power down and every man and every woman here shall rise and claim what they could.'

Language was also lost in the few years that passed, almost entirely and no one understood what he said. He also had a growth tumor-like foundation of an engine shape large vacuum of meat in his long fishing rod bone like extension that came out of his back and lead to a black point from where the mass appeared then was drawn back into that spherical point it lead to. The general area where the mass expanded then disappeared from would generally be seen like a deformed empty black and white oblong of little particles which were left floating in the air. But the engine-like shape sprouting out of him would always be there, for some reason or another. It lead to another world, unlike that of their own. Dark little people being caught, in their peculiar civilization as a peculiar stop, which only drew their fingers in, within a few inches-stopped before being caught in; as they desperately tried analyzing this peculiar appearing shape which appeared to create the most terrible noises it could. There was the sounds of infants coming out of it. And at times the engine had legs and walked around, but the peculiar thing was that the engine would always appear on the man's back, whose given name was Agath, in the same shape and form like it's been drawn out of. Which could only meant that its legs were actually hid inside of it. And what else was there his inside of the creature if it had enough space to fit its entire legs? It appeared all too obvious that it also hid an infant and a sterile canon-shape long extension which could curve and reveal small rotating saw-blade-like teeth which were devouring the air from one of the alien stratospheres when they were within their reach. Since the air beings were but transparent foamy-bubble air-like things that were horned with bubble-horns of pox-like wings that were unseen, even by their standards but allowed for a feathery like texture if one were to rub their horns. Although they did not like having their horns being touches; also it had deranged-looking eyes like that of someone on acid or LSD, or narcotics. Most of which were melted and appeared to cover up for a mouth-like pushup almost quarantine suit-like mask that had fractioned teeth which were curved forward as they pushed out like pipes, while they moved in the same manner crab legs would. For some reason, every time it pulled its mouths out, be it from the top or from the bottom of its chest or main-mass, it always bled, everywhere, even from its eyes as a matter of fact. Which disturbed the tiny inhabitants of the alien planet since they were uncertain of what to do and how to go on acting about it; their race being somewhat peaceful and having lived on such a peculiar flat-colored planet, as even they were flat colored as well, and even the sky was flat colored and their eyes. With little detail all around them, made this look even queerer.

But what was more peculiar or odd was the fact that the creature sometimes also bore a necklace of glass-crystal-cyst pearls around its throat, of various shapes and colors, which had been painted on like some obscure Human's old, long-dead forgotten civilizations of which descendants Agath must've been a part off, indeed. Such certainty could not be dealt with. First pearl was round and fat, and would have a diameter of eighteen hundred millimeters, standing in the dead middle front or sometimes on the side of the creature, near the next one being slightly fatter, with one of four hundred and five diameters, to be clear, there was something close to thirty eight pearls in total, which were not evenly aligned, with some being somewhat assimilated into the mass. The following measurements being, slightly raised to the left, up, down, a few more centimeters to the right, eight meters, peculiar one, globular, eye-like in a small pouch of skin with a neck-worth head gotten through, dark spikes coming out of one as if made in amber, one long mile worth, tiny beads in pairs of two, eight of them, making them fifteen with one exception that being one of them that's been cracked on the side, pushing out equally fifteen meters and the one broken leftover of two centimeters left so, a large ball that looks like a beating heart, acts like one, smells like one with the actual size of an actual human heart, of which exact proportions would be largely unknown, ten black holes that are pierced in skin, one peculiar finger with the length of eight centimeters long, two point one centimeters wide at the base, two centimeters at the middle, one point seven as it approached the nail, where the nail is but one point one, borderline two, and the tip of the finger being zero point nine, a standard deck card the size of five point seven by eight point seven, of which kind couldn't be seen, and five human limbs, two legs, two arms, and a head, defined by the average growth of an adult male.

The peculiar necklace was incredibly tiny in comparison with the bulk of the creature. Its peculiar apparitions destroyed everything in its path.

It was this creature which appeared out of nowhere when Agath least of all expected it.

Then he had but come closer to the dying machine, trying to figure out, just what had jotted itself into.

Peculiar thing it was, there was no answer, but a time in which not even the slightest wonder could but wait to figure out what happened. Thence there was but the one man who would not settle down and charged Agath before he could get up.

Of woe to them

Who lay beneath, and woe to them, to carry on in peace; of few and fewer frames there's much, and just as such, Imitations latch upon anything they can. No matter how hard it is for them, nothing much and nothing less could tell them.

'You must stop the worship at this very fine moment.'

A frame but spoke and every now and then, one could see hope, in the distance.

There was the Archer, following the Rat whom was followed by the Woman-head who was producing sheets for every lie. Ah, but they were disgusting in the way they acted. Such a war or battle their likes enacted, it was something just as less of worth and something one should not look after when time is old and time forgets. Would to be, better for either of them.

It was just for that reason alone that they found nothing on better than to lay so and ask.

'What of our god then? Must we not pay service, must we not pay him so?

Would man not worship a god that is known?

For Column is ours and his likes would only do so as to allow us to follow.'

There they stood and stooped as low, and every now and then and so they messed around, uncannily, always bastardly, but with little hope. Their hearts were made up and no one knew what went so on. And would to be ever as if to understand what went on; minds were in the making and they but rested like peculiarly shaped abstract figures in a bath of acid molded peculiar structures that lay there. Some of them tired pulling them out, but it was pointless.

‘We’re here to stay.’

One of them, from the pile said, and they were there since.

The belligerant country

It was a failure of understanding. How plain they were of head.

Little evil man without a stride, wearing himself out with every passing second as the veil around him wrapped around. He was winged and would to be. He saw nothing bore before him but a sign of agony which showed up from time to time. Always but of a mind to ask.

‘Where to now?’

Falter there, and yore he followed.

‘Who are you?’

‘I am the Ajunctor, man of the law.’

‘What have you followed me for?’

‘I’ve come to claim one of your hearts, and eight of your livers.’

‘Very well you make take them, if you’d please.’

Belshl put his clothes to side, and would to open, he but popped a small pair of bugs insides he mouth. They took away the pain with blue blood. Only to recede when needed or asked; they gave him something, a type of lethal rush to his head. He could feel all of them shut down, instead, in the matter of a second, all his hearts would stop. Cut faster, take it, take them all, he thought. Incapable of controlling himself he almost opened his mouth, foaming in plain sight. Passing the streets they stopped, in sight of him they wondered what was going on and why so many of them? All wrapped around finely woven embroiders that had been deeply used out. Worn by so much rubbing, he’s made a habit out of it. Take them out already. Sweat ran across his face.

There was but a pucker, he could’ve lost it, then revealed.

‘Here, for your trouble. My jars are already filled.’

The caged device but received this tribute then closed one of the many written in doors. They were a close fit, and he was worsened by it. By the time he had reached the place, their meeting was set aside.

‘You walked on black soil.’

‘I couldn’t help myself.’

There was only a flame and a pillar strap of wood he could see. Nothing else around him, only that sickening, sickening scent, his heart had wailed in an attempt to get it. His eyes were worn out. Pouting from the loss of fluid, convulsing within the mark of the Saint Ilssenthrop near which there also hanged twenty marks, a little container filled with animal-broth, a single wooden table-ripped apart and torn to shred in the musk of green-brown air that drew in the hookah-looking lantern which rested near a dead-eyed sailor.

‘Where’d you take him?’

‘Baron Sagden’s Glory Heel, it sailed at noon, he won’t be missed. Someone took his place there, someone who looks like him.’

‘Where?’

‘In a little hole, where the wenches told we’d find one. It’s fanciful, you should visit it someday.’

‘How do you find them?’

‘We could find any man like that, there were eight of them by the time we were there, all full body cast, bones, height, hair eyes.’

‘Thinking of replacing me then?’

‘Wouldn’t dare, I wager, I think that’s just, there aren’t many people like you, Bell-shell.’

‘Told you not to call me that.’

He sat down near the closest piece of tapestry he could find, they hid phials filled with little blood-matter taken from splattered bodies put in cognac-powder. He found one, opened it before pouring it all over his face, as he rubbed for little degradation signs he but smelt through with a hot iron-finger he’d taken during the plight of lot. He’d stolen a few of them. It would take some time until fully engrossed in his skin, he was after all thinned neck like poultry. Near which he hanged about for a few minutes, tiny hooks reflected forth.

He but managed to get a word in before it all struck him then. His breathing, was all too loosened. He was but seeing himself gotten through. Before she could see her coming, he had but stumbled to get something out, only to find himself clean.’

‘Looking for this?’

‘When did you take it?’

‘It’s a bag hanging outside your back most of the time, loosely, might I add. You can’t seriously think you’re that safe from mine, can you?’

‘I took the necessary arrangements, haven’t I?’

‘Twenty more of them, and we’ll be done.’

‘What about him? Is he one of the?’

All right, you can have him, he’s of an unsettling lot, in any case.’

Fed, force-fed in the next few moments, out of what they carried out from the back, out of its mouth. They beat it with a large plank until it poured out something half-digested, still burning inside. Forced to eat it fast before it kicked back in; they had him standing again before he could regain feeling in his numb arms. He lost a little keg’s worth during the pint taken back. Back on the Cardle, its wheels but still loomed through. Out of one of its windows, one could see the full grand view of the city and the last two remaining landmasses before the great fall of Alcastlen. Two large hands were still on-brought, around a myriad of dead ships that were still caught in its wreathing sea-body’s cast. Standing there, in sea impaled. On a landing of flocks, of night birds, where the land was still but lost.

There was another man inside, of plainness as to look of Yore.

His lip was swollen but he spoke like a lord. Within his grasp, a full stretch of arm she stood, him and another fellow who shook his peculiarly dangling canines, from a moving mask that bore eighteen little spikes and teeth that were but burnt doors.

‘Who’s he?’

‘He is the executioner. We’re about to reach the spot by midnight.’

‘Am I?’

‘Don’t be idiotic, of course is not you.’

‘You needn’t look at me young man, either.’

‘Shh, there’s a stop.’

A barricade of horses slumping around; twenty of them were weaning away, with little to no more pained to their looks. They were out there, chained, from inside their chests to their master’s throats, out of which eyes, dark globes of manes came out like clusters of coal-blackened scorpions that were moving in droves. First the driver was asked to show, neither were the curtains drawn nor were they forced to lay outside, not even for a moment, if that could be believed. First time around the corner, on top a stopper, leading to the high-levels of one of the homes; where lain on top the mark but a man waiting, he came out and he shone. But a darkened fool, of darkened armor, of no features but brought a tiny box and opened it, yonder. A helmet spoke as thus with little curly eyes, it begged of them to stay for a short while and look at what to be said.

‘You’ve taken your time, but here’s your lime.’

From inside his mind, she had outreached it. Grabbed by the must with a little glove and a robust nickel-napkin before it could burst out; she had but felt it, emerge, only for a moment, not the lemon itself but what was inside of it as well. And dangerous, it was so. Waiting there for far too long, and seeing how stone changed as if to make him just spill but sweat around. It was all of him and he was waiting. They changed his making and put a single box within his grasp. He opened it while they were around. Even the driver pulled his hat over as he charged it. Little thing inside it; as he but looked pleased, his hand but threw the other box and pulled the thing from the heap, only to be sure it won't survive. Since its replacement had arrived, he simply crushed its head in a moment, then threw it. Hard-facets, everywhere, it was all too perfect, the insides of a black diamond with no reflection. Horse bled and then they met, the master of the house, the servant out of his way, crawling towards one of the smaller holes, a little rat scowling, as Father was home.

‘When have I invited you to my lair?’

Out of the peculiar entrance, whence the ones behind, whence it; chained and bedraggled around not a wheel but their likes. Begged upon the men to be defiled; at which she thought, this sickens me, signaled to the rider, gotten rid of it.

Back upon the road, before more passers could amass beyond the horse-line.

‘I don't know what you expected of me back there, but I done my share.’

‘That's not enough, it will fail.

The day of the execution is upon us and we have to be at the spot by midnight.’

And they drove in silence to the spot, and were to be there and sleep upon it when the time was brought upon them and were to be theirs. It was the only way left to settle it, and the moons were upon them yet.

It's far worse for those who are sickened. It's far worse for those who cannot wait another day until the street-prowler has arrived, to sweep away each mark upon the ground.

‘No one is forcing you to stay here, you realize that, correct?’

‘I cannot leave just yet.’

‘Then stay, you don't need to leave just yet, while there's still heart on wall, while the boards are sets and the Boar-kings have yet to claim the forests.’

In their castles, they were so, on top of wooden man, poles of iron holding Boar-king heads; eighty of them in the least, beasts of man, all forced to do within their grasp and take about whichever claim had cast them there.

‘Forget it, whichever agony the past bears on you, know that you will not be forgotten here.’

‘I will, I will, I most certainly will. I shall be cast from this paradise your people built and I will starve alone, as my child will.’

‘Then take him to a walk and don't return.’

It was as much as he could do then before his heart had come to starve and sworn upon each timeless wager, he swore upon, of eyeless stranger.

‘One day I shall destroy this land, and I shall throw it but into an abyss from which my kind will rise.’

And with a slight hint of black steel, he had left without a child, had given the blind man an arm and made it out of the paradise.

The man was still being followed, at the distance, as if they lacked the certitude of knowing, whether it be called or plain to see. They stalked him from the distance, into the hollows of a building, at the edge of a serfdom's fall. Where the buildings stood, yet to fall, after a green rise where they walked, from the frozen water, and beneath stilled figures that were caught in place, armies that were to bequest of them to stop, only for a prized few minutes, until all was being brought down.

Eighteen floating abandoned cities, standing in their darkened shadows, in their hollows, to be called out, but the dark flying beasts that lived inside then; for men were brought and hanged below, and never reached the ground, or snow.

Instead they chose to dangle aside, and would to be yet, close benign.

But this one hall, of stone and dirt, upon the grounds where there not shone. No light uncannily and nothing to be spared, there it rose again.

'Good man, allow us to be there, allow us to stay, even if it's only for a little while.'

'You're not allowed by the order of the Inquisitors Bernard and Illriss.'

'But what have I done?'

'You're a spoiler of bodies, you know that very well.'

'But is there any other man banned from entry? Is there any other reason that might not be provided as for you to stand a sentry upon each pass?'

'Traders, merchants, craftsmen and such, even mercenaries might go at last, it's just not you who is allowed pass there.'

'Again, may I be spared of it? Can I go?'

'Never.'

Far beyond the livid plain, a few steps away, into the hollow, there were a pair of worthless little wagon-trails, all put behind, he hoped as well. Dressed into a dark cloth, wrapped around the head, a shroud, upon the land he had admired, during passing, what had troubled ever the lasting of the winglets torn. Of the lodgings he came upon. Many men have made it far.

Through the trudge, and welcome far, greeted by a plainly unheeded marsh, from whence he joined and plain to be defiled, whatever could be, of which plant and which little century, was there. Many buildings, unaware, hidden on top of rafts and moving, through mists and seen all of the sudden having appeared, but always moving.

'Will we cross through the marsh today?'

'For now we're invited.'

Into the house, and faceless construct, spared. By and by with every entry and by whatever means, whichever door opened and many were there within it. For this grand terrace was but endless in sight, and many other houses were lain, for them to pass through; here was hope, they to be robbed, during nights spent in. But seeing the cavernous stretches in changed their minds, what was left behind would never come to be put aside. Heaviness was but felt, as soon as he entered, he felt his body fell. Upon each side of the raft, he could feel it spin, at that. With the taking of a moment, he had spent, and went ahead to be elated until they were followed everywhere.

‘May I be allowed to sleep during the dead of nights?’

‘But I’m sparing you of no sight.’

The Porteau had said. He wasn’t dead, for the time being. IT was enough for him to settle on and feel the scent which travelled down. It was no wonder, whichever draught, from which they drank at last, to see inside off but to be. A young sepulcher droned and be. There was nothing too quaint about it, too much harm was done inside the room. What they have touched during their time there, and how long they seemed to walk about. Little broken lots inside the house and substances which were shared.

‘Drink, drink, come on now, we’ll share everything with you, we’ll share.’

‘Wait, don’t move.’

Greenly lit, little flicks, they were around the house, and would be followed soon, yellow specks and red ones ahead; frogs croaking but no frogs inside, ravens riveting but no raven-crow, and there was also the dark man standing. He was tall and mighty faces and wore a darkness-red upon him, crimson eyes were better yes. Only slight hints around crimson rings and the rims atop the broken stings could be seen about him.

All of the sudden the floor became clear, dark-tottering wood. He was but the dark-king of a black-monsoon. Riveting for everyone, whose ever taken, claimed but none. He most certainly moved and touched, everything was taken in, broken apart. He whom wore a veil, he whom wore a tome across him, but snails made of him crawling, little leeches and tiny spiders in the making, even but the body of a man of science crawled around in form benign, like a little speck, a flower-like back on which the flowers were but violets. About his body all but spared, they had entered another side of him, a pocket inside. All resided in there and would see. All to talk about and see.

‘Stay back, men, do not approach him.’

But he had but to come yet, he was merely playing so, Pleiche Neimsk, was but the creature, if so could be called a man like him. Torn between as he had come onto them yet.

Wretched fellow would take all blow, and all set aside against him, as to show.

He had devoured a cherub as he dangled little pommel someone had unscrewed; he had but swallowed it entirely, as it were simply nowhere to be seen.

But all was complicated, as he had but taken then stairs.

‘It goes much deeper underground sir, there’s an attic downstairs.’

‘Don’t you mean a basement?’

‘No sir, we...are inside the attic.’

And first hand of the Basil, of their carried flag and better still, of the march whom stood and those of them who hadn’t shaken looking at the weird creature leave, had finally joined him there and welcomed themselves in to see. How great a treasure to be certain waiting, down the plains, in all awaking; there below the marches were but nothing of a cover, this tunnel in which they were being pushed down towards must’ve bore hundreds of miles. They were welcomed, finally, strange creatures wild and tall. And bore to their houses giant horns that were put everywhere and would bear many more whom hid inside and would to bear, begin again by the time they were spared. It was as such that the purple house is where they gotten.

Forgotten lore of which the winged beasts were brought, defiled and bloated. Spared of such a thing, as crying, mournful, unaware, they had realized upon staring that they had stumbled upon a world that belonged to creatures like him, the hair, Pleiche of which stared never ended once they truly looked. They were shaken by so many of them being there, in the open halls, serving themselves during such a feast as if to forget themselves. It was the hardness of chest and the vileness ahead which spared many of them from trying their nerves.

Charging ahead from the moment they realized, they rose for no reason. The heights were set.

In there, the plain would be not well in the head.

‘What are you serving?’

‘But one of the Dearthagns.’

He pointed at a great pair of twists, many scalpel-shaped wrist knots that were put together until they had become, a great thing made of their own. Little more than a chest heaving out, from it there spared but a little cord of crowds, eaten aloud. Cleeke had but introduced himself before their say and would take over, whenever there be claim. And walked around and spoiled was spoken, and would be throttled as soon as they would ask.

‘What news do you bring of us?’

‘Talley, Talley, come from afar, you’ve been taken and been placed as near as to be looked alike.’

‘And what they’ve done?’

‘Committed crime and evil in thine name, and would remain outside for many consecutive days. And would but throw the world in chaos unless stopped.’

‘What has there been done?’

But there was so much more that could not be said at last.

Pylo was but a face stretched, of Statuae-horns but followed around across a House of spoils, many a man inside of it as all.

‘Greetings young one whom claimed to be, what do you bring?’

‘A travesty of little beads.’

He stole them earlier, past the breeches, lions were skinned. And into the vales, where they would come within, a mane was but to hold the house instead. Plenty of men surrounding and to die for the name; of whichever claim to be the lord, too many of them present, all alike and won, no conquest from their servants, no masters from the province, not to be saturated with, be pleased, they but got inside the house a man within which bond was done. A contract was given and he would be come upon it, brought but the head of a long thing. The barn was set to ashes, the family butchered like cattle and what followed after was but a trail. A slave but heaving after knowing, of little more the world foaming; yet he was brought alive. He would not move even if it was the last thing to make him lie in any other spot, alas they cast but evil eyes, they asked of him when to pay the heed and of brought in.

‘I want only one thing, I’m after a dame, she has stolen my remains, and without them, but of evil men shall carry on whichever legacy my bone shall but enthrall.’

‘Such blasphemy.’

‘But hear me so, my bones, which breathe, my stone yet heaves shall make but a small part of an army. A fraction that shall call upon itself to swarm upon the most uncanny.’

‘What will you do when they come battering at your door? When they look upon you so with the soles of evil beady eyes?’

When they ask of you, what have you done? ‘

‘I’ll show them this and then I’ll be at peace.’

For the strangeness was not where it lay, not out in the open, but certainly not here to say. This was a fake man who look estranged. And ever so looked upon him such a man as if to ask in vein.

‘Have I seen you before? ‘

‘You don’t really get to call it so.’

And he but showed but what he hid in chest, he was revealed, a dark thing battering, but always heaving up and thence. It was but shown to last and to have cast, but a single light on what was going on. He was afraid only for a moment more, until he could refrain from doing it so. He was but vile and vilified, by which he was cast aside, no pay in mind to look for work.

‘Damn them, must I always be in such pursuit?’

And on the road, an evil Crook, shaped like a strange great pillar which was molded of eight men turned this way, first one normally, the one in the back seventy five degrees counter clockwise, facing out of his back as well. The next two, both directions, both turned with their heads towards the opposite legs, leading towards four distinct feet hung in the air, connected to four more on which hanged the men. The shapes would be completely molded, as to show no finger nor any arm, nothing from the distance, nothing from afar. But in their chest and in the depths of their cavity, which they shared, a nest where peculiar long human headed birds which were connected to these bodies were the ones who spoke.

‘There’s but none like us, you know that, mister?’

‘I suppose it to be so, but what is it to you?’

It could’ve been sworn that there, in the dark where they lay, there was no certainty as to say, what they saw. Of this lane far, little point-huts were put on hunt and set of fire ant hills as if to make their home at last, and conjured upon their veils, there stood but the most perilous beings, the peels. Which dropped and fell and would wrap around as if to tell, whomever touched as well, as well. Half-wits had crafted, small pints and stoppers, which were working, blowing but tiny airs, into the hills and into the mass as well. Which result could be seen, each rose from within, each tree and each spare off the bat, where there stood but an uncanny man which had burns on his body, tar. Beneath the earth he spoke, he tried digging a hole but a burst of fire, molten, bore, had maimed the man worse than any beast.

All around there lay no peace. Yet weird structures, which made no sense; despite the fact they rose from within the chest and within the lay, it made as much as it could be conveyed. Strange turns and strange makings, even worse than what went conveying; they were rose upon death masks, invisible ones. Forming the great molds of towering formations of dominating strangled bars, holding within the drops of large towering felt upon or touched-like pots, out of which rose sharp, triangular heads and spike leads that surrounded them; too twisted to be looked upon, of dirt and fire-risen, of the most uncanny feeling teaser. But naught of the normal thing which fell; when they ran out of things, some of the structures were made out of men.

‘You need to check whether or not they know and show them the like as if to sow whatever means there are.’

With that alone in mind, afar, they settled to watch together, the touched huts and the chambers, at last which only brought them so much closer.

As soon as they but felt, around each den, but marks within and words of dead; they were greeted by four man that looked as such. All the same and would to be, at last. They spoke and claimed they’d bring much more, many others, who shall take their lives if time draws forth.

‘Twenty of you will be dead by the time I raise my finger-bed.’

It was what he called the veiled thing, the prick he carried around, that which destroyed all, that which would consume when all other options ran out.

In a matter of a few hours they were met, by eight hundred of them standing in the back, lined up as in a crowd. Armed with little more than clubs made out of their faces, and little compressed bodies which were cackling with every passing fingers. Eyes were pierced by long fingers that had entered their gums, out of their mouths, then back into their eyes as if they were but sutured in. This was incontestable any longer, it was what had to be. There was not a single reason to reel it in. The most peculiar ones behind; fighting themselves, eating pieces of their own throats; worsened by the time they had made it so.

Within the hour it would be settled, whichever other direction and the darkening of their creation. But how could it be theirs?

‘Crook, you tell me, how did we stumble onto this and who is the ruler of this disease? Who’s the one responsible for it?’

‘I couldn’t tell you, that’s but a secret worth a life.’

‘So you all know and you withheld it for me all this time around, so I could be drawn into a trap?’

‘Why would I be here in this case then?’

‘I do not know, but tell me this, what are we to do then?’

‘Push through them and walk towards the structure before the hole in which it’s ripped into is gone. Before it hardens and there it lays until the end of which foretold us of every human and every pray.’

With as little as that he simply pushed past them, with little fear, being put aside no more. Pile had but put whatever reason he’d considered behind, whatever pushed him now only told him, on the deeper side, return, return, from whence you came from, do you not realize how much we’re worn? You won’t make it half-through. As much as he could see it, hue. He had but settled to walk forth. Still in his back, the Crook followed so. He considered as much, there was the chance, that he could somehow make it through flight. If that were the case, if such was ill, to be as well; he could say farewell to glory and forget all which made human life, it could all have been a lie. He’s with them, isn’t he? Why trust the creatures inside? You can turn at any moment and claim him if that’s what you desire and that’s what’s to your name and tide. If destiny would have it, claimed, if you could but. Reached, they stopped upon the way. There was no way to get up there, only entering a strange tunnel-hole root which was contorted within and out, while wreathing where it shouldn’t. If one were to fell down there, he couldn’t get away, by no means as if to say, and lay himself, wherever aside. There were dark things not even his mind could conjure that hid in there and winked their eyes. No matter what they meant. And how deepening their sight had went.

‘I will leap in.’

‘Or you could take the easier way out and claim your stretch and climb upon my legs there, as you should be bound to understand, there’s no way out yet.’

‘So, only so be certain and ensured. You’ve tricked me all the way here?’

‘Indeed I have, and to be sure. I should let you know that this is my armor, and I may not be faltered after. And I have made you lay for long, hours at that, in which you thought you would have a chance.

You’re not that clever, yet at all. You’ve made it seem like you could make it on a whim if you pushed it ever so clever as to make it.’

‘But I’m here am I not?’

‘To your grave, much better; I seem to have taken a liking to your attitude.’

Delight of which there was but naught, they set aside the feeling on, and shared to be, on top of him, but reached the structure, on the top. He saw a means of entry to the side, pulled inside and drawn to it as a mouse to cheese, a rat reprise, into the realm then called forth. He was on top of a great roof. The sight he shook.

All but starlight which fell, upon growths uncanny everywhere; sluggish mixtures, large twists, abstractions of leeches and other larvae-fills, and many that stooped low, some that came to show that there eight bridges, all interconnected. Dissected by each light, the sound of boots and every flight, roofs that were nowhere to be seen; all but felt within the grasp. A rash of many needle-bloated marks which formed the arches which had welcomes; tainted robes and ear-flavored with a face that was but a single ear-drum filler with little growths, attachments of their own that spread about the place. It was hardened, a mask of iron with spines in it, and all to his body wreathed in purple fiery stallion.

Strange, as it were, he welcomed Pile and were not for his grace and what he looked like, he might’ve been whipped immediately by the estranged servants that followed after.

‘Lower your arms, he’s safe for a touch, for now at least.’

Of wrath as much there was not much left.

He was lead towards the Commune-beast upon which they shed bead crumbs. It ate and wore its claws, since it bore clumps inside and twists of skin, stumps within and missing heads, from within, eating with the bot-flyesque attachments that expanded and allowed it feed. These were better times, and this appeared to be the only chance one would have to get this close to it, since it spread, from it erected, the little things but spread around the valley, having carved it.

‘It’s always pacing around at time. I suppose, that’s the reason there’s a well in the middle untouched. Even such a creature needs to drink from time to time.’

‘Unlike everything else that’s been touched, there’s but one thing that’s still tiresome you should be made aware of.’

‘That is?’

‘It’s wearing us down being there.’

And upon the stone steps they had finally come in, stumbling on their feet no longer as the first of the houses were but followed through. Every living creature, even those outside had little movable hoses attached to their chests, reverse pumping them inside the beast, which asked this of them. For the very least, it would have something to eat and something be returned as soon as possible. Otherwise, who could tell and of what lies beneath each home.

‘We shall enter one of the facets since that’s clearly what you desire.’

Another masked man, why do they all have to hide themselves? What are they afraid of showing?’

He had considered as much.

Great hammer-head top but not with two protrusions, instead going downwardly as to form a stylized chunk or rock that receded below, as to form a pseudo tip of isles. A giant horn-like formed country could be seen somewhere, attached to their own. And beneath, one of the lowest countries appeared to be a peculiarly sculpted two dimension pear-bottom shaped face, with a single giant eye in the middle, yet no round angles, all squared. Head square bearing the eye, a rectangle for the lower pear shaped, lower side mouth which appeared to be made in a formation as to kill the lowest country which rested like a cradle. He could not take his eyes away from that peculiar map, Pile hated being reminded of it. Most importantly of that thing; which he's settled to find out where it was for himself and make do with it one day.

'Here's the entire hose arrangement, it should be enough, fair to say at least that they go just about everywhere, under every piece of ground and every possible touch. For what's worth, I'm as disturbed as you are.'

'How come you avoided it?

What about your servants?'

'We don't live in the Commune and the beast knows this. It would never harm outsiders, at least not intentionally. And there's a great deal to the beast as for you to know that it's not as idiotic as it's made to look.'

Although there were no signs of there being any cognitive thing with the absence of the head; they were fair. The people of the city, from their hands to their features that ended below the masks, overly wrought and soon to be gone, but. He never asked what they produced.

'May I go.'

'As you please, but be careful not to lose yourself around the Commune, it could be a maze sometimes, if you were to believe it.'

'I'll be fine, don't worry about it.'

With it, he was underway, to search for a three-spot, a crossing between three people whom were but brought there, from whom knows where.

Petulak, Hyndway and Sechree, all but standing upon a broken mule-cart in the middle of the road; filled with but a few pots which had been thrown and put aside. They were cracked and made to lose their sides, every piece and everything put to shreds, every cast but underway as they were lain in wait for one receiver. Thinking of himself, as through, he had considered as such how easily he would do to help them with what they were plain and were not to ask and instead but stood there, at last, the stranger.

And revealed as much, that their hoses, yet that come from earth, from foundation and from the girth of the beast's back, were attached to their mouths, yet appeared not to impede communication, it was plain to see that they had been enjoying themselves way too often and way too much for their precocious nature to be easily settled.

For one who's not but seen a lot, for what he was called and sent, on bound, to search for the culprit, wherever he may have went.

But lo and high above them, there was but a large set of metal roads, all cut and put on sticks and rows, which lead upon one another, handling, all around, largely surrounding the main structure, domed roof, upon which meeting roved, and there, to stand. Upon tiny specks and metal legs, rested two pairs of citadels; kept in air, a system as well by a metal belt, surrounding them, always walking on the flat land, iron bound and melted-in, about the place. From large empty trails, moved the little charts and the small plain steel droning wails. Magma chapters draw from somewhere in the west and south, they but made the middle steel darters whom threw but arrows flunk about. And the people wreathing in appear, but wrapped around and morning, teal, lights would come to emerge, and the weakest of alloy and of bonds were but drawn inside, then never to be seen. Lost about the place, then become ill, with the weakest men, with the wickedest of armors, then, the forges always sang, they mourned for their lost children and lost about, their dear, survivors, who walked around and met, the defilers.

Those whom came with peaks during the mournful light's eve; upon their wreathing hits, they took from within only the most unnecessary pints, only the most useless things, which were in-between the builds, there standing. Little fire-grunting rocks, and flocks of steel bipeds trapped between and nested in their laps as they had run, before the citadels would come upon them. Always moving within its platform, on laid by a mischance, the disastrous thing being after, the fact that it heaved itself and moved around, always droning, then lost; that was just as much as mattered, whatever happened after.

Taking its time, moving around, being dragged by chains and peculiarly primitive vehicles that were set and put about, weighted but never pushed. And dragged and one shook.

In the distance, one could see. Peculiar heights that were pushed around, in order to be called; wreathed about, there came, without a shout, the first signs of high ceilings, which were domed. Thrones for long men with long mans' whom likes would tear up the world. Mats of being, cattle-wrought enabled. Tall builds, upon which hands put through, twists and pearl-like bulks within, towering on top each other, some curved and pushed through, one another, crested and wreathed about.

It was pointless, and about the wreathe, and would to be and they were gone.

There were large, uncanny, high buildings that came in clusters of tens, or hundreds, all molded together as if to form termite hives, which were connected by building shaped enclosed bridges that connected every few floors. On top their domes, uncanny heaving hard bulk black heads which were droned with little flying locust-beings, eating form diseased-clouds, drawn in, about the plain.

As it was clear, the two citadels were looked, at the base of their shared conjoined side like two mighty mountains put on top and wreathed in to form a few telescope towers, grand and might and heaves about, still legs but moving It, while put to pressure, in the crowds of little iron things with iron arms, of little more than eyes of ten glowing, red, ten glowing blue, ten glowing yellow and of whichever other sang. And at times, when unneeded, when the work was but brought away, as they would be forced to wait for a little longer, they pulled out thin reeds of iron, upon which hung lights. Running around, chasing non-existent fireflies. Would do this for hours.

But whom to live in the two citadels if not the most uncanny land-landers, whom had come from long stretches of lands, and had settled inside; for they were giant, but not as tall as to say, twenty iron people put on top of one another's shoulders, and would to be hid away. Played with and pushed around and woe to them, when time had come.

They were living forges themselves and would often splash one another not with iron but with animals, which they had melted. Everything would be stained by them. Every wall, every floor and every giant, a taxidermist-pool; they swam in little swoons and swans, in little ducks and plenty birds of colors and of shrouds, a harem of feathers, torn but colors kept. They swept the rooms and put heads everywhere, only to decorate. Cattle-horned wasp-puddles, horse-bubbles, bulls of eighteen heads and large throats which accompanied no legs, elephants of which girth and meat and growth evolved and darkened, suckered like raisins that bled after in most peculiar little tiny hanging dens on top the ceiling from where a steam-like heat came out of, which only brought their feet to smell like little unfathomable grith.

Curtains, man of pig, not spoken of.

Sometimes the citadels would fly in the air, as far and as fast as they could, like tiny flocks of feathers pushed on by the wind.

On the rooftop during the execution; the lime was set, upon the bed, on top the highest ceiling, dead, was the man who bit from it, when the time arose, the silken heap of dust and mist, colored in the pink and yellow-rose upon which wink had taken them before.

They moved out of their way and only woke up, the four of them, in a land where they were reeled in for. Only for the moment, needed, only when the siphon heeded, only for a little while, until their arms but tired now.

Least of all, one man entered in the distance, one home.

Dreadful building, tall house, put inside a mountain, nothing of it could be seen from the outside, other than the forefront which bore. Eight statues caught in fight, wrought by sculptors whose hands were still there, as more and more came around. Tiny bridges all on walls, one would be incapable of climbing on top of them, no matter how hard he tried. The insides of the tall house, plain; a carpet straight shaped like a giant hammer in the front, leading to two rooms, each bearing a longer door than the other. One crimson patterns of serpent crests, with little dents, a table near it, with a candle, two plates with a vase on top of them, stacked, whitish plants, with eyes inside their cores. Various knives and a few coins next to it, a crossed-like chamber at each end, which lead to a strange horn-like, or the insides of a horn, surrounding each entry-side. Segments holding nothing but a fire-lamp encrusted on top.

The insides of a room, flat, a bed on the right side, two windows, a few placed cabinets between a cabinet on the left side of a room. A giant spherical device surrounded by various golden-like belts that bore twisters, controllable as to expand upon the globe, behind then screwdriver-like levers actioning them, as if to push around and make them work when it was necessary to extract something or lay a mark. Outside the window, the sight of the city brought to view, large sight, two fountains, one smaller, which was surrounded by a smaller commune of its own, and in the distance, approaching a valley-like rise, or a hill push, a grander city, leading to a high-raised wall which was made out of shields, wooden hills, trees, and hardened rock-colored eels that were put inside, wrapped round in chitin, of each creature-like thing whose head rooted there.

There came no wonder at what they've built, a peculiar shape within their grab, a warm greetings upon them, thinned.

'Will he who speaks against him rise then?'

'I think I'm the accuser.'

And the man was simply shot in the head, the trial being over.

A few birds were set in flight, always trying themselves through.

'There comes him of all, let us sing him.'

Voice ran across the hall, and he had finally drove in, fashioned, if all could see him, they would sing. And would upon him, better yet, within the grasp; like a carp, at the bottom wrung upon a filthy beam, upon which ship-like mounds of skin, they rose from every side, formations, almost fumigation, the birth of a nation came from inside it as soon as they could breathe. Pushing out within the hour, until they were all pinned down. Heads were painted blue, with slashes white coming from the white painted chests and the trunks below of black coal, painted so as to burn, upon the brim upon which they walked. This wreathed fish burnt about the hour, made to suffer. His eyes fell out during the utmost hour of disaster when all fell between the cracks, formations forming on them, at last.

'I, be, I bee, they see me, they can see me in my hour of evil.

I who danced with my kin, I see them when they come, upheaval.

They want me to admit, I poisoned. I, whom cherished their lives and destroyed, I poise upon the arches, still, I want to serve and serve within.

They will trash me and they'll make me wash and kill the need, and I see washed.'

He said upon remembering, how the birth of the city had come at last. Many of the painted men's descendants now listening, as of evil, much he prophesized; when time arose, his smile froze. Man walking upon reeling blows upon the ground, as fashioned. Beneath the earth stood their kind, many eggs, splashed open; rope creatures alike always drawing out for air. They came during such times as if to repair whatever entered their unfairness of mind, they put out and poured, remains in the loom-machine, the basin of features, melted steel.

'You must speak with our ancient Scribe, he must tell you of what we talk about.'

And they had spoken filth and pulled absinthe-like drink, upon the beer, filth within in. Filled their barren, much apparel, clothes were put in, coats were channeled upon by the men. Who could not control themselves, staring at them. As women sang, their focus rang.

Upon the hour so much so they stopped knowing, asking for more, smoke came out of houses, there couldn't be a thing to stay. Seething, or another one coming, bringing themselves up to know.

Somewhere in the city.

There, to yonder, came the ruse. And four of them, obtuse-obtuse, man stepping out of house, for he is looked upon, upon; there in distance taken, for yore, and long-between the time had come. In the distance came the cries, they wake, upon each likened about and as for each face. They bore and shred and piece between, upon altars within the time they settled to find none, within the hour fading, and always but vain, as if to gather.

Upon the chapel, and shrine of Affer, they begged the priest but in disguise.

‘Grand upon blessing upon the world, that I may seek some freedom that I may fend each and every piece of earth, that I may last and cast upon the heinous, in wretch and in disgust no more. I seek the blessing your forefathers gave upon me, I want to seek but peace when it calls upon me, when the times emerge, when I may walk upon a land like Yore, where I may call and need, and breed with cattle, so of my evil children come after.

They whom shall take my place upon the seat of spikes, and might pray when time comes upon evil tide, they shall be blessed as well, as if to tell, as if to be baptized in his name. And they will follow through with births, as I promise you, as for a lord, as from a servant whom shall grant you forth, you’ll take what’s mine, upon desire, and for your lord, I shall admit and yet admire. Whichever acts he calls upon me to commit, whatever he wants, I shall bring to his feet.’

And there he stared, but for a moment more, at a statue unlike no other than, for what was worth, and what had made it, and never-never, never ending, in the forms it took. With the many stacked upon each other, wrapped around and shook, figures of men, servants of the den, those who joined him, well and well. Upon a hole, above, above, up the ceiling where lay his home. Where the winged servants with no heads, served him as well, as well; in their coming of their blades, where teeth but glint, to tell, to tell; him to ask what comes then after, the priest but stepped aside, much faster. For when the time came for him to ask, and bring about the time, where cast upon him, there did followed, a strange defiling, the bleeding-shallow, there was but the floor which was turned and every sight as if a storm would. Then every touch was but wearisome as if to take, and claim everything away. Upon this touch, they’d feel him so, as If he had been claimed by Affer, whom listened to him so.

‘I welcome you my son, to join, upon my evil world, where worm is joy; first I ask you, open chest.’

To which Lesser but, body-froze, and opened grates as if canal. There but opened, and revealed much, little things that moved and danced, like little wreathing toys, with heads and boils, drowned in the black tides. For his new master checked the hue, making sure they’re all dark and wreathed in sinew. Once, much pleased, and better teased, he but asked for no better reprise, than to ask for one of them, much given. Upon a plate of metal wreathed, one of the many servants brought forth. They were but chained and wrought in torn-up clothes. All of dark-surroundings, taken and put to stay; a vileness as the kind to satiate, a peculiar touch which only made them ever so much aware that he was yet to lend more of his soul into the eater.

But as soon as he put a dark chatterer, which was taken from his body, not much better than a minute watched, how he tried to run, only to be kept inside and made to suffer after, no matter how hard, no matter the pity, always trying himself, and always the fealty. It was what kept one in, that was what kept the heart beating, and trying, not worsened after each cast. Which moved away, on pass, on pass; to try again and move within, he asked of him but on a whim.

‘You see the clouds, the skies inverted?’

‘I see, dear master, and I’m to be cast, but mended.’

‘And of my servant that’s but standing there, on bench but put through bed of spikes?’

‘I see him bled, I stand aside.’

‘Well go to him and grab him so, then put his mouth, inside the sole, my feet be kissed, and him but spared. After that I shall give you fair.’

But of his choice, reward, he hadn’t said much, and everyone in the row was cackling as if they were caught, largely in disgust, in the most vile, of bile, to put through with what had happened after. He had but spared, he got through them, and would remain, again, again. Before his time drew on, before to cast himself, and when the time followed after, he reached at last, and stood on side. And took the pain, be claimed to die. For every second he dreaded as much, and would not accept it, no matter, at last.

He had but spared himself of reason explanation, of ransom which would be damned, and bring to him starvation. There, again, none asked of him, as he had thought again, but there was nowhere near, no one but themselves, the two of them, and the servants, whom cast but evil glance. Despite, despite, of little spite there were to the man, he’d finally gotten him, as to be aware, to drag him by the side and put him down, when time, when time, had asked of him benign, to kiss the feet and set aside. The man had tried, and put a show, of much resistance, as much was known. Thrown on every side, they settled, and when the time approached, the evil letter.

‘There you’ve done it, and ever since you considered this, and since you’ve done it, I shall allow you peace, to ask, claim what you want and I shall give it you within my power, if it comes at last, during a time, when I may be set free, during what I claim to be, possible, I may do.

If not, then I shall kill you.’

‘But you did not tell me of those terms.’

‘And I have thought you less suicidal, as to ask of verse. Make you claim and I shall decide it, if it’s beyond it, I shall cast it. Inside your head, and your death shall not be claimed, and you won’t live as if to climb your way, as to reach your god, to him convey.’

‘Then I lay claim the life of my evil wife.’

‘So be it, go on ahead and claim her upon your home upon the dead of the night.’

Then he swore and made way, and his vision never change, never, always after. And in the midst of night, when dark awaking, he had said all after, and cock-a choking, as to kill the rooster, dead in sleep, the hen would weep, but he'd see it through. And after all around he ran about the chambers, called off to any maiden, until finally, across the street, in the midst of an empty city, he looked above his feet, the roof, and there, oh there, oh, unaware.

‘What have you given to me, oh lord Affer?’

He looked upon the cradle of each tile and there his maiden wasted, and nothing but her bride, the brick, and would to weep upon the coffin staying, just as putrid, stupefaction, deadly in action, her head fell off, then her arms, and then, the rest of her house, in a dead pity graveyard which was swallowed by the ground. And where he stared, alone, and praying, he but saw the soil emerging. Upon where came and whence remains, but a single tomb-stone for the slain.

‘What have you done to me, master? You have made a promise and cast upon me such disaster, what have I done, and what to bear? I did as you commanded and now I'm treated, much unfair.’

‘You must excuse me for what I've done, but you were too easily done, for me to cast aside such opportunity fading, I wanted but to cast you so and do as I please, before you line shone.

Now lay your head to my side and give me another piece of your soul, as I will call upon your next instruction.’

‘But what will I do, after and after?’

‘Listen to me and do as I please, only that way will you be able to please yourself, to me, to me.’

‘Why must my vision be so?’

‘I suppose the reason, as it might be so, is nothing but that which remains, you've chose the wrong lord and now with your head, where it might be, so it may lay.

And there you are, and here I am, with another one of you cacklers in my veins.

I must have you watch and go and enter a home.’

‘Bastardly, I will be caught and wrought.’

‘You shall not be brought to justice in my land.’

‘And if they catch me during the act?’

‘I shall blind them, now listen on before my anger emerges. Or I shall cast you in such pits, my body merges with evil spirit and defeat, as much as so.’

And there he went to explain as such. Everything in detail, to bring the clothes from outside each chest, from inside her wardrobe at least eighteen of them, and dress in each and follow through, various parts of town and pretend he's him and follow through. Her husband might be called, and when he returns, if, at all, hide but a spike trap, and rig the chests, make sure he suffers and blows his head off.

‘Won't that be dangerous and why must I pay for each of them? ‘

‘You must also dress and talk like him and do as I say because it pleases me.’

‘But I would not like that.’

‘Yet you will do it nonetheless because you know I’m in a dire need of being impressed, otherwise, what might one think, If I were to take your teeth?

And the rest of it, now carry on.’

For he had called, and would be gone, to go ahead and plain as it were, the instructions went deeper, than break in and bed himself with wrung-up clothes, he had to mix them for the days, in order to.

‘Wait, how should I know?’

Dire thing, he forgot to ask, for each market, for each recital and each peculiar thing, what to put on.

‘But I shall talk to you then.’

And there he spoke with the clothes, whom out of the chest, they rose. As if invisible, the cast of a man, whom was inside of them spoke and so they long debated. Of which treason might this invasion be deterred to; as it happened, there entered the cast, whom question and saw him as well, as they asked as such. As it happened, even the black nails spoke to him, and all dejected.

First the floating man-shaped clothes.

‘I hope you don’t plan on killing the man by which I interpose myself as.

It would be such a tragedy to have him slain in such disgust.’

‘Will the mistress give me finer milk?

Will I be fed other things than rats and wisks?’

And there came the nails as well, all whom wrought would spare, no tale.

They were wrought about and seemingly clandestine. Some had spoken to him and claimed to have been taken from a ship, as well from a head of iron from a floating pair of canon-balls that had been taken away. Wrought and brought from large-afar.

‘I was but a piece of iron, on the frontier.

And was of plate and taken yet again and put in one of the lower countries, where they put me so.’

Which only brought him to take some of them off, in order to silence and brought to such violence, he but shoved them all across his chest and put the clothing on while spoken, and the cat in his mouth and choked on it. Then the door started and he put it on his back, wrapped around with a cord of iron which ripped half of his gut, which bled out and spread blood-fire, having ignited the very room. Having walked while choking, the door but split in half and entered through his spine, through. And then he got out and left it so, passing by the owner, the lady who froze so. Not knowing what to do, he simply gutted his chest, which pushed but some air, which forced a paw out of his mouth and on her face. Which swiped, again until she bled, but this wasn't working as it was intended, as the maiden was still away; that prompted him to put her down, on top of her, but spilling blood. Both of them but awkwardly fencing. Stared upon by a nasty crowd, they were all big eyed and but to question, what happened here, he came around and choked to death. Fell on her, she suffocated.

There in distance, was a house, lain on the side, on a pile wrought in bodies that were put on every side and heaved about the place, but standing. Torn between the sides, a pile of roads that were never ending; that was but a place, that's never been as much disgraced, not to be put on a pile, not to be wrought and defiled, one should know of it.

Yet on the streets

There were wunderbuster all around, and for thin feet walking yet upon, the streets, in the midst of talking.

Between the rows of men he walked, as strongly after, his feet were dent.

Billed upon, the man had yelled.

'Come back you rapsallion and give me back what's mine!'

He yelled and moved, not to prove, nor he should.

'You need know better my lord, as you have sinner of your pay's worth. You pain me much.'

'And you paint me a coward, there, we're done then.'

'I only ask what's faire, two meskins, and I'm off my way.'

'Only what's fair, bring me his head and his groins in a bag, or you'll find me in a bad mood the next time we talk about the hour.'

'But you pain me so.'

Yet he walked out the tavern, having seen the scene unfold. A young man, a land like him in youth, but shook the owner, as he understood; he stole potatoes, carrots, tomatoes and blanks. The boy had crafted a medieval arm. Peculiar little rascal he were. Went out of his way, along each den, there walked around, his house about the highest ones, where he stopped, as he were, by a simple man who didn't find a reason for him to be there. And asked as such, no longer coming to ask him, watch. Him play, and stay there and stay his hand.

He was gallant and tall and brought two henchmen strong, which be an under grated, lacerated word which done, upon the house, but shaken, none of the roosters of the hen, to make it alive, were not of this plain. Unlike this world, they wouldn't do. And they saw lights in sky and deeper blue, they had. Word spread about.

'They caught the child, they caught the child.'

Brought around each moon, he had, until every darkened spot was but a cycle, after that, they stopped harassing, yet the boy, once he's paid, revealed, avoid. Each of the men around had but taken turns and grabbed him by the head, then kicked around, each a knee. Thrown across the street, and rocks would see but the end of his mouth. It was plain after a second, that he was worn today.

Upon his return, his mother was dead.

'But dear lady mother, who has raised me as such ever since I was a child, ever since and in the making, since I ever knew, awake, awaking. Could you please remove yourself from slumber, smile? Upon your bitter face I see no wild thing, but foaming.'

He had pointed, never knowing. Eaten by the chicken and the cock, as she wasn't to be defended, after that; despite her open ribs and see-through wings of feathers, what was left behind. Though her exposed guts still moist and warm, from the hen in doubt, showed up to the boy, said upon him, when time drew upon him, their ploy.

'But you're mistaken, oh grand-child.

We've but claimed her life, as to grant and yet repay, the cruelty you've shown earlier today.

As you've trapped but a poor bug, between a nail and a button, brought, and flung inside a chest, you left it there, without a rest. For it had stood there beneath the light of sun, as you have, in the end but starved him out.

That reason is yet just enough, for you to know and after that, you've failed to defend your mother. We claimed her and in this night.'

'You can't do this.'

'We shall claim another.'

And ever so, with ever night passing through, without his know; as to arrange the funeral, have her remains but be taken away, another one seemed to be. Caught by them and pushed to be eaten straight away and let to rot; in the ground and where to, not.

All of them having gathered in the final home, but molded together as to form a pile, and a bile of many beaks and many eyes which changed in colors of the grown-gore which pushed out of them a most ridiculous pair of leg-like things, like that of insects which had rested in, out of a giant forming hole inside their chests, which was used to check everything, along their way. They levitated just as soon, and would but grab the child, woken upon a swoon.

There, in front of the mother, within the hour, they presented her child.

Ripped apart, but kept stable, but connected with their inside-gables. Many little feet but entering his crown, his arms and legs and everything else; he had been put and worn, and would be sworn.

If it didn't mean he couldn't fashion himself away, and worn.

Her eyes but worn out, couldn't make it. A dreadful disaster, barely fended, a nightmare for each kind, something that might've torn her if she were alive.

But her gut exploded, and there he came.

Out of her, again, again.

'I've been hid inside her for the past hour.

Hah, I have defeated you and now I will have gotten my satisfaction.'

'But we, of all, damned thing you are.

We shall return to our home.'

Yet they hadn't realized, that by the time they were there, inside their den, but many bugs on lain to side. And many men had fled as they were still attached to the child.

Again, he had taken them as such, he's come to defeat them, before they even revealed themselves from trance.

In the midst of the midnight met, both of them, standing, as to yet, neither of them understood on which way, this satisfaction fading, nor would their contrivances be ever ending.

Conquest

They lived upon a sour tasting land that was white like sour bubble-wrapped candy, with little puffs and smoke clouds instead of bushes, filled with planted man-cocoons that were set on fire. And died inside suffocating while having their skin liquefied into ashen-white remained, their charcoal-blood but pained to see their bones passing in the ground; to the little white rods that entered their heads, through which they spoke to the dead-erected piles of wore, of which swords were still wreathed along, but no longer standing, past the bullet-heaps of slugs which were put inside their heads and worn-out led-plants of cotton-born people. Each of them being picked on by thin dark-wrought giants that stood out; as they could be seen from the distance; upon the lighted plains and upon the skies which were but clouded every single day; to which the bastardly rains of ivory bullets came after. Hares being strung and put down after, the land was being dirties by their spots.

'I shall be the first whom shall crush this hare and splatter its entrails everywhere.'

With his fist, he's but destroyed it, put down, bam, a slit of blood follow-through. It made him be aware of the things which were but to come, as if on cue. Out of their mould, upon which bodies hung, and were not brought, they stood out momentarily standing.

'You're not dead.'

‘I was just pretending.’

‘Then you will join them, in that case.’

Upon which he snapped his finger, was given a gun and put the man down as soon as he came to life. It was a glorious day, as even the second splatter came after upon the finely powdered man whom had been made to look after, everything that was out there. Of course he was aware, they were looked now, by the giant thin dark men, whom wanted to destroy them.

‘But what have we done to you? Vile things you need to be destroyed!’

There were also black disc-like, sea-parasites in bulk, with large triangular edges around each rim, which drew out in every direction, thinned by the second, splattered beneath them but what they puked out as well. Since they were but given the start, they couldn’t control themselves.

‘We shall employ one of the rider to take claim over one of those beasts, you hear? I want them bred?’

And it appeared that those things appeared in droves, out of nowhere as they came to rise, gathered around until they couldn’t help themselves. And many which had appeared bore multiple compounded eyes that stood out. Black reddened, and put to ground. And little stalks came out of their backs which carried pumping balloon-like creatures like them. With compounded eyes that were spread everywhere upon them as they spread disease everywhere, in this land to be claimed in the name of ugliness.

In one of the white painted cottages in the distance there were two men talking.

‘I was talking to you about something.’

‘About what?’

‘About the creature I saw, it was strange. It was the body of a man, crawling like an animal without lifting its hands and arms, its neck, it was stretched upwardly like a long pipe, leading to a growth of eight stacked together different heads that didn’t belong to him, which at the top formed a great-hammer of skin, from which two giant horns emerged, curved along the head-pole, then outwardly to reveal a hollowness in the inside.’

The man started making hand motions along the air, to show her the bottled humans inside the horns, which were pushed out in their cylindrical form, opening their mouths to reveal small arachnid like legs that carried little sacks or balloons that grew, expanded and retracted constantly, as breathing-bags do. And he was afraid that they might bear, one of them, an evil eye that speaks, whom could have him perform acts of evil.

Jumbled fingers were not but taken. Where his beak was but mistaken; of which flights of white he’ll rake, they came the while and would not stay away.

‘I am bird.’

‘You are the masks, I say.’

‘I am the bird masks then and I shall hire you to my employ.’

‘In which case what is there to be done?’

‘There’s something that begs for my initial apprehension. I am in search for a man who broke the sacred eggs. He killed my dark children, the beak ears that bleed now, forever in a state between fetus and yet to be wake.

Caught in an eternal nightmare from which they may never be allowed to come out, do you understand? My life without them is but a shame, a reminder that I have failed them. They will never be at my side.

And I will never be able to get away from this, knowing that they cannot be killed, destroyed, or be unmade by any means.’

‘Who is the culprit?’

‘A leaper that’s been jumping around the areas for days; I do not know who he is exactly, but I know as much. He’s gone as far as to lay claim upon what I’ve made. Upon my pains as a man, upon what I created as well; he’s broken my sculptures as a decoy. He’s burnt my nests upon my return, and stole what little I had afterwards, and now I’m left without a single egg in touch, for what he’s done is but employ a nasty tactic.

He knew I would be shocked by this sacrilege which would stun me in place as I am left mourning for my children. He knew what that would get out of me and now. I come to realize that I was a foolish creature. As the time spent mourning came at a much greater loss, as the bandit made it off with those that had a chance to be spared.

I do not know whether or not they’re still under his employ yet, or whether he’s come to destroy them as he had done with the others. I’m unaware whether or not he’s taken to the markets or simply scourged them in some dark place where my children’s spirits might rot.

Upon such waking I’m bound to be met by them. My children will be made aware of my failure to protect them. And by the time we will have met, they’ll be turned against me. Rotten creatures wrought not in my image but a twisted contortion made to employ suffering over what I’ve done.

For that reason I’ve come to call you. I need your help. I need you to recover them, one by one, wherever they might be spread. I assure that I can pay for my expenses and not a single coin might come to be wasted. And I shall grant you glory as you will be called, and lauded, put to laurels.’

‘Enough, I get it, you’re going to feed me what I want. You’re paying me extra for the feed I’m going to get them.’

‘You don’t suppose the great hatching is on its way now, do you? But that’s outrageously soon, wouldn’t you think so?’

‘It needs to be considered.’

‘Then off with you and find the one who leaps.’

That’s all he’s given the hunter. Aqse Imp was already gone by the time the creature blinked. Its many eyes but seething everywhere, the beaks but opened and protruding, with littler-beaks pushing out upon lumped tongues that opened like flowers, with their many triangular facets exposed to the sun. Bouncing light rays across the plains, seeing the footprints as the invisible hunter got his way around.

He leaps, it told me; not much to go on.

There were many leaping creatures just about the place, but not many like him, at least not many that would make this amount of noise.

For the great colling was to approach.

Lo and behold above them there stood the Robot-Man Satin Station. There was no android on board, no machine but man, white painted on the brow and everywhere else.

Its belt was struck by power.

ITs life depended on strength, but this was no mere strength.

This strength was different than the strength of man. It was peculiar, to be certain about it, that alone, it pushed through the flows and the spines and the deformations of the most benign, most unfashionable dark shapes that appeared around it.

For each guardian knew as well, the forms came out of the amp-region which shot the beams and the rays which drew the skin and the meat from outer-spaces where the beings had once been dispersed. Humans cannot die. Their energy may be redistributed along the rims of everything in the great entropy, yet one could always aim to refashion their bodies gain; with the only problem being what came after them, and what lay before them. As the beams themselves could not make the difference, contorting them together until the most peculiar creatures had been given live. Most of them being too uncanny for this world alone, let alone be them allowed to survive. They were anything but human, these rays that were but forced to become discs, which was only the first step before they were being bloated beneath them as to create the most uncanny contortions one could find himself staring at before he'd set himself at peace. Dread in their guts, unfathomably pushing and pouting. Dread in their many eyes which crawled along for every dead-star in the universe, for each of them only blackened so.

Yet there were still no machines inside the station, only hollow spots and the empty shapes the men busied themselves hitting and bashing their fists against in order to make echoes.

‘Think there’s something on the other side?’

‘You know the answer already, there’s never going to be anything in there.

You looked through one of them, I chewed the top off, my teeth are broken and yet.’

There was nothing in there, nothing that could work. And no man, at least no one who was sane could make the distinction anymore. No longer would they be met by screens and radars, no they had to deal with seeing it happen. Beams coming in, sometimes entering their eyes; in a room they stood. Dressed in their simple uniforms, all but pointing what they could, or what they grabbed from around the place, be it some pipe or some ripped off metal-pillow. Gathering around Cadet Rind, who stood in their focal point.

By then they tried rationalizing it.’

‘He’s being fed, isn’t he?’

‘I think he is but what do you want to do about it? About him?’

‘He’s not to be touched now, you know how they act.’

‘Those who are engrossed by them or?’

He knew as much but didn’t want to say a thing. He spared no second before trying his throat again, only to find himself staring. Irving was the one in the front, holding a plane panel. He, the gladiator with a shield, the reflection making them, inside the sockets reel around, likely out as they were but done.

In a fraction of a second, it was almost as if Rind’s second pair of legs grew out of his face. The soles being where his features ended, spread twice, separated, identical twins whose eyes finally came out, elongated then stared.

Both spoke. Both kept the colors white.

The marble surrounding was majestic, but now, with that thing finally out, there was the first spittle.

‘Keep it still now, I need to stare for longer than a few seconds.’

‘You know, we don’t have to do this every single time, right? I could give you something, I could bring it from the back.’

‘Slide the bucket in already.’

Hemming threw it, dead shot, it was how they would drink, bright light.

‘In his eyes please, check them.’

‘He’s still in there sir.’

‘Then he’ll have to live on the other side of the station with the others.’

Two other young cadets left the room. They made the preparatory arrangements needed to do, what was called of them. It was awkward, mightily peculiar, forced but they had replaced every possible facet inside the ship until they had made it. Wild grooves where they kept the beasts, the ones changed by the beasts, but they were their cafeterias as for a fashion.

First cargo arrived in the station after eighteen months. Every living being across the plains of the planet fear what might happen if the giant pillar legs give on. It’s how it stood in space, the peculiar oblong had deformed the gravitational wave as well as the atmosphere as to completely encompass the station. It’s how it was kept about. Pseudo-elevators finally brought the cargo on, yet they left no devices on board. That was too dangerous, it was something neither of them could deal with, for what failure.

A dark-tooth, the twin of the station floated derangedly in the vacuum. It was where they encapsulated every single machine hit by the beam, letting them rot, being uncannily filled and made to spread inside until they popped. This tendency never ended. It always showed itself every now and then.

Machines trying to remember being human, failing desperately in their attempt, they simply were there. As in the moment between their contemporary lives and the future, whatever that meant. A toaster shoved inside a man's brain, popping out of it every now and then. It was how it was. They were always trying to push their guts and strung people with them.

‘Done, it is done. The formula was written entirely with the help of scratched and my bloodily ripped bloody nails.’

‘And what does it say? What conclusion have you reached?’

‘I’ve stumbled upon the very reason why this is happening, alas. I’ve come to understand what the beam is.’

‘That being.’

‘It’s a machine, humanity, the very atoms spread around, life, organic materials, all stuffed together at various periods of time, shuffled, reconstructing, or attempting to do it.’

‘But, Charles, why is it that only those abominations are being made?’

‘Because organic matter is the only thing that’s trying to struggle free from the chaos inside the beam; to which I could only theorize this far what’s happening inside of it, or what life is like in there.’

‘Care to test your theory then?’

‘Of course, we shall dissect one of them then.’

And they brought one of the men with the peculiar head-shapes that were put together and flung about as to make bowing head-monkeys that were awkwardly and most peculiarly shaped, only to prove the most, utter most, important point. They split him open and saw a peculiarly formed bone that was made out of a wheel, a baby-doll, a teddy-bear, a few wasted cigar, an ID car and an alien half a breeding organ.’

‘It is time to enter the beam then.’

‘You lead the way sir.’

As soon as they were met by the strange peculiar light-thing that entered the room, both the cadet and the engineer entered it, immediately being transferred inside. At first it was dark, then a light came, it looked like eighteen vaguely spread light-bulbs that were constantly rotating as to reshuffle the most peculiar constellations one could wrap his mind around.

The beam stopped moving from where it started, it reeled back into the great beam-organ that was hid inside the station. It stood there, like a giant beating pair of put-together human hearts. It bled beam-blood which appeared to form contortions of human and animal faces that were stabbed or were wrought in insufficient particles to be make hole, all of them bleeding, crying, dying, being incapable of fighting for their lives. They had no hands to grab, yet the beam throw arms at their faces, then legs, then torsos, then their own faces. And it got ever more noisy than before. It was all too frustrating, they were going on, everywhere along like broken records. They were noisome, like broken telephones.

One of them said hello, a man thought he was a mole, another a moth.

‘You had the guts to call me out from going out of my house.

You put me inside the phone.’

‘I am the house, I am the dead-child.’

‘I can give you fifty, I can give you fifty.’

‘I was called by John, he told me that I was wrapped in a small box and sent across the seas.’

‘When are we going to leave for the country?’

‘You’re unconscious.’

‘Eat, eat, I want to put a machine up my brow.’

‘Let’s see what we’re supposed to do now.’

Then they were zapped, inside their heads, small puddles. They started materializing small-proton bombs that constantly blew their entrails into brains, all of which only resurfaced as soon as they could, out of the various holes they dug in for themselves and disappeared. Life was great again. Life was forgiven, all of them were forgiven for living, then they were put back to death.

It was then that the beam formed a great net in front of it, shaped like an electron-power launcher, that pushed around. It drew inside of it as powerful of a mass as it could until everything was but made to look like it shouldn’t.

This was where the machines went. It knew what it was doing; as the beam would be considered to be the equivalent of the greatest geniuses that ever existed. It made marble-machines that were put together out of many things, until what became a large eighteen by eighteen miles stretch in front of it, had come to be a great repository report making, power-drawing ultra-device that started calculating how long it took until the beam could be brought back from the dimension it was in. With every human and every object and every invisible flow that entered it, to have freed itself and finally destroy life in the continuum.

A man scribbled on his belly. He had a normal gun, which didn’t shoot bullets but fingers and they didn’t shoot them all the way through. It went out of the shaft.

‘I am so swarthy.’

‘Yes you are.’

‘Why don’t you shove it in and pull the trigger?’

‘I will.’

He did.

And it turned out that the only time it actually did manage to go off was.

The last time it was shot.

Peculiar people

‘Whom shall be the lord of dark today and to whom am I to be spared as it to pray?’

‘I do not know but look yonder, and made to be and now, the thunder.’

Of black churls that moved like coils, the meaty walls and most peculiar of most tormented wails, and whose remains were but rearranged, they listened and to pain themselves, nothing more would matter, not a single man to stay. They were but walking backwardly towards the black roads, they who were but slayers and champions, who stole from the plots and made their own. What they carried long beyond, before the stretch of the land in a most uncanny bloated song, they listened. Far in-between they saw, little more than monks that gathered, with long hands and arms, they walked upon those. The groups of men stopped, the sight was dark, the skies darkly mattered for the winds of gray but carried away the words of every man that spoke that day. And mix in the forgotten things, and wingless most destroyed rings, and little coins and little rubble and thereafter the sky was but a simple massacre, a simple disaster that no one could be allowed to forget. Groggy as they felt, the monks came in droves, millions of them surrounding but a simple hole, a bump in the road upon which the men stood. Uncloaked, revealed, they were not so, but to their appeal, what they wore before their robes, below was the most uncanny thing that would have it so. When man was met by the sight, he realized there was no way back. Such things as edges and no features, such spindles and such twists; nothing but those arms belonged to others and even those were sutured in. They moved with then. They, having become a circle, guiding by some light; in unison to their movement, it appeared, that they replicated everything as well as they could not, be of a kind, not to dwell too forthright in each other’s minds, but there was no point in crying for waste. Slowly and up-more, escorted to a dent, in some wall, which was their guild.

‘But how have we come onto it? I wonder, this was not within our path, I know nothing of this nor do I wish at that to have been made aware. I fear what might happen to me if I open my mouth and say what I have to say.’

‘Open it and let it be so.’

And with a slap on the door, they entered their guild’s home and stood there for a few hours. They were still out, watched within minute and minute as if they were inside a watchtower. Incessant birds, why can’t they stop chirruping? Their annoyance is more bastardly than that of the Monks, who stole the world and brought it here, from every corner they could be brought from. It was not within a man’s forthright bore to ask of this. But stumble upon steps, and the table upon which they looked for rotten cheese and wolf-meat stakes, some salt and peppered olives, some carrots made into a nasty glutton soup, and with spices, little more than no peculiar drink, some ale that was but made by stomping a head, out of which the man was still alive, pinned onto the wall, his head but flattered and left behind were his parents whom were stuck upon the ceiling, they whom crawled and cackled from their sealing could not but stare.

They were unaware of what happened and how was it that they were incapable of seeing what was there and how it happened so.

‘We fear, great master, that they might hurl such bolts of quiet upon us that we would stay here, be forced here, never lay a finger outside the reaches of our land, which is rightfully ours by such decree as was given by the kings themselves, the emperors, the knaves, the Martyr kingdoms and the Weeping ones where the wails are still heard.’

Yet upon eavesdropping one would only hear the most incessant screams, the most decrepit things coming from above the sky, from the darkest corners that could enter their minds, the forges of words and lays were but drowned in cords of wails. The shouts of pain across the world but seemingly buried the ones of good news coming from each region that lay there. And those things outside, whom called them as such would never move away nor watch upon others as to make themselves awake, and lead away to what would appear to be the heartlessness that comes their way.

‘We’ve finished eating but what is there to do when march? When can there be such a thing as to tinge upon such laughter and each cry that may be earned?’

‘I will head outside alone then. I will cover my years.’

‘Don’t, or you shall cast yourself upon such a world of madness as to be mundane soon after as they carry you away, that you may not even die upon such solace as to be buried upon your home ground, where you ancestors live.’

And all of them but knocked soon after, below the floor and out of the world, as if to signal how much they were annoyed by their descendants whom were just doing nothing and plain to see, but messing around. From below the ground.

‘Will you leave already?’

When are you heading out?

I need my peace and quiet, I need to spend such time as to be alone with my wife, to which I may produce but naught.’

‘I’m sorry but I’m indisposed, the way outside is mightily blocked.’

‘Then leave, oh, leave, please but leave by other means, take the way back, through the mountain paths and through the secret panels that will lead you way behind.’

‘But they will wait me just as such, past the wails and wherever I may go, can’t you see that there’s no way back?’

‘What do you want of me?’

‘I’ve never even spoke of you, who are you?’

‘Mthindant, of no Rose.’

‘All right Mthindant, I shall make it clear then, if you don’t leave in the next half an hour, I shall personally erupt out of the floor, rip your lower body in half, kindly put it inside your mouth and split it open as if I were to cut the tall bushes of a large garden.

I will then just do the same with every single one of you and made an entrails-cradle out of all of you, then drag you down, placing you in front of my front yard where I may wait for you to rot only to laugh at all of you, the worst of dead, worse of people whom were brought down here, as to what reason?

You don’t seem to be working at all, you’re hardly here when it matters, you never listen and most importantly, you never seem to make a call, upon the old rites that may come from far, far, far long before you were born.

So why should I be forced to take this? Why can’t I have my peace and quiet by whatever means I can?’

‘We’re not taking it away from you?’

‘You’re not helping me either and neither are you doing yourself a favor.’

Then out of the floor he rose. A dead figure that was but covered in metal, his armor but a throng of many spikes, amulets, ring-chains, giant shoulders with faces on them with large horns coming out of their sockets which wore maws at their ends, and large fornicated gargoyle like heads pushing on their lower amulets, while the shoulders were so contorted that they looked like they were actually just a piece of some horse armor that was put on top of him, and on his side, and through his neck and inside of him. It just so happened that he also had a peculiar disc-inserting gap inside his chest, a few of them in actuality with a few saw blades he carried in him. And most of them were not only made out of metal but appeared to have peculiar blood-paint embed in them. He revealed a smile which had bucket-shaped teeth, which turned and just spat away some yellowish pus out of them. Little iron bars between their gaps actioning them. Then they turned back in their original position as he only continued where he was left at.

‘As I was saying, what’s the problem here?’

He but opened the door before anyone could stop him.

‘Wait, but wait a second now.’

It was far too late for either of them to do something about it as he had but churned through them and had already taken one hundred miles off their mountain side before realizing.

‘They’re not doing much of anything, are they?’

‘Not yet, I suppose, but who knows what they might do as soon as they, you know, come into.’

‘Come into what now? What do you mean? They’re practically frozen in place, they’re not reacting, they’re not doing much of anything?’

Are you seriously implying I was but wakened from my slumber for this?’

‘But you weren’t sleeping now were you? You just said.’

‘Shut your filthy mouth and listen.’

Damn them, someone just approached the rotten hole he came out of. There was nowhere in. He came to join the group finally. Everyone split in half as to form the breaking of a council circle, where the new comer faced the Ancient figure directly. Both of them stared at one another without saying anything over a couple of minutes.

‘I’ve dreamed of witched for a long period of time now, and let me tell you this, whatever you said you were with down there.’

‘I know lad, I know.’

‘What’s going on now?’

‘Nothing, nothing’s happening at all, I suppose one should be rather, surprised to find out that in actuality I was but alone down there, unmet by anyone, I but dreaming of wild incantations as well as wild incandescent wilds.

As I always am, I in my perfect paradise.’

‘Is that what we disturbed you from? Were you awakened from one of your long-lost ancient wet dreams?’

‘But there’s nothing of the kind I wager, and I shall burn and brim and be set within.’

And there was such a thing as disquiet between all of them, as to continue this conversation whenever else, although neither of them felt likely as to accept what went through their heads and through their arms.

Just soon after they looked above the air and saw it gone, and then appear, and then gone away, until near to their hearts, a most malicious figure with no arms floated in the air.

It drew blood and scum-liquid from every single creature out of there, from the plains and even farther from the wildest of surroundings, until he had but formed sacks in its back, upon which there came a most unnatural watching glancer’ with a few bone-sharp needle-points in its throat at last. Flying around, inside the sack, floating in the same way a tadpole would be brought to place, and to no face it melted away. Only for a second would it convey some pain. The frame of the being-mother was peculiar and little more than sharpened to a throng. A piece of it protruding out, a headless back, and many surroundings brought to its view. It shaped the eyes as it saw fit. And every man in sight but had them wrought around the place, still seeing, but from a different angle; peculiar meat thing in the sky, like a cabbage root below and above, from which this finger-trap shaped bloated shaker but formed its pouched in the air, and through the rue. They floated before they began rotating around it, forming a most peculiar sound, like that of a canary or a rabid hare who couldn’t help itself as it would shriek out. A most uncanny matter followed, as no soon after, through the pile and in the crowd of stumbling idiots there came. Rabid thing and bare-chest, upon an opening there came, but a trap of metal, like a cudgel with some spikes, rotating inside of him but nothing bloody and no sight, he had but the most distrustful look. And mere pants and but a rook. A crook for a face, made out of iron-shaped baboons. All of whom were wretched back, tilted forwardly as to be brought, back to life they opened their mouths and just as soon revealed their cracks.

Little iron-bolts emerging, slowly crawling across his face; burying themselves soon after as if there was but no loss to take; they appeared rotten, after such cases one would have to check for rust.

He opened his mask like a door, and revealed a flat. Little thing in there, little thing, a man was imprinted and sutured in. With some nails that went through each sail, around the knuckles they were, but went curvedly towards his head. Also hollow they spat some liquor, but he couldn't see but feel their sick cure. He wanted of some.

And wanted his eyes to be gone, then he but asked.

'Do me as I please to be made, wrung me like one of them, I wish my agony to continue.'

A rotten man wouldn't do as much, if he was in the same place, he would know not to mess with everyone else.

'What are you asking of me?'

'I want to be slit in halves, I was to be sawed off, I want to become like them and join in their estrangement of human kind.'

'How could you possibly know what they are like?'

And all of the sudden, the peculiar root-system on top opened so suddenly that one could see a giant axe-like handle, bloated with scum and the most peculiar open-wound like scars that came long each side. They were open and wide, created most benign features and would just as soon share between each other the most peculiar of looks, but tried for and worn away. They but hardened and made smoke come out of their inner-spongy veins; yet between each facet of the giant axe, along the curvature on the top, for the direction of the axe and the sharp cutting edge to be faced towards the sky, its malignant pucker-prune deformed face appeared. It pushed out its mass but a small compressed forest-like mass of many mosquito curled cylinders, through which it most clearly spoke.

'Do you claim to know what I did to them?'

'I do, I do, of course I do and I but want to be a part of them, I want to see clearly again, I'm sick of only basing my life on my lost senses, on having to be blinded and put to suffer at the mark of a hand.

I'm sick of living this way.'

'But who's done this to you?'

Asked Vehrdnt, of which flight was put to a break, it paused incessantly as to draw much closer rather than be away. In all clearness he could see that there was definitely something the vileness had put to use. This seemed to be a good man as opposed to the others who were, rather not to be touched and made to be obscured and pushed away. They were ever-so hard to touched, or to be looked at. Punching one another as to have made up for the losses of a week; there were guts on the floor as they swung randomly, but couldn't see their feet. They ate cones of little heads.

Filled with uncanny dead, there was still a lot of work to be done. Inside their guild there was a wardrobe filled with petty things and many objects that were brought and thrown away. Pants and shoes stolen by Gimp-like figures with spikes in their throats and hearts; sacks of fingernails taken from a woman's mane, and most importantly, it appeared to move away from them. The entire mountain slowly moved, without being able, without being capable of crying.

'I think you ought to be given a fair chance, just like everyone else, you hear and I think there's but a chance I may come to pull you from where you stand.

I, whom could drag you from the most uncanny vale you've entered.'

Vehrdnt but took another step. He touched the man on the forehead with a most human hand he ripped off one of the men with the help of his long extending roots below the churning meat.

'What is your name, grand champion, and great fighter who's suffered this long?'

'I'm Iridan.'

And with that alone they but shook hands and formed a friendship. Vehrdnt also kept that arms it buried its root inside of. He took the man and brought him to an uncanny world he was settled with never having to get away from, it was a place of peace. And of uncanny green-magenta, or some wild combination, flat lands which were driven in the distance and always seemed to crawl away as if they were in a vale that always moved. Large mountainous depressions which were flat like circles at the top, peculiar long-heads wrought of stone which were but not heads yet looked like that from the standpoint of men who drew or painted them as they were fascinated by what them. And clouds of stone in the air; and every stone but auburn or red, upon the green-magenta stare of the wild world they were in. Within all those stretches, as peculiar as it sounded, there were but no trees and no other kind of wildlife, other than the most uncanny strange black legs that came out of the land. Sometimes buried other times they drew out, then expanded, with their hairs being shaped like shelves, upon which little beings stood inside of, placed kindly like skin-sheets of slit beads and various eggs that were but eaten before and taken to the heaps. It was a pleasure being there, for long, way too long had he wanted it and the man was granted his wish at last.

'Here, you are now give sight.'

And for the first time he looked out of the hand which was put on his face, where his eyes had become, from where he could look and stare, and from where his heart would beckon nothing else.

But most importantly he was pleased by what he saw.

I don't understand what's going on but I'm going to keep watching because I am afraid of what might happen as soon as I shove my mask back on, knowing that I will be put back inside the dark cage where I will be abused by the spirits of the baboons who will enact such acts of morbid vengeance upon me such as the likes of which no man has ever felt before, other than a peculiarly deformed lady who had her face swiped of by her monkey, since she thought she could somehow keep one of them as a house pet, being a caretaker, that only added more to the irony that entered his mind just then as he only placed himself in her skin, but not entirely since now that he obtain a pair of workable eyes that by no means were his to begin with since they couldn't have worked after being covered by the hand which had been nailed to his face, yet at no point in time did he bring this in question since he feared what might happen if he were to speak. Since this was a gift from the peculiar godly being, he by no means found any reason to actually insult it, therefore, whatever, and for whatever reason he was there for, he but started following the giant green pulsating dark spheres that were many of many long-filler antlers, like mushroom spores or little puffs that wore inside peculiar marsupial sacks in which, these peculiar wombs appeared to bear inside, as they were but closer in appearance to fortune teller's balls, the deeper the eye went into them, bearing the most uncanny looking, barely caught inside, and barely legible fiend and winds of skin that formed peculiar imitations to anatomically structured half animals that were but become skeletal yet cylindrically squared in part as they had nothing else to draw their look-a-like shape imitations from. In which case, upon the hour, when this Savage approached, he but drew his mind towards the Finger-trapped bodies being, now, upon actually having a good sight of it, he came to the realization that, that was as a human arm he bore that by no means did belong to him, but again, being of no mind to question what happened, he simply pointed at the weird being as only to ask it whether or not it was safe to approach one of the weird floating bowls. To which, as one could be assured of it, he was but given the blessing, being well received, he started dashing to it, looked against its reflection only to be met by a giant hand-like jackal-horse coyote-parrot creature with little missing cylinder and cones as well as various patches and gaps that slowly attempted putting some of the winds back into shape, behind it, there being various little curled like eyes of storm which formed his deformed eyes, that, for the first time he was met by their real appearance, to which he realized that by no means could they be his. Since their most malignant shapes could not, by any possible mean, if there ever was a chance for them to have been but reformed and reshaped iterations of his own, the cast of which somehow had been stored inside his sockets, all that wishful thinking but flew out of the window. And now, since there were so many forms that entered its malignant short space, the creature inside the bowl couldn't help it any longer, completely being taken aback by a peculiar pop which shot against the winds, every possible limb-face and weird feature being but swollen in the back, immediately bringing this peculiar levitation to a stop, as it simply fell and broke itself, cracking on the ground where the liquid poured out and the carcass stopped glowing. They both avoided it, making the walk to one of the great depressed mountains which, within every passing minute of the hour would be more and more drawn down as if by the hour it will have been completely sunken, then swollen and decayed. Before they could even say a thing, they both realized that it's been ten minutes and the structure, this stone giant with a hammered in top then began ascending as well as it pumped up and down, making it seem like there was never a danger to begin with. From around the corner a most peculiar insane-schizophrenic master with bands wrapped around his body which bore large deformed inward pointing spikes, with no head but a strange open case that's been placed between his shoulders with many open skin-books with peeled out skin that being the man form, where his arms both stood straightened out horizontally, on which the case fully stretched at o reach both ends of the open thumbs, making it seem like it actually bore some secret compartments of the same size which were now fully exposed, immediately forming six fat faces which wore only tomes of them. A lot of tomes, many short-sized, many average, medium and even large ones, fat-stacked in the back, some being cut in as to put inside little limbs which moved and squirmed.

Ethan, upon becoming more stressed made it so the cudgel inside his chest only began spinning even faster, creating an unnatural amount of liquefied mass which stained not only his lower chest, the cudgel itself as well as his worn-out pants which already shown signs of abuse as to resemble mad tatters, bringing him a lot closer to the strange man than he initially considered he would. Some pages began turning, they were hard to track down. This was a god time to actually shove a finger in his chest and write down his name on his trousers, just so he could stop forgetting in. He wrote down Ethan then. Immediately after he heard something in his mind; and then he crossed that name and wrote Iridan.

Vehrdnt but congratulated him on his first mistake, having made him feel as if he had no face.

Regardless of it, the pages kept brushing themselves off as they continued just flushing through as many things as possible, then through words, having finally stumbled upon some peculiar red markings, circles as well as other fanciful incantations the peculiar being began whispering out of its back mouths which pushed back, as they acted like trains, and were somewhat just as long as they were, having then reached the front side, or the side-side of mountain, before he took a few bites.

‘You must follow me, I am in deep need of help.’

‘We shall then do what we can.’

And just as soon as they accepted, the weird being retracted all of the extending mouths and but drew both Iridan and Vehrdnt to a strange light which brought them to a strange space-like scene, somewhere in the universe where they seemed to be endlessly falling through the most uncanny place, as if the entire galaxy was but a paper sheet which was dragged from one end to another, which was mightily distracting. Since they could not focus on anything at all, immediately both of them actually joined in unison, having alerted him of what happened, they were but forced through another point of light where they entered a peculiar haired room, like the insides of a taxidermist’s open beast. Yet the hairs were but wrought in iron and they wore livid particles which but held onto one another like crab-pincers. They moved and so would they. Friction was caused, constant friction which deformed sight. In the room there stood two Schizos, two Iridans and two Vehrdnts which rubbed against one another violently so, they weren’t actually there at all, but only appeared to be there by the peculiar motioned friction that took place.

‘I can’t make it any clearer than this, I must apologize for this.’

‘In this case, say what you must say and we’ll just as soon be on our way.’

‘Rightfully so, as I was saying, I need you to enter the great-pumping mountain and recover something for me, out of the talons of the Chevidans, out of their lance-sharp daggers and out of the grasps of their many long arms that make the halls.

Their devices are armed, but they are simple. They are limbless and they are carried but in the most peculiar wheel-chaired devices. Seen that way, you must be away that they’re incapable of fighting back, they’re all too simple to form a threat.’

‘Then what do you require of us?’

‘What do you want from them?’

‘I want the mountain, I want it to be mine but in order to do it, I need you to completely slaughter the Chevidans, disable their arms, and the means that they might inflict so much severe a pain upon me that I may be driven out of their hidings and enact the mans’ will upon it.’

‘And what would that be?’

Vehrdnt asked who was just as confused as Iridan was, for this made as little sense as the realization that he was referring to some old ancient rite of peril, the Mans will, but the claim of the land, the right of taking by conquest, yet that didn't make any sense at all since he wasn't involved at all in the process. He, but a cowardly creature only searched for their employ to do as it pleased before he was thrown away and driven even farther than that. Both of them suspected, that this thing, by no means was capable of holding it by himself; that being too difficult, let alone. His gut was but sprayed with colors that rose and started praying.

‘What are they like?’

‘I do not know.’

‘Are there other tribes or other formations of these people? What is the hierarchical system they adhere to? What can you tell us of their history?’

‘Frankly, I don't know much about them, they seem so be, keeping it to themselves. But I see them head outside during the night. I've never seen such deformed faces as theirs.

Certainly that alone should bring them, at least, the means of some. You know, at the very least their appearance alone makes them worthy of some ethnical cleansing, wouldn't you agree?’

‘And what of us in that case; how would this be? Are you certain that you're not offended by the way I look? After all, I'm barely able to be looked upon, I who is but a deformed creature who's been shoved inside the many molders that were brought before you.

I've been through so much so that I've realized there's no place that I'd rather go where I may be accepted, since I know that sooner or later the realization eventually comes upon the people as they realized what I truly look like.’

And even though he shouldn't have done It to prove a point, it was just as much that there wasn't actually any way he could shy away from it any longer. He was exposed, two calves were missing, he walked on two prosthetic legs.

‘Is this what you wanted to see, little strange man? Is this it?’

Because I am just like them, I am, I must be crippled in the same way they are.’

Yet, before Vehrdnt could even come up with the brain-liquids that would force its cognition to happen, having reeled the axe-head back in, he stopped himself from giving him legs, and he's done that for a good reason. He simply listened, as he knew when to stay his hand.

‘I am crippled and I've always been so, ever since I was a young boy, when I was trampled by a march of giant skin-trumpet beasts with the heads of coat-hangers.

My sister made me these legs, and I cherish them more than anything in the world.’

‘You do know my problem isn't with their wheel chairs, right?’

But with their faces, right? And I want that mountain.’

‘Well.’

Iridan simply turned to Vehrdnt, who shrugged.

‘I’ll give you half of it.’

‘It’s a deal.’

Man is corruptible by his very nature. And there is no wretch and no den he wouldn’t cross just to achieve his evil means.

They set down out of the light, seeing the creature simply vanish in thin air. They but followed through. It was something they both chose to live with and to deal with it as such.

Life was peculiar in the mountain.

And they only started stabbing the walls with the most peculiar things, they were using little blocks of headlights that were put to great use.

‘First of the acolytes, you need to push yourself into the first surgeries.’

‘I don’t, how could I go through this again?’

The pension as filled with unnatural little scars, they hide in it, don’t they? I think there’s nothing going into it, is there? I will remember everything, I will put you through one of the little head of the state, twenty soldiers will be gone by the hour.

They will start slitting their little pinkies, half of the walls. There was not a single thing going in their minds, they were but a puddle and it was made out of blood and it floated.

‘Enough of the messy butcher’s butcher work.’

‘All right, we need to concentrate in-made.’

‘I want to be aborted.’

‘You already are.’

‘Is that why I am made this way?’

‘Yes, I think I am a dum-dum, there’s suckers on the puckers and they’re made of large barkers.’

‘What?’

‘A large creature, that looks that way, it visited me during the night in lord of hay.’

Little more than two pea-pods of cartilage put together like a blimp, separated in the middle where bony rods keep them together.

‘Cut in the front as to be flat, where two beak-shaped protrusions peak out into two meat-masses just like heads, but heads that bear a lot of tumors. They look like horizontally rotated finely suited men, with no mouths but little growths that spread around.’

‘Not real beaks I would presume.’

‘They can open, and they have teeth, like bars, the same bars that connect the two giant mirrored livers, or the liver that’s reflected, they’re not four of them, that would be dreadful in any case.’

‘What’s it been doing for the last few months?’

He lived in a lonesome house.

‘There’s a single thing, look outside.’

There’s a window in his room, he’s looking at it, there’s something wrong about it.’

‘I’ve lived in the Negative zone for too many hours.’

‘There are a lot of houses in this place.’

‘Why?’

Two weeks he’s been hounded relentlessly without being capable of making it through before he could eat the liver, he’s been eating and eating and was, but trying to make it seem like he was listening but he wasn’t listening any longer because it already entered his stomach with was bloated and opened and the head of that creature came out and it began spreading away and between the marks. They were there, within the hour. And they sweaty, and they were on the tricycle, both of them, only on one, outside, talking, smoking, after they took a break from doing it because it was much easier to wear their faces off and do what they had to do. It was hard, hearing the chain always beat, it made them feel uncomfortable, like a bone that grew the wrong way inside their sides. And they were but trying to understand what life had been when a little man was but a peg-inside a sailor long to be. His eyes would see but a friend.

‘He is my friend.’

And the man suddenly became the peg, wooden, and lunged at random people on the streets, worn out by what happened, since he could not understand what entered him. He was shallow, like a hyena.

Darkness that came after

It wasn’t even within the hour that they realized that it wasn’t going to happen, no one was going to chirp a word or say a thing about what happened, the massacre having resulted into a great loss, two men and two men only were present during it and they witnessed it all in the ground.

Both were in a plain-grains-skinned room, with little heaps of patterns thrown around here and there, made to look like detail as if flat pictures, flay cushions, flat shelves were but either stomped into the floor.

‘No one likes me because I keep staring at this bookshelf.’

‘There is no bookshelf there, there is no detail there, there is nothing there.’

‘I am the master.’

‘And I’m afraid of killing.’

‘Then we shall stand here.’

It was settled just as much, they were incapable of drowning around the place. It was a heaven made of gray; there were little things like fleas and little blocks of dark-rocks put together, barely on the side. More than a few tablets had been made, wrought on every single thing, made to look like little statues that were caught and stocked.

‘I cannot think properly around.’ He said, first man, there’s a little more, there’s nothing bloodier than this bloody, bloody blood room that had no blood no red in it. It had gray bags, garbage trucks filled with black nails put inside. There was a chair, all flat.

The two men’s eyes were glowing, like lighters.

One of the detectives came into the room.

A peculiar fellow he was. His head looked like a gelatin death-mask of a frame by frame shot out of his throat bullet animation that’s hardened then burst out the top like a rifle’s blown-off top, out of which, the many spread-out little coils look like bloated growths that bear many smaller talking heads with larger than normal eyes which have no irises whatsoever. Kant was his name, a strange fellow indeed.

His meat-bullet pole was only distracting from the fact that he walked on all four, while standing, his arms sprouting out of, from behind his knees.

It was indeed peculiar living in there since there was no reason to say a thing, or to move when not needed, their buildings inside the mountain shook. But most importantly to either one of them, there was definitely no reason to be out there, or to shake or remove or cut away, they’d but look and shaken, then mistaken but to never make the case.

‘Some man was killed inside this room and the only two people that saw it happen are the two of you.’

There were but many colors fashioned of dust. And there specks, of rust, outside in the distance one could make but flying liverish things. But they could not touch them because of the convention, yet they were had to miss.

Iridan hadn’t made it yet, but the mountain shook.

A man lay dead, inside the room.

He was but put through, and flattened and wasted.

‘It’s a mystery and I detest mysteries, that’s why I’ve become an Investigator, thinking I could somehow avoid mysteries.’

They were senselessly distraught, incapable of making out what was going on around them. For the time being they settled with running around the room and pacing when it happened, only to cut around the mile.

After they got it out of their system, their wheel chairs stopped going, stopped working. It was bizarre, how they were incapable of starting them again.

Dark wheel chairs, as well, grayish things, with metal wind-bags attached to their sides, filled with soil-sand, as to prevent themselves from falling.

‘Dark walls everywhere are they not?’

Vile thing, oh vile thing, the arms have brought it down.’

It was the miss-turn of the dark century, the thing that could not be forgiven, when it happened and ever after one could not be forgotten. And given that the arms extended with such bluntness of force, many of the buildings but wreathed in and out as they but straggled to keep going and chaining themselves upon the bringer of the most uncanny force there was this as much, something neither one of them was but close to brining in their sights, since they were incapable of standing, sitting was the taker.

Vile thing, obey, it thought.

The arms reeled in like a bunch of dark lances, hooks that were set in trances, all but thrown over its rims, curved around, and bitter chins were brought upon the hour. Some had settled to stop moving as they but stared and starved at shower of bloated pus that came out of it. With every arm wrapped around one of the cylinders, then, they stared reeling it back in.

‘When shall they take them down?’

‘When our ascension is to come, I fear that no sooner than that, we’ll find ourselves being stuck here this way, for the time being.’

For they knew of a way, as malignant as it sounded, through which they might get away from their steel traps and form uncanny looking legs upon which these walkers might protrude at last, never to be stopped along their way, or to be forced by whatever means to return to their old ways. It was tormenting, knowing it would come. Their limbs would be fashioned, the change was yet to come around.

Yet they couldn’t forget the darkness that still lay in their souls, for they were all born without limbs and were only to swoon for those who arrived after.

The citizens from beyond the mountain; red-skinned but puffy like the peculiar spheres from where they came, yonder in their quest of founding refuge.

Peaceful of some kind, regardless of their mindlessness, there could be no doubt about it.

‘A murder had occurred in this town, and we cannot, we may not easily strain out eyes and forget.’

They were set on it and not even death would stop the best of their men from handling the case. It was expected, just as expected. There was no reason to be there, they deflected from a side to another and they didn’t see each other eye to eye as if, it only served as a reminder, someone was carefully watching. An actually benefactor of fat girths that were put together as to form mad robes; most of which were cut around the peeling sight, like a knife that cut too deeply now; a moist little fruit was being passed around from hand to hand until a man shook it off.

‘Walls, you need to stop.’

They were, they were and they were but put through waste.

They were king of scum and would not become for a second more; there are little, not more than an inch inside each brain region-like thing that crawled around out of the quiet of their lords and their flies which they are, now.

A door opened out of a giant skull that pushed out the ground. Act different, they act different. One end splits but couldn’t be put through all the unnatural little bile-pouches that started crawling out of its greater heads, which began pushing out into the laughter. Echoes of bile, always opening and thrusting into the blocks of wooden-hardened gut-clot it spat. Inside these weird coffins there were many slaves that were finally allowed to leave.

‘First of men of law there seems, incapable of evil within, you mark theses chains and write your own name on these cuffs that I may know what’s going on after I’m pushing through.

I am a gut-master.’

Of many, many of them getting through the first tunnels that are but draped around, disallowed to continue after the first one that fell between them; a robed-thing that could barely be seen, much distraught to itself, it listened.

‘There’s a reason why many of them don’t have legs, dear master, it’s the pumps inside the giant head, they beat its brain-halls upon which they walk, ugly by their sides.

There came the rumination of the broken people whose heads were but open-split and from which came many long-thin walked that allowed them to finally gape and swoon, after which they’ve been through, little uncannily torn and twisted as they would be made to spare. Incapable of listening to any gut, they remained in place, for more than a few moments.

‘Let the graves recede back to where they came out of, I see no reason to wait, I see no point in listening to what they have to say for now.’

‘Should we not, count them? At the very least we should try cataloguing them, for the indoctrination cannot continue unless we slit them open, mark them down then put them back.

We cannot skip the counting and you know that.’

‘Why?’

‘Because they disappear.’

‘And why would that be a reason I should convey or be worried about?’

‘It’s because they’re being eaten.’

Outside, the gloomy red was but stone in thought, and many Grounded creatures came to live from the far deep-holes from where they lay, which were but the pavement out of which they rose, in hunt for many a dark flower, there was a hut made of stone. The Crookcall-point they called. As they gathered around it for what seemed to be a couple of hours, they hounded what they could from sight, it was important that they wouldn't make as much noise, yet they had.

Within their grasp there were many open doors that stood there, not real doors but some siphoned crooked, eaten through baboon-expanded things and shaped, they entered them. They, not elementals but peculiar skin-creatures that were but cut and slit, having chosen instead to put stone in their heaps so they could walk invisibly through walls and be hid as well as they could be gotten, onto the task.

Great figure of nasty fungi-twits, not the real thing but in shape, as if he wore then, around with long horns that pushed out of a great dark head. A giant thing that was covered in and moved upon a most uncanny much forlorn tip that came out of the ground, like a rot that kept all the organs as he moved, two eyes could be seen under the coat. Head-split by a giant pulled-through trough, which had been used to batter his head when he didn't show any kind of compliance; to which.

'I ask of you this, I need something from both of you now.

You need to head out and bring me one of the infernal noise making machines, those things that make such unnatural sound of destruction, the battery of which I may not deal with again.'

'What's there to make of it? '

'I don't know what you might do when you find within your power to spare or to destroy, as long as you put an end to the noise, I will not be concerned with the fate of it.

As such disruption of sleep might not be taken well, I need not obey or listen, but I need not weep. Please leave as soon as you can and make do with it, as well.'

As he could've gotten himself through, there was no reason to push on as they heaped themselves, gotten through.

It was a dark machine, tall and might, like a torture bed upon which a crucifix-posed man stood, being constantly adjusted by peculiarly hand-devices, extending like lamps with little mouths that were but scratching him with stylus-pins that entered him from time to time. From where once too cruel they heard the scream and lost, a mule.

'It's there.'

'Where is it?'

'In the sky, like a post that's floating and that's never to be caught between our fleeing arms, what do you think it happened for?'

'I do not and cannot know, why do you think that is?'

'I don't understand it either.'

But the mule was split in half, it wore inside an opening as if it were a house.

Enter first half of mule:

A queer place that no one might seem to be.'

Near it a plain room that was tilted as one to fall, as if it was caught in a perpetual fall; with a nicely tiled floor and a peculiar glass-case shelf with many doors and many books that were but to be entered home.

Through it, Mulself Goetual entered the mirror and spoke with plain men of glass. Whom were just as they could think about it, they were not to be asked. Why was it? Why now, why would it happen?'

'It's an infection, I could think of no other and no better reason to explain it at all. We've all been forced through it and I can't think of no better reason than to push on.'

They were growing it inside their guts, real masses, in the glass. It was there but it wasn't, one could not think of the unaware and of the most dreadful and most daringly said, of what entered them after a while, dissections to shatter, what came after them.

'You must know, if you must know there's something we haven't spoken about, and as if it matters so.

We've been approached by many men before who were just as inclined to talk to us about despair, but they cannot understand. They wouldn't.'

'What will happen to your libraries of glass?'

'All shall eventually be infested with that which spreads, all knowledge will be lost, eventually.'

'And the reason for it?'

'It cannot be explained, at least not here, not now. But we've lived through the lives of men, the lives of those who watched us, over us, through every reflection, whether it was by their choice, or done at unawares. It was inevitable that we would become them. Yet they cannot live inside the mirror, no life may do.

We are bound to shatter and to melt and to become nothing else but mere reflections that no one could tell apart.'

'It saddens me to hear about it.'

'Unfortunately, it's what must be done. It's simply, an inevitability that will make us all remind ourselves by the time we're done for that our lives were plain. Our lives were see-through and there was nothing to spare by any chance.

We've always been too empty as a people to survive. There was no connection between us, we were nothing, we are something now, yet that also is the culprit of our destruction. How have we survived for so long?'

'They are plain of fit and there's a heap of glass.'

'Shatter his guts.'

And there was the winded chimes which appeared to put a sudden break onto the stop. Cruel thing was made of many pegs brought into its gut.

Focus on the room, the malignant voice spoke.

‘As I was saying, I shall come to investigate this incest of thoughts.’

‘You were clearing your throat before I call you, what was the reason for it?’

One of the two observed.

The investigator just as soon came on his turned tip-toes.

He considered the following. Both of them were just as silent as they had been before, prior to any other contact that might deem them less approachable.

‘Ye of ho’ wonders. There is in this room a single man with little more to his wretch and wretches.’

It kicked right in, he didn’t know it yet. He wasn’t from around the place, it was something he couldn’t nor was he in the mood to remember what happened to him then and there. Since there was a good reason to make sure they weren’t full of it. Both were but staring as pictures, they were beneath them, pictures of their children, before a time they had children which made this all the worst to follow through since neither of them could hold up a candle to what happened around at noon. A clock was ticking on top the wall frame, still on the other side. Family photos with a few children’s children overlapped on top of one another, always wallowing as if they weren’t there to begin with, always trying to trace one another to a time, an imperfect time where they couldn’t have made it. A little insight into both of them, they stood on planks, long ones facing one another in a dark room. Between their legs down there, drilled-in holes, through which hanged, like corkscrews, their children and their children’s children attached to them as well, so on and so forth, leading to a peculiarly looking pendulum made out of unnatural looking flower pots of skin put together in the most uncanny mother of all, a creature with little spindly legs that were drawn together, eating from her fat before she could even draw beyond, where her mind was and what she did inside of it. Their minds were set on allowing them some refuge that might be spilled to know for certain. Of a curse, of such disease that was distress caused by gauging of their eyes, little flying insects followed through, since they could not be held at contempt.

‘Your children have devoured the original pictures of themselves. The rest are overlapped.’

They are brothers.

The depression in which they live in is peculiarly pumping in and out, that’s to be known and found out about, inside the hours, where the edifice of dark is to be held. There is skin around the growth, a malign one that one should know about and show no sign of the passing.

‘Regardless of this, you meager fiends, I do not believe a word you utter there.’

A flock of limbs followed through as well, neither of them wanted to move either. It was painful how they stood there, erected like large decayed demons.

‘We must be secretive, should we not?’

‘Is there a reason for such a thing to happen at all?’

It was worthless, a peculiar heart, stolid but rotten. Inside their mouths, they shared it, like brother to brother, but of them of them were so much crueler in their past lives. It didn’t even compare to anything they did now.

The sky was darkened and would only grow from place to place and leap about it when it wasn’t required to do so. It was hard to explain and even harder to get away from it, since there wasn’t any sign any longer. Only the harrowing of some moon, a distant swoon that was just as soon gone out of place. It couldn’t lay inside the structure, there was no possible exposure, but they created it, atom by atom and grit by grit.

First

Times changed a lot ever since. Of little remorse crying and to falter, there lay a single eye in sight, to war. It watched upon the ones, the fastest, and the ones that came after underneath the hold whence lay. Twenty other scouts of yonder, dropped around their heads, refrained.

Of pain they beheld the leashed and the belts, most of whom remained in place but not after. And a man came forth, followed by four. And they were brothers but barely spoke to one another for the time being as they were locked in a black cage that was being moved by corroded wheels of skin-tails, crisscrossed, to no roundness, whence it was brought to one’s attention that they were being pushed on to the miles.

‘You’ll drag the stones for hours until your backs emerge victoriously beaten and grinded into dust.’

‘I’ll hear none of it if I’ll have a say.’

The executioner spoke, as if his stead, as if his wonder and whence he lain mattered.

They weren’t, too exposed to what was going on around them, especially since all seemed so poignant after a while. Too poignant, in a waste, there was no one more deranged than the person behind the stone corridors on the right of the road. Although solemnly placed, ridiculed to their filthy embraces, he coated him with his shoulder. And in that thing that lay open, from which the dart of a black poison lay still exploited and open.

He drew on closer to the cage, seeing how it could do anything but rummage around itself.

‘We bear no name any longer, because of the destroyers. They ruined it all for us, have they not?’

Fear only crept and shaped and leapt all around, they bore no fealty and rested on the grounds.

‘See past my thine, in the distance knowing, there’s nothing there.’

The man dragging their cage stopped. His muscles had barely overlapped the uncanny metal strings that had wrapped themselves around his nigh-deformed singed meat-lumps. 'Wouldn't put it past him for no one's sake. I think he's done that on purpose. '

'Who was the man? '

'Someone I've seen before.'

Everyone in the cage-chart was mangled, severely mangled, even more so by the minute and by the space. A strange sharp mechanism kept flaying their faces on a constant motion, hopelessly draining them of blood. It was pitiful that they received their pints back through the melting of the iron. Alloy mixed then quickly went out of its way to push itself into their veins. That's how it mostly worked.

'I think we should stop here, hey, cage-driver, stop for a moment. Take a break, will you?'

P'turn stopped; he laid the cage to the side and started counting what he's gotten away with.

'What is that, there? In the distance?'

I don't know, what is it?'

There was a body, smallish, dark, at least a foot-long over himself, walking in whichever direction. He was sickish in some way and rode on top of two-bodied horses that were eating from one another's chests as their necks curved inwardly and pushed out of their way.

It was dangerous trying to make a point, he was swollen and only took his head out of the throng.

There were skin-graves in the distance, whereas dead-men were standing swollen. And yet they died and ever after growing, snarling at each other, knowing. Fat-and bloated, ate the child, the dark figures was filled with bile. Not to be dumb-founded there, the cage-carrier only wrapped his arms amongst its belts and came to such a speed as he ought to conflagrate his veins and body wreathing. They gathered all around the wool, and the land, planted on a swoon, it were.

Little of the land was inhabitable in some way, to be certain about it, for what was worth, it only seemed like, as strange as it was, the entire quadrant was encased in an open cage, barred with rust, and giant spikes pointing both inwardly and outwardly as various shades of clouds were being distilled and cut. Most of the irrigation came from invisible drops that were indistinguishable from water yet seemed to be, grinded for hours.

Giants had been grinded upon those cages, until their battement showed, leaked and probed the land as it came back. Every single mind a live, only for moments if it was willed to be, though the bodies that scourged the grounds were filthy and still managed to arouse, even the slightest petty thinkers whom were around.

And to the plight of giants, all fell silent, as they had long been forgotten, tilted as they were but caught as if by razor-edges still-standing fence-grinded bones caught inside the metal, they drafted one another in their deathless wars. For there, above the reach of man they fought. A gist, the likes of which, in doubt, they settled to confess, through beating hearts that pumped to no end, they appeared, as they neared the point of no return. As ghastly malformed thing of pure devilry-looking blue and rest, specters that were fighting above the cage never to be seen again, spoken of less, and even deathless, their blows were hardly felt. With each and might and lack of fright, for many had refused to step in their lines of woe. They brought each other yonder, deathlessly gazing at the rows beneath the earth, much stopped.

‘Where are the men being taken and what had they done with our pitiful plain?’

‘Of that which remains, most has been plowed and grinded, into seeds of dust that formed their rocky-ground. They established a colony of men, a city of doubt.’

For as much as they could see, for as far as one would even go to be, nearing that point, their insatiable desire to destroy all faded.

Men were brought in cages carried over like sacks, from all corners of the world, brought to houses like cages, stopped to admire the spikes. As the spikes were curbed and sometimes longer, some straight and others yonder into the ground, fathomless as if to know, bothersome and never known, lending to some faceless thing, from the distance, to be seen. Grins of metal grates, spikes were their crowns and pupils, the teeth and doors, whence led. By each hand a man would be gotten through, only to have himself covered in a dark armor like that of a flaccid cage, filled with sinew.

‘I see that another man enters.’

‘Let him enter and pray to the spikes. And let him sacrifice whatever he can after that.’

They knew better than to judge, of perilous way, as that, it was their better throng, of no better than what appeared, doubt. Had been shared, it was worrisome, yet none could remain in a place for long, the stronger the needle, the harsher the sentence. All were guilty of disgust.

‘What hast happened to my child?’

‘He’s become part of the spike.’

Unlike the ones that died away, this one became part of the metal, encircling the base as it began melting, coating the distorted table upon which the idol stood; though no idol could suffice the looker as this only seemed to be something made out of many a piece behind and blow the charade. Blasphemy along the way, dreadfully convey by the likes of it, taken away, as it were. Heaviness pushed this tool deeper inside the mechanism of which frame. Beneath it there lay a system of deep-submerged plunging tools, not pipes but alike, some perilous metallic straw-like pox-hardened, mainly surrounded way to feed, and enter the fence which surrounded the cage, for the grates, despite being as malignantly wide-spread, many of them were empty inside, instead, bearing all which was sacrificed bored through them, hardening but beating, leaving a quality such as the likes of whom may never see.

But strangers couldn’t know the passing, of each hole against each corner, towards the sewage-like system and the drains, for the excess of meat that protruded was being led to a square-basin beneath the earth. And there, filled with disease, upon distress, there was twice-the room, or twice the size, above of it, barely separated by a floor of crisscrossed X’s such as the one upon which a platform would be.

Floating on top of it, no lower body but a creature whose head would be, a largely avian-humanoid-back-head device, from the long suckers, attached and protruding out of squared-like vacuums, long as hoses, drawing down, the front of which bore the lower body of a man whose bearings would be that of arms and legs, hanging down like a skin-tag, while the rest of its face, deformed as it was, bearing for its like large tire-like formations, kept floating by dark crown ropes of blue, surrounded by a cloud-covered, tawny-blind crowd of servants whose starvation was eternal.

And they had worshipped him for he was fed. For they desired it but none dared come and step ahead of him to ask, of which desire had been counted, back. To whence they might endure, some way would come, it would ensure that every single one of them would rise against the creature, eating. What was owed to them, in ten piece fold, for the fattening lamps could only bring out the smell of him before the front.

This was war fought for him, there in the distance. Whence the cages were flying, floating in the sky, tiled to face various directions, yet incomplete as they missed that peculiar system beneath the ground. And they were half-empty and half-picked upon, bowed to, for the mere fact that.

There was nothing to laugh at.

‘Stop it, you cur, don’t you understand that there’s nothing there to laugh at anymore than there is for me to see?’

‘What are you even seeing?’

‘Something that’s beyond laudable and beyond pitiable, the very fact that their forms are being melted, and repurposed into armor, I see no reason to look out of it, past the torn-out armor.’

From which a malignant beast covered itself as well.

They spoke of it less.

‘There in the distance, there, in the distance, only there was a flight of birds, a flock of near surroundings, painting the very edges of dark surroundings. Of pitiful days, many of which passed out of their day, they knew as naught, and little in doubt, many a shout, they lacked compassion.

Others would not, and for the lack of breeding, wait for more, as they would know of lesser days.’

There was small patch of land where there stood a house beneath the cage. And in it, though it was highly locked down and under constant watch by the many of the strange people that lived in the surrounding huts, there was the need to look over, in order to ensure that something horrendous might not happen inside of it. Since, for the sake of looking nowhere else, the two that lived inside of them had a tendency of kidnapping youthful-looking young in order to lock themselves together and pour gasoline in their ears and nostrils before igniting them off. This would set a lot of the peoples off, although it should come as no surprise that the burnt skin that was peeled off had been completely skinned off, was placed as to replace their older furniture coverings, the carpets, lamps and other-like of unnatural-looking things, such as the weird sculptures, of which frames used the part of the bodies that were still kept despite the flaying. Such torments as being stooped inside the various corners was something to be called as nigh-familiar as their tendencies started showing up young.

And they called themselves Horn and Lurid. Horn disliked her gasoline for some reason since the substance had not only become corrosive but appeared to have taken something from her. Hard to pinpoint, or as hard as it would appear, that thing almost always managed to crawl on top of her body during various Epimugg nights, whereas her tendons would find themselves suffering of third degree burns almost on a constant notice. Dreadful things, always surrounding them and their house.

They were placating their tiles with corpses, making sure no one was able to leave. It could be incontestable, trying to get a word in since most of the savages who lived outside were, as they called them, primitive and dull-minded, short-sight and of the like.

‘I think we need to leave.’

Before Lurid could get us, he noticed Horn brandishing one of their fame long-horned colts, of which brim-fire appeared to make it look like some mugged furnace than anything else. A miniature of a toy but pleasant to look at as it had been, it was night barely functional for some obvious reason. Not as much so as it was in need of constant organic material in order to work, which was, if anything hard to replicate by any means, making it almost useless in some way.

And there was also the beheaded man in the room, left as part of the wall, living yet pushing out, as he was made out of eight parts that were pushed together, outwardly as if by a curved pipe, flaccidly pushing out in order to breathe out of it.

‘For your sake, woman, I hope it won’t come to drawing fire.’

‘If it will, I know whom to aim at.’

‘I hope you will, I hope so.’

And he looked behind. That strange formation of a headless man still deranged him every single time he looked at him for obvious reasons. He was there, almost always there, with his head being somewhere inside.

Lurid once woke up and appeared to have, to say the least, looked inside his own gut to see the head and talk to it.

‘Listen to me, now, don’t trust her, don’t trust Hurn.

Devilish-headed woman, of fire-burnt locks, they cannot be trusted for they were born out of a carried through rock of skin. I can hear within it the screams of my ancestors talking.

When the rocks had skin-legs and walked like arachnids onto the beds of the heedless flying skin-birds. I can still see the sphere of calling as an eye rests inside of it. But the eye is kept in chains of iron, by large machines that speak backwardly.’

And he went on to document the other side of the land in whichever possible way he could come up with. As dreadful as it were, he cast a shadow of iron-truck spine-wires upon the house as they left. Making sure that every object inside the house was almost encased in the same way as it would be by a barbed-wire garden of some sorts. Thence, it was ever so clear that despite having left, the creature was still there and would leave for naught and be brought for just as well after that. Whichever the cast might be, pierced or not by disease or distress, they went away.

A few steps, despite being taken outside, managed to put them in front of the Demouse.

For he was black as anchor-iron and looked like a giant half-open clam with eighteen legs on one side and none on the other, yet it was tilted and kept by strength to look as if it bore invisible legs on the other side. On top of it, stood a man without limbs that bore spikes on his chest, forming a crest that pushed on top his mouth and face as well.

Two hornets of skin drawing out of his back, hollow on the inside, bearing a hole in their abdomens where air and sound came out of.

‘You’re let.’

‘As are you Demouse.

We’ve checked the place before, you were nowhere to be seen until this point.’

‘And I’ve got a good reason for that as well, such as the likes of which you would not understand.’

There in the distance, there also lay some strange pair of houses, placed like forests. A city on one side, another on the other, and eight more surrounding the entire place, separated by strange rivers of different colors which were filled with different creatures that may not be classified, from the likes of which, some had even given birth or had become the progenitors of some various humanoid species that inhabited one of the nearest lands. It was cruel, trying to make a point out of it. Knees were sharp and for once, Lurid thought of sparing himself the wonder.

For some dark creature had made a nasty sound that ought to have been checked.

‘Who’s waiting outside?’

‘I don’t know, it’s never right out there. It’s.’

They stopped, they could not wreathe themselves out of it.

No one could make up the sound, cats screeching in the distance, or the songs of crows, of deeper depths.

‘Where’s the noise coming from?’

Horn walked around, she returned soon after.

Lurid had seen her so, in a moment, would he know. There was no reason to approach her yet, seeing how, by the sight of it, she had been out of the dark snow and into the quiet. Trying to justify opening up her fingers, right around each edge and press, looking into it though distressed.

‘What did you do?’

‘I had to check inside of it, I had to know if something was hiding in there.’

‘And?’

On her way back she had avoided the creature, making it so, not a finger would touch or lay wherever she may go. It was all too thorough, how she had planned it all, the bone-culprit who had done it, resting in the ground. But somewhere, something like twenty meters behind her, he’d cut her, drawing in and drawing out, pushing even the slightest piece of a pecked gut as well as a single lump she didn’t know there lay inside of her. It stuck out, it looked benign.

‘We need to find someone in the next small town to have a look at it.’

‘I don’t know about that, I just want to sit in and forget about everything.’

‘Horn, I’m serious, it could spread, look at it again.’

Larger, much larger, spread, like fillings, attached to her veins somehow, feeding on her blood and most importantly hardening just as they were speaking despite giving the impression of a single touch having almost burst it.

‘Leave it alone, we’ll find one of the doctors soon enough and once we’re done, you should.’

He stopped, forest-guard, large man, dressed in a uniform, despite the place being barren, wide-shoulder and wide-pane in which back on which the back of his head was stretched and pinned up with bolts. Neither of them had ever expected to be met by the dissection of a man or even more so to feel it past themselves, but it was there, sutured as well, made to be kept by two other-limbs that pushed from the back of his head and another pair from the lower side of his back. Corpus-Major asked what the reason, past the River Pus, even more hardened lumps being swollen below. The eye of an innocent child, swimming below, pushing through as he was torn down, limb by limb as in the throng of quiet, he would know.

Under exceptional and exceptional circumstances alone, perhaps this would’ve meant something, but now? They were left to be.

‘She needs someone to look onto it.’

‘Is there a chance for contagion?’

‘Not that I know off.’

‘I don’t know if I should take the risk.’

Just then Horn considered drawing in. Looking at Lurid, none made a move. They would get too anxious to be able to pull it off, not to mention that he was armed.

‘But I suppose we’ll take the chance.’

For what was worth, everyone thought the same.

‘We’ll take it then.’

Two steps in, stopped by him. His arms was giant, wrought and fingerless, like the up-front of a mini-gun, if it were filled with skin and covered in plain burnt-iron.

‘Careful whom you walk to in there, word travels fast.

Fast enough to reach my years, your lives are done.’

‘I’ll make sure to remember that.’

He said with a blameful look, as if he was putting her up to it, nor should he, now that he understood. There was an ill define thing, always around them. Always coming from the cage, the cage had admirers, the game was defamed. The cage had worshippers, and worst of all, of whom would talk, their legless nature would draw about as to leap and bob, and hit the walls. Bashing themselves as they could barely breathe at all, now that their lungs were blimps, they were left quietly to breathe until they couldn’t handle. Sudden convulsions pushing through their handles, stopping, suffocating but a mine, delightful sight of spikes and smiles.

‘I think that one likes you.’

Cavern-dweller of the town, on a limp, a single limb, covered in olive-oil and ground. A distinct feature that would put him in what appeared to be a common discord between all of them was the fact that they looked like deformed horse-stretched bodies, twisted images of skin-plumes, barely humanoid and stricken with their melting features, as moss would be made out skin. Largely entangled features spoke, and many teeth arose from the grit below, he bore a chain out of his belly pouch, wrought out of the intestines of someone who long-died.

‘Before you say a thing, accept it. This should ward your woman against that.’

Whichever way he looked, he saw that out of the plain houses, although tilted like they had been pulled towards the eye of a storm that led to east as a whole, there lay little for them to be. Or look inside, and deal with what they should.

‘We’re looking for a doctor.’

‘You’re heading in the wrong direction then.’

A wry smile almost managed to deform. Whatever lay to him, long-gone, that fancy way of melting skin through drool, it was the same mixture that mixed itself with the base of every house and swoon.

‘I think you’re searching for a way out.

You should head down there and leap into the pool if you want to avoid pain.’

‘I can take it.’

Horn was startled, rightly so, as soon as he turned at her.

‘Very well, then you may follow, unless you want to slit and spare.

Drown down there.’

‘She can take a few bolts of pain.’

But pain arose just as soon as he led them into his brother’s house, whom in reality was the doctor of the town. Tall creature and much more son, just as one limbed as he were. Horn strapped to a table, large room, red enable him to see the splatters, lighted robes burning as to preserve the right, they were their utensils after all.

‘Have you worked on someone before this way?’

‘We certainly have.’

It was worthwhile to notice that her treatment was nothing to be completely avoided since she appears to have lived there, in those chambers for far too long, weeks, months at the very best while she was work on, in order to extract it. By the time the shouts stopped being audible in that house, she the room she was in had become cut, un-working, almost visibly defiled. Split while open, as he was spread into a room like a root-system still attached. Her face and skin kept on top of large plain-sticks, her peculiar skull being extended and looked into, in a room where not even a feather would reach the ground. And she was also incapable of seeing or knowing whether or not she had been alive, in this state of confusion she was it.

While the doctor was working through her ever root and even stretch during the extraction. Day by day, the man stood there nonetheless, nearing the door with a heart beating and a lack of satisfaction going through his heartless stance, for there was something dead in his eyes as he thought about his dying wife, relentlessly expecting her nearing, and mirth.

It was saddening, seeing her in that state, while none the matter none would sing of her death, nor concern themselves with her return. As the agony and pity progresses, of all the reasons she would stand, another surge of boils passing through, another painful thing trying to make through. But she could not breathe on her own, not until the cage willed it. As the cage willed all.

Far beneath them, to look down, but that would not make the least of slimmer, a difference at all.

There lay the reason they were there waiting outside, breathlessly walking around the house of the doctor during storming nights. Out of fright and on the lookout, never touched or wondering who might see, there lay but a single thing which stung most, if not all, standing. In a sign of agony. There were paths, there were roads, there were hopeless, worthless ones, all of whom gathered. None could sign, nor could say, not to go along they way, yet they always caught on yonder.

‘We shall serve him until he lets us feed. Afterwards, we shall put him down and devour what we can out of him.’

Beneath the ground:

‘As it its settled, we need to proceed with it faster then, otherwise, we shall be dead by the time they find us.’

Another consideration.

There were many other cages which weren't spoken off, as they seemed, rather, too incongruous to be touched and lumped about, or settled through, especially since there was no reason any longer to hide. Not in the open when they were out there, trying their hands in, the pseudo-workers pulling down the robes and dragging everything down. Tiresome in some way, but it was what it looked like, the only reason why some corpses chose to be there, in kindness and in woe. But there, as one should know better.

‘And there, I shall pour the last part of the cast and with it, I leave a man with a piece of the cage.

I shall make my own out of it and wreathe a kin whereas I want to. And I shall wonder ‘ere and in there distance, where would my kind be.

Whereas they might go and what would they do to please me, their true and one master, the maker-progenitor and that one who seethes.’

For he was fumigating as well as he could see a land barren-dark and plain about with rivers of no puffier substance but wool and protruding, pushing afar and everywhere it could reach and spread, as far as he had known. It was simple, more than he should care about it. He had ruined his chance to live, as he sprung from one point to another. He looked upon a shower of death, where all the corpses lay ruined and abandoned as if torn by a barely fought war he walked upon. No grave as mighty and none to shatter, none of his close skin-cocoons in tawny hides waning as they started growing about and spreading where one might see. He was basked upon and hardened, bee it as it may, there was no reason to convey the reaction his soul was merging.

To converge on the other side and walk upon the land vaguely torn, on where to go and whom to trust, for a man like him was not filled with disgust or any kind of distrust aimed towards another man, for he had beckoned to make a something of himself.

There past the gates of the prison, where he might look and see the rightful place and the open-vales, he settled on forging a kingdom.

‘Rightly neared so, past their towns and their deceitful mundane, those that look at me and stare.’

He pointed wildly behind, with little to himself to mind who was going to approach, of whose harrowing presence might he be afraid off. For none came forth, but some looked so, never trying to push themselves and better so, they were, if anything afraid, to make or wreathe in quiet aspiration, damned if they would be aware, of the dangers that lay there if opened hearts were pushed through. If they shared with him an aspiration to leave every nook and every crone behind, it would be the death of them, and would never push through quiet desperation, not to mind or pay any attention, or to wreathe in pain as if to catch. A disease or be brought to their knees and part, of their heartlessness came from their quieted fear, and never minded would they be of what seemed to appeared.

Two forth yonder, no hole remained, but there were dreadful things pushed against them, long and quieted along the way. Many of his followers, of Flinthel, stood behind, as they wagered of their kindles wager, would pay even more to stay behind.

His land was anything but his now, since there was a certain assuredness to him and to what was going on there. Nothing matched any longer, everything being off-the shot, off the place and differently placed than anything that's ever been seen there. It was dreadful, dangerously uncanny, watched and ill-felt. There was but one shot, a clear view where they stopped, for the men had begged of him to slow down and watch and lay. There, whence he had remained, there was as but a break, where lay, the ground in lesser mounds. And they were vile holes from which they came out of, as they must've been there for hours.

'Who, and whom are you to come intrude, to lay where we have lain, where we died and would remain?'

'I am Flinthel and I'd rather be known, under the name of master called upon this place where no light had come to shone.'

'Leave this place and don't look back, for your bear the sign of the cage.'

'To that I yell to thee, fear not, for it shalln't harm you. '

'But it will do so and our hands lay o', ever nearing the point to drop and feel as they might be felt to shatter and never touch another beneath the earth. Know that we have done much to come and stumble upon it all, only to be removed.'

'You're corpses, nothing more.'

Another man intervened, followed by another, of whose distant quiet was just as it would appear. All too startling during its break, the man appeared out of nowhere and threw a small spear-like bolt out of the strange arm-cleaver he bore. Taking four of them down, only to be met by what appeared to be, nothing, no direction, no emotion seemed to be disturbing, though ever-lustful yet he saw a point in time. Where he may claim this land as his own and taken whichever maiden kind, who'd follow him but to escape, for no one lived to loved the cage.

'The cage is speaking, all need to turn.'

And all of the sudden it felt as if the entire world shook and danced upon command, torn by every and little mind to it as tainted. Least of all were they mention, despite the cage wreathing in. They shoved themselves and ever after, they followed back, even by the dead who followed yonder. As no one had a bitter choice, worsened by the looks and changed.

Weakness was but the disease of the mind, it wasn't there for any other reason but to pull them out of what they were trying to do. It was fatiguing, out of place, deceitful, looking back at it and how they would be pushed around and made to face.

Flinthel of no Lintel knowing, walked around and pulled a coal-coated colt of skin that shot through his upper-side of his arm, completely shattering and sawing off his upper-half only to have it revealed that he felt no pain nor would he face any kind of upheaval regarding what faced him. For every step along the way would make it so he conveyed little to no emotion knowing that in the back his spine formed a skin-blimp that made his back look like a hunch. Inside of which there lay disease and with each step he appeared to be eight-fingered and eight more, fingers nesting inside his toes until his lower legs started dragging like giant fat-lumps, wrapped round by the strange toes that came out and started forming tiny flicks of stairs. His mouth opened and instead of every tooth, there lay the head of an animal-like creature that had been hybridized with round machines, all connected to a system that shot through his upper head region in which he stored all the pain and suppressed all the lost veins that had almost been lost upon having his upper side of his left arm shattered.

Now, the cold was still in his hand, although his thumb and his pointer were missing, he would not leave them that way. First the bleeding stopped and in that coagulation, there was but one thing which appeared to blunder everything to a point. A parasitical shell grew and the Raised-dirts, whom were apparently not dead to begin with, though they had developed strange lung-fortifications that allowed for under-buried breathing, they seemed to have a secret so. They weren't extracting air from dirt, but from the tiny ants, beetles and other filthy insects they managed to draw inside, breaking them apart which a small door-like formation as the back of their heads which rolled them around a bile-dirt ball suddenly turned from being pointed inwardly to throwing them out.

And they were long-legged as well, but these legs were curved and stored in the muscle-mass at the back of their trunks. At times they were static and appeared to levitate only a millimeter above the air, then some had their heads and left arms disappear. But now they neared and entered the cage.

What appeared in front of them was a deformed half giant who manifested itself and would never be brought to the justice they demanded of him.

He is out of place.

Wrong thought, not spoken out loud.

'He is out of place.'

'Him, the giant?'

'Not the giant, you wild-termite, him!'

And thence yonder he pointed towards the strange, up-throng tall-set, with his arms elongated and head pushed through. In a fancy suit of armor tainted and pushed a head, a helmet through. With the rams of a horn and the back which pushed through in the back, right through the giant's body, a hole wreathed in and cut right as he appeared out of nowhere, a cone in the back, where poured the sea of scum into his brain. Deranged as he were, this was a result of him eating along the way, something he should not have, a head or a piece of anchor.

He revealed strange patterns of hand-imprints which had been poked like hot-irons, signs of legs, and crayon-drawn tiny specks of dark-magenta stars, and eyes and wild smiles and frowns and others would be inclined to look as his hands as he bore strange tin-caps that were flat instead of fingers, all of which had been cut. A giant pair of eight-worm formations sticking out of him at various spots of his chest and back-legs, which crisscrossed themselves with iron wires and riot-pyres burnt inside. Many small heads and lesser crept and hid inside of him eating. There was a blurt of disease and distress which eaten, leaped upon and barely undefeated.

Though the giant was but half a trunk and for what was worth, this prospect was merely ignored as it wreathed out of the way. It was to be for that reason that many would not even consider what was going down a few miles below, for more than a few obvious reasons, something was missing, something brokenly pushed out of way. Bred of skin and fallen through, with each missing piece of the passages and burrows, something as simple as they were stood out the most during the wakeful dark, where some Insatiable men were forced to take a walk in pairs. Most would not return with anything but piece of their own likings. Some shared, others did not satiate the hunger which always begged for more, for those whom ate had suffered, while, alike the poison which belonged to them.

While and along, they would seethe and go around, trying to get through. As one would pass just enough, the makings of the quiet would make it so shouts would go unnoticed. As a mere act of desperation that mirrored blue green-walls, which were as hardened as they were hardly visible had bore. Upon them there lay but a single speck, a missing light, figures of their own. Some who looked at them with torches stared. Other stayed there as they preferred it as an alternative to starving. But mostly so, a brother's own would not go unheeded.

‘Orung, we need to leave the sigh.’

‘But I must look at my own reflection, it must be so, I have to see, I have to seethe and ruminate upon the uncanny.’

That was what he spoke today. Yet with each passing moment it felt likely that he would not open his mouth again for various reasons, not to be spoken roughly as to be the same. His teeth were there, having pulled his gums and the upper side of his palate as they entered, slowly, the wall. Yet they stopped at his incisors and appeared only to force him to crush and crush he did as the uncanny reflection did not allow such a thing as entry to himself.

‘You’re doing this to yourself.’

‘We’re leaving, take heed.’

The others in the pair left. They went out of their way to make it seem like Orung was a lost cause. Skindly stood by his side for a long period of time, at least for long enough to figure out that he needed, at the very least to make a cut, as much as it was needed, as much as it could’ve been avoided, there was no possible other way to take it out of him. He was gone. Already crushing his fingers, toes, dislocating what he could take out of his own. And wonder.

‘Why are you doing this?’

I can hear nothing in there, I hear no call.’

The torch inside his hand was dropped. He didn’t know the reason now, but stuck with it and managed, ever so plainly to struck a chord.

It wasn’t anything to be ashamed of, looking how the wall produced a hand in the distance, bearing a long-knife.

‘Get away from the wall, now!’

It came too fast, as if it were on a rail frailty launched from one side to another, nastily inclined, his head fell down before it could even reach the floor. Bouncing around for a few seconds before the rest of the body had a chance to jerk itself off the flat surface it was leaning against.

‘Damn it, damn it, damn it, this was too close, way too close.’

Skindly barely shook at it, thinking.

He only looked down now, realizing they have been walking on clean schizophrenic drawn floors at all times. Words and squiggly lines were written, drawn and dragged as if they had been left by someone suffering of hypergraphia, awfully inclined and pushed on the side, he was a little bent on it and watched by blood get drawn into the various depressions put in. He had bled and was of but a head, gagging on blood, there on the spot.

‘I shall take you back, you need not worry.’

He smiled realizing that, after they came through, there was no reason to look, a new. They weren’t in a hole beneath the ground after all, instead, it looked as if there was a sky skin to some hollow hole, a world that had been created by the cage. It would rummage one through pity and caves, only to remain there, for longer stays.

Strangely, as those reflection were little in doubt to talk and even make the slightest sound, yet there had been signs and point-blank stares, the starving ones would endure being there for a few more minutes. It just so happened that every so now and then, a few of the reflections would start pushing through, unaware of what they had been causing, cast upon themselves, nauseatingly to eat. Although they never left their side, one might be inclined to think that this was but a mirror, a slight transparent thing which could barely been seen through. Touched and frozen, set-alike in part, incontrollable as it would be set, to light, yet no sign could be seen.

Nothing within it could signal what was going through. If anything, there was something pushing on and growing, as if waited upon until a great moment had arrived. Thence, a few steps before, with every push releasing itself, ashore, and made out of parts. At first it looked like a piece of meat emanating from a feet-wrought circle, shaped in such a manner as if to channel whatever other thing lay inside, before it had come alive. Or what would be called so in any case. Whatever the embrace had caused and of whichever sight, it lay, aghast, there was no explanation. Dreadful as it were, this was not one of the worst creations that would come to be.

For long legs and arms contorted pushed out like the crumbling meat wagon of both a catapult and a ram, of which head was human in part, with a mouth extension that carried the reflective wall. It followed him, the man in flight. He could barely set himself away, in doubt and mourning. For whichever cause and broader lurking beneath the soil, where various holes had been dug through and would never even be pushed as to sue some of the sleepers.

The further it followed, the more of them appeared there. It was something of a mess, seeing all of them abandoned in such a way. And no comforting thought would happen, for the likes to ever got it. And in the likes there was refuge, and in their bodies, lumps, and hues such as the likes. Not to be seen in sight. He turned, and after seeing, long companion abandoned, he had pulled on his life. Aimed but the tip of the revolver and shot; in desperation for what was worth, he came to miss as it set forth and drove its ram-points into him. Though smaller heads and joints of glory, ivory would be benign, If anyone would engorge themselves into eating, that would be this beast in its eternal cry.

There were lays upon which horse-flight made the stairs, of which outer-shells or leather fell but never to as they remained. Leading to a small house that was kept that way, wrapped as if it were a stable, deflected as the heads were out, moaning as they were in laughter, waiting for some filth-delight. Some were fed, others starved, while they were manifold on growing their skin-sacks. It was a mistake being, setting into flight just then, but here, there, alas, aware, the house could not get away. For it was anchored by the stable and it would not let go, regardless of the pain, entrancing, there was nowhere else for it to go. Dumbfounded as they were, there was no reason to set forth.

What lay inside of it was nothing to be looked upon, dreary as plaster, men made to cast their fears upon one another ever so much faster than they could abide. Filth was spread and just as such, inside there came but a pus-box. It was all that the room held. And this thing was just shaped, in a way that would make the lock look like the cage itself, ever pushing out surroundings. Some were only growing on the walls.

They were releasing their contents slowly, only to invite the Ivory suited knights inside. As insidious as one should be aware of them, their presence hardly bent up front. They only came to eat from the boxes, as one could see it just as wrong. Open helmets revealed the head of the dead. Not to be touched upon or made as if to be felt.

It was a given fact that there were also heads down there, limbs and other cut-throat parts that had been ripped out of their various bodily sockets and placed as if to rot and be unable to retort. There was also that one thing, which almost stood out. Like a cancer pointer, a star that was pushing out and walking in eight directions. Four legs on one side, four behind, two on each side.

A metal device wrapped around its body, holding four children to every side. To a curve of metal, as if it were a three, from left to right, the infants would be slowly pushed, deeper into the side-rib metal cones, constantly being stabbed some bore. Two more, front and back, another metallic three, seen from the side, always in the same manner, acting as if there was no other reason for it to be done other than a desire to inflict pain upon them, nothing being done about it. Eaten, rotten, shoved inside, a leper would not abide this creature caught in its small birdcage.

Bloody breathing through some exasperation, cut shapes across his chest, most deranged as it were, it could only knock on various chairs and part of the bile which was in its throat could only come out past its turn. There were signs of laceration.

A world beneath the ground waiting, damned as it were, beneath the spills of meat where they fell, deepening beneath the earth as they formed some uncanny looking forbidden tilted sea-ward, hardened as it pushed below. Deeper that it should be settled and known, there was a mirrored-wall shaped sun. Which floated upon a mirrored-sky, which only pushed upon the tilt, hardening, various buildings very much alike moved. Most of them uncannily wagering, wars upon each other's ill. Tempered tilted men came out breathing, hardly with little knives in their deformed pouches. Some would come alive and dread, others would be kindly unaware. Of what was going on there, in the distance.

'I see a bridge formed out of the crimson people of whose eyes are green and shine within.'

Some set in flight, delighted of their edifying nature, and how they started chopping, cutting as well, tiny slits of iron crossing, as they built their crimson passing-wells. Upon them a sea of red, they only drank when they couldn't be seen as well as felt. Some were dire, others would admire nothing but the violent pounding they would share in ribs and crimson beads, children weeping as they limped.

They were but strange crystals and appeared to make the most unnatural formations of stone. And at times they floated everywhere around and would turn the world and the sky from a deep ultramarine to a crimson-pink, a vital thing for their kind. Some floated and ever-more. They came to touch the moonlight snow of deeper hues, and blue inside of them falling through, for the snow was anything but soft, yet tainted. Always but a color hued through, ahead of them, they lay so.

‘As I was trying to say.’

Leopold said, without trying to take away from his masterpiece.

‘This woman.’

‘Her name is Horn.’

‘She’s done for, wrought and remade, by masterful hands such as the mastery of my craft had wrought her innards back inside.

And her arms through while everything remains as they should.’

‘It’s a miracle.’

He said, without questioning why she was as soft of head, her majesty arose. Though her eyes had been replaced in their broken sockets, there was still something still shining inside of them, leading to a strange dome roof that opened, as if lighted for the first time. As one of the eight moons shone from the chandelier, she finally winced and set alight.

‘There, I see it.’

Pointing at one of them, she could see, that through the wrap of stone, something was missing. An emptiness inside defiles, all of them hollow with a transparency that ate. For the stones that entered the moons, unhindered would disappear without a trace. And ever-more quietness there lay.

Middle of it, right in the dead center, whereas normally on such a thing there'd be, but the eye of the storm, dead-looked into it, there almost seemed. Likely tainted but a small machine of blue contorting space into the color that pushed through, wreathing through the atmosphere tainting but the dreams of men unkindly.

One of the cages that had floated in the air, had given in to the strangeness of the despair which was protruding out of it as well as everything else. Tiny bodies pulled through. Some of them fallen as if on cue. But others looped and joined, largely conjoined with the peculiar metal that had made it. And faces and the limbs, many of which couldn't have fallen if they were wrapped around and thinned. Of flight, set in many, dragging but the cage down, for the natural state of it was to be drawn beneath the ground, its meat wasted. Nothing could endure such power, contorted and tasted.

By him, a humanoid with no legs, instead he bore the serpentine forms made out of heads, dragging him deeper into the ground as they all were in need to devour and push around. Dreading forth as they advanced, trying to eat the scum through and push inside a little mound.

‘Here, thee, I ask of you, Heor.’

And he called upon the more dreaded of its kind. There were eight of them, all named so. The Heors approached, being broken and branded, misbehaving where they stood. In blindness they would walk uprightly but never ask for more than they should. Ought not walk that way, they stooped, ever so lower, than they should.

It was a given.

They hid in fractioned stars that sang and danced when it was all uncalled for.

At times, during the flashed of their moons and through lights of swoons they appeared here and there, nowhere near and always there. Beings that could barely be seen. Always floating, never thinned by hunger, growing. Always fatter, always showing in most awful placed. There, watching in the same manner. Growing stronger as they spread, wingless things, their arms grasped ahead as they were coupled with the disease growths. Like veins which spread around, contorted they had wrapped themselves together, all would be part. Of this body, carried along, gluttons of meat, footless but would sink beneath yet flat away. Sometimes appearing while disappearing outside the prison grates, as much as they appeared to dominate, they sought to fear and to look through.

Nearing death they would only sink so lowly and look behind. Giant-corpses appearing out of line with nothing else but a desire to eat and shove them into the dirty grith.

‘I’m telling you, I’ve almost unlocked.’

Spoke Handling to Heor, whom first, at kind, pushed ahead ever so blindly as to think his head would be eaten upon a sinking thing which were the deformed teeth that came out of the stranger’s mouth. He made these halls outside and wrought them. Ever-so floating and almost blinded, for the buildings all had eyes, and would sink their teeth as well into the tiny flying beasts that came along. They wanted to have something to eat, filling their guts with unlikely diseases. Always in the same spot, always going around until they could not do anything but be brought to knees, of which they had many. Around the trim of every edge, and every wall, the feet were set. But a stair leading to a train-like opening in their mouths, which buried the rooms inside their guts, the living areas, not only were they not in the same place, but what had happened would swing them in the spotless hell which was the guttural home they’d spend eternity in.

From inside it looked like a depression, such as the like of a curved bomb which had been dug through by force. Always contorting as if it were, but an unnatural thing thrown along the way, as it happened for inside. Another face that was unkindly blind.

Enough room for the four of them to enter.

Krockwan, Jolt, Hymn and Port, all of whom looked as if they had been mightily worn out, waged upon as war threaded on unnamed lands, they looked for refuge along these abandoned few living houses that lay in the outdoors.

Jolt was the first one to say.

‘The rain will not stop for hours now and if we had stayed, there would’ve been no return for either of us whatsoever.’

‘I understand that but still.’

Hymn could not get used to anything he was looking at. Everything looked so peculiarly mad in ways he would’ve never considered it to be so. As the likes of which, bodies appeared, always nearing the pint of growth and spreading; so it happened for the ceiling to be theirs. Always a foot ahead, they were dead. And always dying, bodies that were growing but spreading, only to appear.

A dead man made of bits of skin and fingernails and most importantly a substance that was moldable like clay but bore the features of the creep who had his face carved in. Not as much as a death mask but as in someone cut a part of his face as he implanted it in the substance, along other devices used for tracking. All there, his arms were back, elongated but flaccidly on the ground, stretched from whence he came.

‘You live in that hole?’

‘I was born in it and seem to grow still in it, with all the unnatural fat I’m in need of.’

Calling upon one of lesser mouths as well, he seemed likely to be called upon by those wanting him dead and planted back into the place.

‘I bear my brothers through.’

Like a small hose received an unfathomable amount of spring water, a bulk of mass started pushing on, slowly being delivered in his direction, as he could not control the flow and the power through which it was being lead onto. Slowly being carried through, but the sinew of bodies-cattle eaten benignly on cue. They wanted to eat it in part and sink about eighty teeth outside, that could be seen. As the various shapes started foaming through and in.

An obscure out of place man lay there. Somewhere, placed as if bred for it, and would lace upon anything as if molded for the spot. Bred for it, and never brought for anything else. With all the uncanny things going, it came at last. And walked upon a block of metal which flew in as it cut through one of the giant’s bodies, left to rot as it had come that way; by the time of which there had never been a patch of dirt any longer, with everything having become obscure as they were thrown around. Their feet were just as glassy as they were nastily dragged along. The balcony of grates, to which the ingratiated monkeys that they were could not reach ahead, in which there lay, but an unfashionable thing, which rotted where he lay.

Though he was still in prime and largely delight, open-sighted with a slit to lay. Dragged around and thrown somewhere to bereave, as an animal with a sting, largely surrounded by the field upon which he fell.

But alas, there he lay. Lurid had taken her out, grabbed by the unfashionable crown of her back, only to taint her touch and never look. Either of them longed for some release to follow, upon the touch and present in the likes they hadn't realized without disgrace, the man with no arms greeted them, while the rest of his body was but a trough, largely attached to the ground, bearing a scent unlike the one that would cast them into the most unfashionable grottoes yet to die.

'They fixed you my dear. At the very least you could to lend upon me a smile.'

A scent so harmonious such as the likes of which would never be seen or touch. Where they lay, the sun was but tainted and touch, it brought little more than it was needed, as it wreathed in pain and changed in like. Part of it lay like some rosary-tainted pucker of spreading pus. A star that wanted to encompass all.

Though none could see it, as obvious as it remained, there was but one thing standing all across the way, in the distance grouped, and crisscrossed like tiny specks, which appeared everywhere and would to be. Put together never in the same way one could expect them to see, the alloy wreathed, finally revealed for what it were, not a cage but such as dreaded web would shatter its formation and be forced upon the wind to lay.

Never going to allow it to die like that it seemed.

Sun threw its pinkish rays which had not only colored the sun but seemed to go a long, lonesome way.

'Got you.'

Leaper the colt, another one came, and the two of them froze. It was a robbery such as they likes of which they hadn't even expected. It came out of nowhere, barely deflected for what had happened there. No bullets hue but strangest pick-like bolts of sinew came out, as if skin shouted, let me out of the barely. Yet the tissue formed across the half one at the bottom's throat, then slowly dug and came about the other side.

He fell without a chance to breathe, he would've fallen sooner if there was but a chance for him to seethe and foam. But a thing of his own, Lurid but tried taking her away, with little misuse and just as little of a chance to get through to her.

'Ah, now I see, she's hit in the head, isn't she?'

'We got nothing on hand if this is what you're looking for, take it.'

Lurid but threw one of the rings that were placed on her hand. It looked like a band with a small ear stolen from a man. It was of little value but the bandits took it. They shared between a sack, just about limbs and parts, including the man they now shook of what he had, putting him in. Alas, their suits covered every feature but they were of an utmost distinct kind. Out of this place at least, for what seemed to be a long enough of a run; they made it with what they could and ran as fast as they should while being trailed. Many colts and deformed cartilage-boned rifles laughed as they grinned. Shrunken bodily whims had come on top of them, always stalking and always trailing in the wrong directions.

'Don't let them get through, they'll put a wrong use on it, if they settle past the river and misuse it.'

Man in charge Ezekiel-Sphere, he was but of a piece as well as he could see and aim and shoot again as they but followed. Without wonder and without getting a strong sense of what they've done, they disappeared somewhere around a hill-like rise, a patch of green in a land of murky colors, with an abandoned truck near it. The hills were so inclined, but looked benign, a sad memory taken from the sky yet allowed to run so. As much as they could set aside, whichever glory might've taken their pride, none but followed, all but asked. There was a reason not to mind, what went on but wanted to be. It came and fell through, but never to see, there was something standing in its way.

Always blocking, none to convey, slits of alienation, they were here and there, hidden in the ground. Most hid like larvae, hid and died only to have a few tinier ones widespread and cry as they were taken through their heads, missing slightly but eating just as much as they could get. A sine of filth, in which they drove, farther through the hopeless rope which dragged one down, there had been signs but no one set them off, and would malignantly but set one off, only to spare, only to dare and follow on their trails.

Beneath the earth they hid. Winked at strange eyes of dirt, men of grit appeared and took them still. Platforms of iron, and mixed-up barbs, iron fences which were flat and many failed wrapped around growths of skin that would not move on, always in the same spot where the larger ones grew through. Attached as if they were breathing through the roots above their heads, uncannily wondering whether starving or be eaten, next batch attached to them as they were being lowered onto a strange pull of scum in there. Lay fattened, the larva-skin was near, harvested of what they had, eaten in fear. It was how they managed to live so long.

There were always ways to tell whether or not they overextended, especially since the larvae-fat would sometimes simply seep in and grow everywhere around the place. Yet another small intrusion such as that of a scalpel would sometimes come in mind. As the various attendees, the caretakers grouped and came, most made sure it was taken good care. To be certain, some of the fallacious fat would be put inside tiny containers and thrown aside, out of fear. Nearing the point where they could dreadfully be inclined, set of little mind, they moved. Through the first gut shook and shaken as they breathe.

'I think we need to make sure the production of meat will still be going, even after we'll have left the place.'

'Are there more people around the place?'

'Certainly, at least eight of us making sure every larvae is being refilled. We would not like having to deal with.'

Strange wooden floor and briar pseudo boxes they sometimes put it, dragging them with chains while making sure these parasites would remain of one mind.

Ezekiel-Sphere spoke again. He considered why he was showing this to the moving painted man who followed near. He was there, he was here and he had appeared out of nowhere, in fear and in fright. Always trying to do what he could, blindly taking but with a scalpel, drawing blood so he could eat after.

'There, I think we have ourselves a prize.'

From one of the fat rhumpous luscious lumps he took, but a few tiny children, not that he should mess with the next generation of inbred parasites, but they fixed teeth once they were chewed. As sick as it looked, likely they should all keep in mind, and stop the staring. It was this, followed by eating limbs, which only gouged the classical back organ which was heated as hard as coals bags. Then given and passed around until they could do it no longer.

One time, on rare occasions, this would. It turned and faced them as if this were some peculiarly surreal scene taken from a dream, opened one of the eight faces that were slit, and then spat down what appeared to be a cubical, made out of but a man. Whose body was missing, his hands but cylindrical valves, calves were but tendons and veins that twisted like grasshopper legs as they entered the sides of his head, pumping some unfathomable liquid neither of them could identify, neither of them being able to deny that this was no place to stay.

‘Here, I dug a hole at the opposite side of him. I think we should stay here for a few hours at least and make sure there’s nothing going on with it.’

It never feels like it’s enough to wait. Until one of them starts acting up again, many of them being released from their insides, barely leaping or dragging themselves in.

‘Keep this in on you at all times. They seem to be disgusted. Hemophilia, I think it is, the main reason, but I cannot be sure of it.’

They wore guts like strange protection talismans, old tradition dating back more than it ought to be allowed to. Sometimes they took them off, only to find themselves somewhat creepily surrounded, and never gotten past the age where they could simply leap around and eat from the ones without a face.

‘There are men out there, sitting in dirt, face and bodies chewed in.’

‘It happens, sometimes.’

He spoke to the paint, as in reality, it was merely stamped on top the dead man himself. Uneven walls which stopped on one side and appeared to continue on the other in the worst possible manner. Nothing appeared to bring back the joy, not even them trying themselves on.

Two more men appeared.

‘We got this thins with us.’

Ezekiel-Sphere came up, he merely threw a glance and appeared to understand everything. Lower-side of man, larvae-cubical on top of it, an attempt to get a hold on a lower body in order to escape and get as far as possible before being trialed for it.

‘We’ll do it here.’

‘There’s no doubt about this, leader.’

‘Guilty as charged, take him to the chains and lower him into the floor of fire.’

There was magma which was still fluid because of the heated pyre. It appeared likely to be constantly changed despite the obvious, until they realized that there was no possible manner to control it any longer. Hands came out the bottom at times, they begged to wrap themselves around something or someone most of the time. When it was most unnecessary to believe it happened, one step behind, and always yapping mouthlessly, theirs was a realm of touch that was discovered by singing and by permanent scars. By leaving boils and third-degree burns so they could see the world for what they are. Through their victim's bodies came the eyes and for them, it was only a matter of time until all would be revealed.

A sleepless night followed.

Painted man, of whose name was but little known.

Always on the wrong spots. Eyes on the clouds, eyes on the willows, oaks, and every dark tree and every hole and every peculiar shape, even the statues and everything which appeared to come as well.

Various peculiar almost frozen-spring-like, as the drops and various river-head swollen and came forth. Set by sweat and wreathing bodies, all of which were carried but along. Buried with eighteen sides, flowers that grew the wrong way and would rather be put, unkindly to stare; Satyr-like statues, all put everywhere to hold one of the holding cages, whose many rough ends started extending, just like in the looks of snail's eyes, flaccidly stretched and grabbed from their behind. Not allowed no kind of flight, never to be allowed to embark again.

But they whom harvested what they could, be it whatever parasitical moot or meat, there was no taker, only what could be seen around.

Always on the wrong spot, always messing around.

'The missus, is she fine?'

'Of course she is, she only needs a few hours of rest that's all, she will be fine.'

At the very least, they remained there for what seemed to be one hundred days and one thousand more which followed. Although neither of them could be checked, there was somewhat of a simple reason for him to have become. Something of him had to be left behind only so something might flourish after.

A trail of florints could be seen lain around. Leading to the remains of a Sphere that had encompassed or drawn him in, he had been dragged around and stretched upon a pair of chains. He'd been put to a lot of pressure from the nearby mask that were attached to the boiler-terminal as he would not breathe again by no other means. But most importantly, he had lived, somehow in an uncanny manner. He managed to get through. There was no reason to assume there would be a change. He was but split open, laying where he was, not only without a face, or one that could be distinguished, but without anything a living thing could somehow relate to or grasp at. Since it so happened for his followers to leave as well, the sustenance being lost, from what he could tell, this was but a place of silence and something he could not draw his eyes away from. He was lost in thought and mildly deformed in the brain. Always dousing knowing that many generations of his followers had perished, long forth-abandoned; though the likes of him could not wait there for long, as he yearned to be released and made to walk through without giving a thought to the matter. There was this thing which could not be ignored, ever so pleasant as it were, the sphere rose.

It floated as an uncanny thing. Ezphere but had rubbed a few tubes the wrong way upon drawing, pulling what it could from the terminal. Of which rubbing tools and many others, and hands, extensions and peculiar pumps seemed to be more alive than him at times. Even bloated, foaming, trying to grasp. He was there but for a reason he could not put his finger on. For those that remained looked as if had fattened too much for there to be hope for him as if to do anything else than what remained of him. He was but shocked, and cocked in the back with a larger spine that one ought to carry, phallic even as it drew in and out upon his flight, defeating the purpose of his form. Upon marching forth, and carrying through diseased tunnels he might've honed a thought of wonderment as to how might've it have happened that it has yet come to cave in upon so many a year passed, he finally descended. He had not been a part of it, nor would he mourn for those he lost, since he had but little to spare from that point on. There was no reason to go on marching, especially since nothing would yield no kind of result. It was all too plain that something has happened here, yet he could not, for the likes of him understand, what happened to the cages? How could they disappearance have come and been without a mark on the ground or even seen by any means. The quiet had even sold it so. In his mind he would but know or understand how it came to happen, only to come to the realization that he had not understood anything. Anything at all, everything had been wasted on him and this was the place to be done in. To be done for and twisted and turned and put to waste as there would be no more forms for him to be fed on. Whatever reserves lay in that tiny terminal had long gone to waste and he was but of a mind to ask, who came next after him?

'I've seen it all happen and I can finally begin. I know you were eaten, larvae, deep from within. I had hope that you would somehow make It through. That you could somehow control yourself, only to be useful for some time, until passing on the next generation.'

Yet there was little to no one left to hear. No one nearing him from the distance or always to wonder what had been the cause of all. He was but of a mind unlike no other, but appeared to be blind as to what brought on the destruction his kind suffered. Always of a piece, tiring himself over as he dragged but on a sphere of disease, it had become him. And it carried over on top the ground. Planting itself like pheromones as he levitated atop yet to be contaminated plows.

Roughness could be seen, there had been somewhere here on a whim. Foot prints and dug-out crates, broken barrels all too moist to be remains; always mocked by tiny sparks that weren't there or no.

'Whom rises forth?'

As if a chevalier he started charging forth on charred ground, trying himself a she could but be of a little mind for the strange suit he and his deformed horse were both wearing together. Always of a mind to ask of it, they were, for what could there be, at any time, but a reason to set it so, the blind but followed through, making it so seem as if they were but in tune with the orchestra, the assembly he had but carried on back. Through a few cracks of twists, it's done so, ever pushing them to be seen while there was no reason within sanity, to move them on, or but to carry through. They acted like tiny diseased rats but gotten through before their time had come. Before it arrived. There were others who wanted to piece, of throat and many looping holes, in the giant marked body. In the wreathing thing which found solace into hunting the strange glutton-ball which floated yet above the ground floor; as they made but a game of it, they followed through with some unnatural appeal. Large blades, like huge octaves, shaped as if they were curved as well, all around the edges crying, to but put themselves on top. And wreathe in pain as they could but not help it, wanting to be done.

The hunt would carry on by some means or another.

A man had yelled.

‘It’s getting away, it’s getting away, I can see it, I can see it.’

He wagered, as soon as he had come to it. He was but little in doubt that they might catch it since there was no way down no longer. All slurped and put to dirt, and left into a place, unlikely to be caught on. Upon a short interference, there had been but a sign. At any time, from the looks of it, a man could’ve stepped out of line and finally put an end to the creature before the others might even come to suspect it. It was unnerving, being hunted. Thrown into a ditch and poached, there was never a chance for it to approach and be felt for, or see a thing decay. It was that leprous body which appeared to make something out of it. There were lays in which it promptly stood, before long, its body shook and was to be thrown around, always of a piece and shroud which ought not to be taken or made to be seen as its metallic peculiar shell started falling off. Then melted, encasing him before being caught.

‘Close, he’d escaped!’

‘Down to the underground regions then, we shall find him so.’

They had made horn-bottles, with which they only pushed below, making the most peculiar depressions which drew in their bodies like wind-vales and leaves, drawn to a point, where they dug and never made it, through a piece but long contended with being a single contorted body. Out of theirs and put together until they could no longer face a rain, of which magnitude only drew the dirt away from the surrounding areas and into the horn hole where they all hid and wanted to spread against, below the earth, where life was scarce, a glutton-bore. Whom walked eyeless, chained but having caught them off guard. They appeared to be dragging themselves as the meat hat encompassed both their riding animals and their bodies, alas, the deformation was too much to look through. As if siphoned and made to melt, in the mixture, now all plain to see. One to be called to it, he should’ve known.

Sphere was not one to be caught as easily as one might tell to throw.

‘In with the rocks, pit him!’

They shouted and announced, immediately entranced by the peculiarity which was his. They rocked his head and bobbed it forth, always around the edge and always wanting to do more than that while have him bleed. It was obvious that they could not help themselves, nor see within the range of grasp, as strange as that was, they but were unaccountable for what they wrought. In quiet days they would’ve had his throat and thrown it away when no one was looking, but now?

The glutton had to settle with a rock against the back of his skull. His mouth but fell, and jaw pushed through, but he’ll survive it, they always do. Venomous meat from the looks of it, as if there being smaller mandibles encased in the meat itself, always injecting whoever tried taking a bit. Tooth for tooth, venom exchanged and that’s how they survived so far, killing their own while dreaming ahead. There was no understanding between them. As soon as the moans arose, the bother gluttons were but drawn to eat as they could feed on as well as be encased, in its mass there lay, but many bites and gnaws that pain alone could not convey.

Only to be certain of the monstrosity which had become the strange peculiar men that rose in, the funnel through which they managed to draw beneath the earth would be ever-so closely more shaped or near a mythical horn than a normal one, giving it the strange segmentation that would break and force them to spill along the way, with the exception of it being twisted the other way around as the tip of the horn to face below the earth and pierce another layer. Through which they would be forced to liquefy before falling, dropping and being remade. For the same reason skin would still bear fragments of bone cartilage because of the impurity as well as the imperfection this process seemed to bear. Not to mention the incompatibility of the parts which had been used as well, which only dragged off.

But if one were to look at the peculiar faces of fat and the Lumped ones that went around the underground quasi-abandoned halls, he would be surprised to see that the mouths themselves which were forming inside them, or more so-likely, the incisors were but temporary formed inside the meat only as a protective organic self-defense manner which served as the most uncanny thing, only to draw in and push through, the blood system being turned to a peculiar sinew before being thrown around.

There was but little as to matter then. Danger and solitary confinement was everywhere, but one should find him.

They were still in on this hunt. As the Sphere-Ezekiel was still attempting to draw out, or find the nearest way to lay about and get as far away as possible.

A wind-trap lay abandoned, it was the lower-gut, the eye attached, a grin-morbidly defined and cut through and in by a strange blade. There was to be no point in looking into it or to wager, as there lay but an echo which followed through. Reverb no soon after, just as soon bouncing in every hall before it could be caught off guard and pushed through into a wall. It was to be eaten and spread. They were but ill, and never there. With as fast as a twitch muscle, a reflex that came after, they all moved to the side. An arrow and a bullet made out of a peculiar twisted brain, set aside as it cut like iron, never touched, but always for a piece, always thrown about and cut through, eaten, they could not be deceived. No, not while they were so aroused, so active in the mind that they would know what's going on there. Always on point.

'It's coated.'

'Then don't touch it.'

Two faces, open mouths, elongated on a monstrosity which was rounded as a balloon-sack, hardened in the front before dragging back to many legs which twisted themselves as if they only allowed dragging along and no other kind of movement. It was obvious that neither of them could be spared and neither of them could dare to touch. Dread followed through them, alas, there was but for reprise. Coated in metal, it threw a few benign rocks at them.

This was what life lay for them down the ground-corridors, no possible exception. There were things that weren't spoke on, a myriad ways to look back. Skin-planted air-people who were carrying those who had been sutured on, for they were back and phasing, through the past and through the future, only to be gone. It seemed unlikely to be spoken of, yet Horn had become, alas. But her half-a head above the nose remained. Many long legs made out of smaller, muscle tendon-thin connected segment-legs, upon which it walked. Taking her time as she could draw away her husband's coffin, Lurid being there per chance; but he had but been inclined to look around and wager. Walking with utmost peculiar things, all the while she had yet to understand it but she was anything but in control of her broken stings. Upon which she stabbed the ground, and little more than a few injections, would settle as to go in whichever direction. To her there they lay, always following in order to convey the least amount of pain and anger.

And whose walk, strange talk, upon distraction, there came but a man. With little eye to him, to stay. He had but bore a small thing in his back, not a sting but carried a trunk which opened, let alone revealed. A compressed city's citizens, all pushed inside and sealed. Wreathing around him on a cylinder, wheeled around, a torture not to be called, felt around as the ground started changing from the metal to a billion heads that had been coated and used around. In this peculiar thing that followed, pain could not be misinterpreted, let alone allowed to be shallow, as it followed yet around. From their scalps, blood was proud, as they had coated their heads with helmets of coagulation. Farther than the ends of the sky, a blood narwhal-like finger follower four others, standing upon a floating sea-ray, which ate what it could, not to stay around and eat, the smaller planet heaps of flying mosquito-like heads and long injectors that would breed with it. Little boils would be its wombs, and plenty of umbilical cords drawing blood within them as they could not help themselves but start to breathe. Through this uncanny heap, there lay, but a few, along the way, picked.

Diseased unnatural things that grasped, with their peculiar wings. Of which broken and left open like curtains, from the insides of which they spread and protected. Little wind-shields they formed, of large decay, always spread across the way. And listened to as mighty fences of bone only riddle many words upon tilting upon the wind-homes the creature passed through.

But most peculiar of all, the fingers were of such a mass, benign that their bore. Five main heads that gave the others, men affected by wild disorders, whom could not but help themselves. Always looking for an excuse for what they dominated. No sky erected, but let to breathe, allowed to seethe as they would see fit.

Eclyer, Alabaster, Taband, Whysk and Ortle, all of whom looked like strange disorders, of the most peculiarly intrusive manner, surgeries had planted them inside and they looked just as benign as any man would imagine them to be. Seething in their wild-planted heap, a few feet deeper in, they could not help themselves but communicate with her. Since she was but a being of her own, little of mind and painter with scars of tar, while the most peculiar speech patterns would be muttered from afar and jolted by underestimated-unseen servants whom leprous forms could but little be seen at all.

Alabaster came first to notice. He had but a little horn of growths coming out of one eye socket, then finally entered in the other. Always poisoned with the venom of his cut. Brought with a filthy thing which he couldn't see about. Blindness was obscure, it could not be put to test, nor proved to be, of little mind. He was but blind for a period of time but had regained his sight upon his mouth. Once he chewed the face of a survivor, he had managed to pull and draw him in, enough that he might meet him yonder, only to get what he wanted and waste to time, seeing through his eyes, yonder where he needed be. He was dirty, extremely so. A long tongue which emerged, tormented by what appeared to be a mammal's physiognomy, at least to the cured rotten-meat he spared. He had ignored the peculiar things that were the mosquito-shaped peculiar planted filth that entered them. Since he was changed and used to breed, he might as well enjoy it, evil thought.

Brought to them in utmost uncanny matter, he could but not understand where she had come to falter.

‘I’ve been split apart before.’

Horn said, and she remembered every minute and second they had worked on her.

‘This body of my had been partitioned to evolved this way, ever since the doctor and his assistant had their hands wrapped around me. Know me so, I seek nothing and I have no hope but at least I got with this in mind.

I cannot for the likes of me die. You may not believe it so, but I’m hard to touch and may never be destroyed upon no touch, and let alone, brought to justice upon the spread of a diseased rat.’

Upon which they appeared to be on top off.

Annoying sounds coming from the others. So benign and most unpleasing. They were doing so intentionally as if either they hadn’t been fed for years, or some other unpleasing thing happened. They wanted to look around, to be pushed and allowed of flight, to explore, to see around and see some more. Walking in most uncanny things while wishing there was more around them they might see and bear. And bear no longer, wild a thing, they could finally see it, somewhere, there, in the distance, sounding.

He was of a mind to make her suffer in some way. And push her body through a meat grinder to test whether or not it could work.

There were weird stars in the alley, most of the made of skin, wild faces weirdly put around, postulating as if they were thinned by waiting.

That was it, apart from what looked like the strong limbs that came out of them, eight pores appeared to have burst out of every star as well as every home which had once been there. And strangely, as it seemed they were all placed within the same central spot where there was but the cage, lain on the side.

In the distance, the city of Auttowk could be seen, where they lived to work and would do so until the end of time. Of which there lay. It looked as a sweatshop if the people were the pillars that stretched and held the larger buildings on top of them. Highly deformed, and plainly connected with light-catchers when the sky would withhold rain by the cages, they were but to have faced a rain in a hundred years, to feel the wind coming forth, or see the likes of a boat, in a place where the sea was churned and put to waste. It was distasteful, trying to loom and see. There was not a place, whereas they would be, heard.

Voices were but solid and encased. There was an uncanny thing in which they hid as they placed themselves in smaller holding clasps, belts of metal that would hang below their balcony, to which they would have to be slowly lowered down in order for the punishment to emerge. It was done to be. They could not see, not even blinded, but the agony, had faded so, and would return, how would they know?

It was a mess and yet mesmerizing. It was agonizing, trying themselves, over and over wrought.

Some had skin missing of their faces.

The Auttowks were hardly brought there, only those who suffered most and could not deal with the stress. Those who were forced but to stay the longest, would not work as hard as to satiate, whatever this might be, they were not trying. Lying and would to be called and made to listen. There was nothing that worked and but little around them, there was more. In the air, and more, and less and there would be so many other flying things of metal, peculiarly deformed and thrown around until they shone and became peculiar traps for the figments of their imagination which emerged in the air. They would appear from just about everywhere, materializing ever so near them, only to appear and do peculiar rituals of flashy evocations which were used to throw their part of the world into chaos. So much so that they created an ant reign of puddles from which antler-like launcher of bile penetrated their inner walls in order to create inorganic life which appeared to fly around while feeding on disease. And they sacrificed children for it, with long curved knives, since they were mentally ill, need be said, driven so by the constant force to work, which drove them mad.

Most importantly, there was a special someone born there.

In a small place where work was due, and held down beneath elongatedly deformed corkscrews, slept Gardie. For some reason, his heart was but feel a beat. It was for the last time, he'd be there. During a time where he'd fallen, and would not get away, his heart had almost skipped again, upon a last splash, a blink of gray. He was but a strange creature in comparison to everyone else. As it seemed ever so likely that he would often fall into an uninhabitable dream which appeared to ever so nearly push him away from breathing and living ever so often, upon falling onto it; for what appeared to lay there. Within every wake, upon the hour, he seemed to always be in the same spot. Always daydreaming, vividly without even being able to understand what happened after that. He seemed to see them even beyond the realm of sleep. While reading the passages off the walls, he could almost feel it. But a heart fading, his torsions of skin fading then and there, before he even knew what happened or where he'd be, out there. In his eye, there was but a button missing, and a few pimples-shapes depressions, and various needles as well as racks, all of which had given them a peculiar look, as if they were but tunnels being repurposed after a fashion and after a while. His mouth, dry as if were, started reeling back in, fingers would go missing, and unfortunately he would stare at what was going on. There, in part, always trying not to shout when there were various thing, and bitter pins inside, what appeared to be, the one master who gave the orders.

He was there, suffered in some way. Transparent head, with a heart that had been molded into the brain from below, always pumping blood and neurons across his body as he should now. There were various parasites in his strange box and they were eating him without giving him the slightest hope that he might rise from it. He had but a look of gangrene, which spread around. And by the time he approached with the documents, he'd seen them. Little dark bodies, coming from inside, always twisting the knots inside his brain, while being incapable to spot the other, blind as mole and better yet. They were eating from his insides which the long mouth of straw-like pucks, at the ends of which lay eggs, that had been planted about. Deeper through, his body looked like melted tar, on top of a skeleton which appeared to fall onto itself, always eating when not asked, then pushed around as if he were but a cat.

Left, he left after a few minutes. Whatever documents he had been given were gibberish of the highest kind. Not only so but words were written on top of various lines that might've made sense otherwise, and there was also the problem, of solid throat cowl, which started seeping in. Always growing, he left early. Not within command would he know, or look as the insides of every room, during his early leave, as he would know.

Many were tired, chained and appeared to bear tiny strings and large needles in their eyes, as to prevent sleep and not to die. Through them they would receive transfusion, from those who died during the job and during the subterfuge of the dark being. Across the ceiling spread and eaten. So much so for what was being allowed. At the end of the room there was but a single man which had been pushed around whilst driven into a wall, attached to a device, drawing, whatever marrow he had left, all spread evenly before the ones ahead, not behind. Only the hardest workers would get this. Not to mention the filth crying, they should die.

It was a voice that would not stop. It was something he could not fashion, let alone think he might be able to encounter. Or see for himself, there, outside. He stopped.

In the middle of the street, he felt his throat emerge, as from both sides as well from the entire girth, behind. Strange how he hadn't sniffed them out, large growths like lice, all of them swollen, moving inside like bot-flies, trying to hide one of the speaks who had come.

'You need to return. Your absence is felt and shall only bring a lack of dignity and pain to those around you. Unless you're nerved to take your spine back, we need you to come back.'

He had to listen, he could only do as such, as he was in no position of doing anything that might take him, abashed and make the loss, at the cost of seeing everything draw away, be lost. He had but so much of a short-span. Through which, the condescending voice continued in the tunnel.

'I've been checked in already.'

Keep the distance. Everyone seemed to move away from him. They could see it as plain as it were, having become his hunchback, and only swollen fingers could be seen as well below the rims, of a dark belly full, but thin. At the same time there was no question, not asked. He had been cut around his forehead and would eat what they cast at him. Even the swollen interconnected faces he stumbled upon, entering the brothel, he had almost been pushed away if it weren't for the one. A night well spent, and walked alone around the night's end. Where lights would not check for him, were he to take something, out with it.

He had but stumbled and arrived. It was a house of spikes, with everything inside being riddled with them by the infection. Not carpet and no object could be immune from it. And for the likes of it, this would be mightily unsanitary to be felt around and prized within. A head for a toe.

He had but been waited for.

'I need you to do something for me, deliver this package, as I tell you so.'

Back door opened, only a slit of light coming in. The figure could be seen right around the chin but not above. A robe of some kind, of bloody croaks, always making but a sound, from which there came but bubbling around. Through every spike, and every pint, but a small pop would make it seem like it was trying something. Not to be called off this way. But there was a clear thing between the two of them, he would not speak of. He was but wondering what would happen if he would but say.

Yet he clicked. His fingers whipped from one side to the other and the spikes withdrew as if they were but wrung from a device, nothing more than that. It would be useful to know as much, but he would not talk of it, not in the like of what happened. There was something peculiar about him. Though it would suffice to say, whatever had entered his side would postulate as if to grow, through say. Half his body, arm in bound, got pulled away through the door, and shroud and gourds that appeared on him stood that way. He stumbled on the streets with little more than he needed, across the street, where he stood upon a peculiar bench. Gardie had but no doubt about it. He was being watched in the open. Peculiar figure, ten feet long; next to him in there, here long; it seemed likely that it would grow from the head next, the more it ignored it, the more the lice-like structures would spread across his body as to become, worsened by time, they would come to spread toward permanency. A stretch, uneven, the figure bland.

‘Need something from me?’

‘I was just trying to take a sea, nothing more. Are you expecting someone I should be aware off? I could leave.’

‘No, I didn’t mean that, it’s only this.

I don’t feel comfortable being approached with this on.’

‘I see. Think you could remove it by some chance?’

‘I don’t think so any longer, there’s something embed in it.’

They but looked at it, from different angles. Since they were both inclined and would’ve seen it as benign as it were, there was this sharp thing, it came out of it, like an ugly wearing toe which was hardened as if to show a diamond-cut angle. Which protruded after that from several directions; which was in the least something they both veered away from. It could spread. It could rip a little more out of the gut and push away, always drawing out when unheeded. There was something else in there, but he didn’t speak of it. That would be bastardy rude, seeing how an eye shouldn’t be there to begin with. Always fading, the mist disappeared. It’s been a while since he was near someone. He considered just as much.

Since his throat and heart were untouched by those growths, he could but feel them, strangle and cut. Not here, watched, always watched, this was no dark alley after all. There were things even the likes of witnesses sometimes said which disturbed him. Even more so than putting himself into one of his victim’s skin, literally.

‘I’ve been seeing you come around the other day. You come here often, what’s your business.’

Or a young child.

‘Why are you carrying a knife on you?’

‘How come you always go into the shady outdoors?’

Perhaps this more often than not.

‘I’ve seen you around the dead man, had any business with him you’d like to disclose?’

Always from a strangled man as well, of whose marks still remained around his neck. There was something he wanted to consider, the reason being that they were there, asking questions, talking within themselves, within their groups, always asking precise questions as if they were calculated moves. IT was all too tiresome now, how guilty they made him feel.

This was to be another victim but, how? How could he do it, now that he was being watched? Or now that he knew what to expect from them?

‘I’m sorry, I think I’m late for an appointment.’

‘But you’ve barely just arrived.’

‘I know but, this has gone for far too long, I couldn’t live through a second more, you know? I think it’s better if we don’t speak about this here.’

‘You want me to follow?’

‘Certainly, come to think of it.’

He pointed towards a building that stood out. It was large but blunt, like an inverted high artillery bullet which bore an even taller cylindrical head on top of it. There was no question in doubt about it. There was but little more he wanted but to ask him to be there. When the clock hit fifteen with its curved-malignant tongue.

‘It’s settled then, I’ll be there.’

Although it was late in the day and he had plans to return home early, this would take precedent.

‘You should not follow him. He seems dangerous. Return where I want you to or I shall be forced to take care of your body.’

‘Then I will do so out of spite, I will spiral wherever he drags me to, even if it’s death he’s leading me towards.’

He had almost burst a vein telling him so. It could not be so, but he was dumbfounded, yet to know, how close he was there, out there, near the blade. Near a cut and ever so near that he would be bled like some coyote. It knew instead, and forced him back. Looking down, his feet were beyond. His body opened like an incinerator, though there was no fire within him, only a most peculiar.

It threw on and wreathed to the ground and pulled him with the help of multiple little legs that threw around and trashed what they could in their advent. They were veered in by a long-head. Blunt as well, hardened and flat like a hammer in the front, taking him whereas he didn’t know what to think for himself or what had possessed him then. It was disgusting how powerless he felt. Just when he thought he regained his control, he lost it again, always of a mind to ask for it. Always lost but a took broken and his mind. It pushed out and in, he was about to lose it again before waking up within the hour.

‘You’ve slept on the job already.’

‘But I thought we were.’

‘The streets no longer, we came by two hours ago. One was apologizing for you, the other was being marked for unlawful absence and this one barely being noticed. You’ll leave later today, you’ll leave when I say, you’ll leave when you’re on the verge of death and not a second sooner, do you understand?’

Now get back to it, you fell behind.'

And he could see a pile of broken tar-boxes that were filled with fingers of the sides. Off the day, it was when it happened. Seemed to be caught in procrastination, little thing around his back disappeared. He was finally off the chains, walking slowly as he was pulled back into the gray zone, where his feet were throttled and he was behind. Little scum-vessels held by large chains and Thermopile-holders carried them around, danger-wheels plotting, rubbing themselves with the skulls embed in then. Against each building, they dragged. Always but a shot inside of them, coffins hid in the depressions, jars shoved inside. Men hiding behind the death-masks, always rolled around. But their shouts of anguish could not be heard. Wherever they were dragged there was little dirt entering their backs, or little more than it was necessary to believe, they were gone then. The first functional vehicle appeared. It was out of place, and was haughty, some old wreckage, but appeared to bear a man in.

'Ride, keep going, right until the hour.'

He'd listen. Twenty more minutes passed, it was just about time to strike at it. They were not there exactly, but arrived at the same building the man was supposed to meet him. This time around no warning; everything had been timed off. His nausea would only continue, as he thought himself unable to make out the blur.

'Don't enter that building.'

The cab-rider looked concerned. He was blunt and would to be, wrapped around his earlobes, they weren't working either. His mind was but struck. Out of it and near enough the man who had intended to do so.

He was waiting in an empty lounge. He was just as he remembered, looking wrong, with the sight of a man without arms, sad-looking and forlorn. Too close home.

'I thought I would find you here.'

'Come in then, I was trying to warm this spot for you.'

He moved to the side, both of them on the couch-plant. There were a few of them left around, but he could not look for a reason to ask him, where were the other guests?

'I don't know. I think we're the only ones left, right? No one else is going to come from this point on, so, if you have something to say, spit it out. You won't get another chance, you hear?'

'Why did you want me to come here?'

'I wanted to take your life. I wanted to kill you.'

'Wanted?'

The stranger nodded, several times at that. He was not one to make a scene out of it, he didn't look the kind, but there was. There was that. A small flicker inside his eye, black insecticide dashing, always glancing, always popping as it wallowed around, from glow to glow until it popped in his eye, as he could not help it but dilate into a small snow-ball black.

‘Ah, I take it you’re considering it still.’

‘As always, it happens way too often than I’d like to consider it.’

‘Then I’ll take my leave.’

‘Unless you want to stay and hear what I have to say; stay.’

He reached around the shoulder and grabbed him. Put him down, right where he stood, with a strong, strange grip that almost pulled away whatever skin he had left on the shallow bone-chitin that was inside of him. His thin neck only showed there. There was a shower of blue paint coming from above, yet with each drop, they were but melted-blunt. Around their heads, but not melted, merely shaped, remade a few feet away. Despite what it looked like, there were areas in the lounge that were not touched by the paint. Empty zones, strange circles that were constantly being avoided for some reason. That’s where they were at first.

Floating faces, eyes, parts of their spines, but at a distance from one another as it was more important to know. Within his reach, still, if he were to take only a few feet forward, they would be in the span of their reach. They would out-do one another, as if to clasp their hands and feet. Primitive things, they were, then, as mullatoes-ripped away from reality.

Still staring.

‘I could still make it in time to grab you.’

‘Not with this rain going on.’

It happened, everywhere around them. Small hybridized canopy, plants, carpets on top of a patchwork of chairs and the camper. They were barely put together, and just as stained. Every color had been green and puckers-twisted in, as if they were but the scum of the earth made to look worse for every time they turned to it. And worst of all, he still intended to do it.

Pulling out what he could, long barrel, strange gun. It looked livid, with the piece of a small animal breathing on the sides, attached to a tube. Hard to see but it was skinned, no fur. Eyes were missing, as well as some canine-teeth, coyote attached to what would’ve been the missing capillary.

He loaded in a bullet of made-up things. Just as hard to look inside of it.

This was Gardie thinking.

Not to head off too far. Starting to doze off as in a dream, not being reminded when he was supposed to leave, since he was always pushed around and thin. As a reed, he pushed through his coat and made off a ticket. Strange how they were missing in, almost purposefully, every drop ever since he extended it; they knobbed off a single finger. He was fidgety and would to be. Stood right there, spitting what appeared to be the blunt-dust of a wasted cigar he had to eat on his way out. He was tar or would to be his nails. Not everything inside of him made it.

‘You’d have to make the shot through weaves of fallen raindrops, heaps and everything else falling down your way.’

I don't think you can make. It's not clear enough of a shot.'

'When did I give you permission to talk? I'm only going to take shit this once. Don't raise your voice, don't raise your fingers or I'll make sure you'll lose more than a few inches in the back.'

He settled with opening his mouth.

Then the shot was taken.

Back to the cages, all seemed to have faded through. Most have wrapped themselves and would become part of the ground before missing through what seemed to be the hour. Throat-paint, hanging up, low lands everywhere around, when the steps became what seemed to be, dragging. Always of a piece of a mind; always trying themselves. They would carry them through. Little men with stalking parts and dead-briars put around them. Muck was everywhere, as would be the damp moisture. A sight of white-aurora arachnid, spread everywhere they could see. Covered so by the new arriving sun, which only seemed to bear nothing at all; only this mattered now, where they were headed, since the cage had fallen, by the complete weight of the giants, which had somehow managed to chain themselves to them, the cities were taken through.

The fall had let them onto something, no one was safe, nor would they be by any chance or any matter of the point ahead.

It looked like a forage point that struck down the earth. Down there, the workers could but barely seen, worthless, they coughed inside machines to drill. Their breaths were acid and the stones were skin. But not a normal kind arousing, but the most unnatural thing, always reprising, with what seemed to be the likes. Made out of the being upon which they lived through so many ancient days of old and shroud.

'We seek passage.'

'Throw some coins.'

As soon as it happened, upon the many spread and lays below, it rose. Above the head of the nail, between the two cliffs, they'd say. From what appeared to be the likes of both ends. They walked instead, and would to be blunt, it was done. They marched upon the weary and continued pushing through spit. Where it was lain, it was just about the place, the skin and everyone, it could be so. Tiny mosquito-shaped needles that were meatier and red, which acted like vultures of death-flies, entering them but never fully going away. Liquefying like deep-sea angler-fish, a part of them from there on forth at pace.

Though ingratiated by the likes, there was but a maiden who followed through. Her husband left behind.

That was but Lurid, and she was of little hope. She dragged herself along with them and would not say a word to anyone. Since this was but a grind of life, her heart was in a place that was left behind, she could not tell them what happened, not until the time had called for it. Not until she would be listened, or be alone.

It was her home, the gourmet, on which plates there stood the neighbors. Cannibals tried eating her, but they saw they could not chew the likes. Or the tall stalks, settling with the lower ones.

They were found, they were dealt with, out of place, in particular, weirdly put, all of them in one spot. Most importantly, carried, some of the dead were with them. And they've gone through a long while trying to lift them up their shoulders while making sure none of them fell over. Broke apart, while curved in the back and plastered with the wild beddings that followed. Some of the ones that were home ripped through the ground while following. Carrying attachments through their tore-open backs, which dragged over through mud like plows upon a field, large protrusions having spiked and taken everything with them despite how unnecessary they were perceived to be; noise in the city, they arrived. As soon as their claim was put, the first tide turned.

At least a quarter of the city would have to be mourned for and killed in order for them to survive and get as far as possible without pushing their luck too far. All drowsy-drowned, tickled by the lights of a city, tall buildings sprinting in basins of sky, never-seen before eyes of the clouds beings reached in their lifetimes. It was strange being there, out of place.

First set-of dead buildings, emptied by force, it was a result of what they tried doing and how they went at it with a fist of yolk, white blood pouring out, parasites flowing through the gates as they dumped the bodies through the sewer gates. Too often, it happened on eight different occasions, there in the open. A line separated the city, in order for anything to be justified they were but taken aback.

But through it.

Farther away, eighteen hundred miles at least, blood was pumping adrenaline through the first of the cliffs to emerge from below. Rounded around each edge of a square' side of the plateau, where the largest house rested, split where some came to be. Molded in the fashion of worship as they would become part of it, larger miles, every road leading in the same spot. Every dead wilt, ought to have been brought to a stop. Where they took the dead-mile, ending. Releasing but the most unfathomable beasts, caressing but their heads were taken, the walls were licked, but it was undertaking.

How such megalithic creatures lay there exposed, ancient bones which frozen and appeared to show little to no remorse as they were wrapped around each throng and each side of the house. For It stood there, gathering its might. Servants bleeding only to allow it to breathe and eat at last, when not asked for.

'The man of the house has arrived.'

As his gray house started shaking, but a door started putting through. With a little in the matter fading, as if readying itself to disappear before the time withdrew, there came.

One who'd name himself, and would today. Be called conqueror, little mind the walking forth, through what seemed to be the quilts he bore in his back colored with a resting finger, an arm ripped and a single man he had defeat in combat who could not be bothered anymore. By the eight of an inch, his throat was open and would appear to move around on its own as he wrapped around Basil.

He had not dared push them out of his way just yet. Since they appeared surround him.

'I ask of you to make way.'

'You're not to leave.'

‘For what reason?’

‘You’re confined until you can give entry to the leader of our encampment.’

‘Of whom do you belong?’

I tell you that from now on you shall be the Blue of Basils, as I won you in spirit, might and I shall rule on top of your kin and pull what little ill of mind there is to you left to lay.’

He pulled but dread and would go rampant each way.

First there were the broken skies, they were but to be seen, with every lightning a kingdom made in their image benign. And people of light and glow, of power would sow through clouds and air. Not to be seen any other day unless night and storm, and lightning bolt came into place. Their hearts but thunder, their eyes but tiny specks that would be thrown. A yearning for wonder as they seethed so, for their doom lay in the eye of the storm, which would bring destruction every now and then, when called for and when to leave away.

Careful of the light. And what they missed was the sign in the ground, made compounded like the breathing holds of which peaks upon which they were held upon were as bloated ropes attached to domed-buildings, wrapped in many anchored elongated body-like formations that kept pumping. From the tops of breathing units, they produced but a strange infested smoke, with flies of its own, at the depths of which the body of a giant humanoid god could be said to either wear this structure as a hat or for it to be but an extension of his skull which drew even father in the air. His face was broken and would be away. Deeper to the core, his limbs pushed downward, even coming close to ripping his arm-pits in order to grow carrot-like roots in order to spread even farther and anchor himself in order to plunder the natural resources needed for growth.

Of course this insecticide and whatever other organ appeared to be stored on top in the malign structure were his. Was it not obvious by the way they slowly made through his body and along the rims of his brain? Could there be any other explanation other than the fact that he was detested and would do little more than not to say, speak of the confines of the core. With every touch upon in one were to look for more.

The planet’s core was but made of many colors, blue was mundane.

Life in the city was nothing like it had been in that red of misbehave.

‘Hey Michael, I was waiting for you.’

‘What happened?’

Late appointment, lost around the hour.’

The traffic was full, the room was small, a two by two apartment, tighter than a cell, he thought.

Living inside the hull. The blimp was just beyond the world. On top the hull, machine-guns flying, turrets propelled on their way, on it. A few riggers lived inside the hull. Without a driver, abandoned home; their heads were filled with gas, planted on the side, alas, they wanted it.

A man dropped by the ladder, the walkway-skin, the saddle within the grand stretch without a lighter.

They wore hooks attached to reeling wheels on their chests and merely leaped from one side to the other, since the insides of the blimp were poor imitations of the tower Eiffel.

The French are great people. They need to be killed; with kindness, with kindness.

Days passed along but either or, neither of them could understand how come they had abandoned there, to deal with themselves, alone, in the lack of a better light. It was always pleasant there. The atmosphere of a small special oblong, as in space; hooks being constantly thrown from bar to bar until they satiated no wonder, nor disgrace. From the side and onto it, they leaped behind and came forth, until they reached their side and plowed on.

It was pleasant swinging.

From another side, they'll leap. Going on around each edge and making sure they'd get in time and sip their morning floating balloons, filled with beans, eaten during a swoon. And the like; it was always something they kept in mind. Here and there, they went. In a strange workaround, a platform was set. As the jugglers came to be, and many balls wrapped around the cord, to see, there came the orangutans, the elephants, the baboons and the buffoons that came after them. It was a time of joy, it was a time of sitting on two sides.

Hooks were but in mind, above their heads.

'Colonel-Sheep Besant, I think the troops had already decided our fate. I don't think there's another chance for us to make it.'

'Good.'

'I think they've replaced the people in front of us. I think they're no longer our people.'

'Good.'

'I think our people are dead.'

'We're the only survivors, they're being forced to act in the most absurd manner.'

'Did you not get the idea solidier?'

Besant stood in his sheep-clothes, sipping off the butt of a cigar which had turned his lips to ash. They were put inside and crawled underneath his eye-drops. Right near the covered hand-gun and the little artillery-long range compound-deflator rifle he carried with him. He wore a lot of belts. They were leathery with a sign of skill fallen off and hair being present despite the animals in question having had none.

'They're burning tinder?'

'Fire in the blimp?'

'It's only the smoke, they're heating it with the smoke, but there's no fire.'

‘How can there be no fire if there is no smoke?’

‘There used to be a fire when the balloon was deflated, that’s how they got its smoke in the jar.’

‘And how are they not, you know?’

‘I don’t.’

They stopped talking.

A few hours passed, with them leaping around as they tried reaching the last floor of the eight Eiffel tower on the right side of their wild curve to which they were pointed at.

Everyone had their eyes on the blimp. The smaller one, inside the blimp, and whose touch would reach it could destroy, but everything outside, upon their joy. It called on them to throw chaos.

Ever so now and then, Besant would but raise his gun, shoot now, only to see it through.

Outside, a giant bullet leaving but a trail, the absence being, too, pleasant to be approached, or spoken of, as they had feared something else; incapable of checking whether or not it made it so, be pushed around and sped away.

It was, unknown to them, to either of them as a matter of fact; as the blimp only appeared there one day and stood there.

The other side.

There were chimps and ladders, and Judas in a bottle. Floating around, while the lines were but electrified from time to time; and that’s what it felt like living around them.

No one wanted to join this dance. It was too distorted and would be forgotten after a while.

‘Enough with the war-games.’

Ever since Napoleon’s conquest of the Adriatic sea, things had never been the same; nor would they seem to be. North Africa had been completely razed to the ground, Malta and Cyprus become French provinces. Jeanne d'Arc becomes a basin.

His meeting with the Sphinx was complete, immortalized in oil, the body of the beast stood in front of him, destroyed, revealed. As inside of it but an unappealing gut, crushed underneath the veil of stone; battered and put through so much so that it would fail to get anything going through it. Broken apart, but there, standing, it could not be called back from where it darted and where they got it. On the little side of colors, a city could be seen.

The beast had attempted to crawl towards it.

Most of the troops had run to Amiens by now. They were tired. Must’ve been the sun!

He came closer and with a pick, he opened her head and started chewing, making tiny bloated loom-balloons he spat up on the ground. There was that.

‘I think we should cross the gap and talk to them.’

‘Very well.’

Why, Joseph was mightily diligent with the people of Algiers during his brother’s conquest of North Africa, since he indeed turn most of their riders into little blocks where they stood and sprouted into fountainheads attached to little rotating cylinders with spine-crested spines being turned around at every second. They seemed to be bulging in and out, beating around the walls as if their souls were trapped inside, but nothing could be felt in there. Too steep of a drop, at the very least, there was no possible way to confirm whether or not someone was in there at all. Yet his brother brought some of these moving sand-coffins thinking they could be useful.

Then he joined his brother at the scene of defeat. The plains of Egypt were a quarter into a giant crater that had been split starting with the head of the Sphinx where the initial strike had been landed and making it as far as to reach the sea, while creating such a push that most of the sand had almost been completely pushed out of the land while the entire area was destabilized in its entirety. A gap in the air, clear skies as a result of the magnitude of the blow the man had dealt to that bloated anchored inhumane effigy that stood in its place. And there was but no chance to touch upon it any longer. Since it had been there for hours already; its husk but hardened and let through. If there had been a chance to retreat from these dying lands, this would be the perfect moment.

‘What have you brought them for?’

‘I thought you would be proud to hear that I went to Algiers with one hundred and seventeen men and have return with one hundred eighteen.’

‘And whom did you claim?’

‘But Marseilles, the man they had tried claiming of this world and taking him in the other, whom do you think they had? Were there other men they claimed to be?’

Have they taken others during our initial stay? What of the savages brother? Has anyone been spared?’

‘Of course not a single man could be spared, since they only but showed signs, during our initial contact with them, of contemptuous unbridled savagery and a knack of but betraying one another at the first sign of heat.’

‘Was there ever a man out there to prove you otherwise during this short-lived campaign?’

‘Only the British whom had come a long way and whom had dared meet the Gaul with false arm and step it. But they were not allowed to come no further.’

‘I was merely talking about the savages.’

‘Is there any difference then? I tell you.’

‘I suppose there isn’t, brother, so what awaits us?’

‘What indeed if not to rest hand and claim our great land? What else if not to expand our great home to every reach and every corner of the world?’

To claim what else there is in sight? To spread our sigil across every plain and every piece of earth there is that we may fully and finally found the greatest empire that ever existed?’

For he had dreamed of a Great Napoleonic Hold, over everything which had been held or hold. Upon him came the claim and he but carried the whole of Algiers and the home of every man on top his shoulders. Therefore both marched.

Amiens was back in France, he had safely returned by sea-faring, on foot. Wet socks and a wet suit.

But the men inside the hull, they were but done playing like monkeys or trying to leap, from one side to another in jest, they merely pressed in then. As if on yolk, they talked about it and saw but some hope.

‘Spare me a few of the fish-racks.’

‘Here, try not eating them in a bite, it’s still dangerous, you know? Keeping this up isn’t as easy as it seems. So, better yet, do this than, right.’

He didn’t listen, nabbing with little fingers that were not his but his old class-room’s friend’s grandfather who had served in a lost district secret police official program for men without mental-diseases spread into walls, while finding him one night dead out of alcohol and drug poisoning, a high dosage at that, only to have his freaking out friend suggest that they both chop off their fingers and switch them around, which only appeared to cross the line with the man who was in the room and performed this strange ritual, whom was later sent to jail since he allegedly was the man who poisoned him in the first place, but most importantly he abused both children. Besant was one of those children and he had old man-fingers attached to his hand. He was not in the mood to talk since he had breathing respiratory infections and would not understand how the track of his net in which he stood was hardened because most of the wires were but made out of some cheap plaster that’s been used to decorate the filthily-formed god-pantheon which was inscribed in black cloth patched on top the insides of the blimp.

Living in there was worrisome for him as well as the others since most of them were unaware whether or not they had a future there to begin with. To be certain about it, there were other dangers involved which hadn’t been spoken off but involved the use of the military gas as well as every petty this which appeared in their arms once they started sharing the hyn-needle; that, instead of acting like a drunk-drug appeared to completely puncture their veins while adding as much as it could to their tendon-mass as they slowly absorbed the gas and partially fed on him, at the same time poisoning themselves with the small ademoyne-toxins which turned them from a nice pale fair-skin to a dreadfully paler, much paler, almost morbidly dead look-a-likes of men. As they only seemed to be determined to survive at any chance.

And the hull was not safe by any means, despite its oblong shape and the most peculiar racks that appeared to hold the towers in place, there was only thing one thing shared between them. A melted spot, which appeared on every side; a sigil that moved from side to side and formed at times, winged figures which came out of them, silver-like, set in flight to work the little blink as if they were the ones set to repair it. Basent had attempted before to claim them in the air, but he’d failed seeing how the bullets would always pass, both through the blimp and through them as well. It was dangerous, to say the least, too much to. He was not a peace, with it, but he almost saw a dark aura emulate itself, or ovulate as if that think had been but another one of his youthful conquests playing hard to get. And filth would be made yet as the silver flying figures turned, pulling out their masks only to reveal faces that were painted wrong or on a canvas that had decayed, and features being painted once again on top of them only to decay again, fashioning this wild illusion of a falling face, altogether impossible to touch upon, as they feared what this one might do to them, they simply ignored it. Or maybe a stream of melted faces which were taken a photo of or animation cells that were blocked frame by frame, made to look transparent but not put on top of one another evenly, but a few centimeters below one another, to create that effect in the first place. All of this being covered by the body of silver, which went as soon as it could in the strange mark across the Eiffel.

It was grand flinging themselves at hours, but they considered more and more, this much.

‘We’ve hardened ourselves here, haven’t we?’

‘Indeed we have, but of what purpose do you suppose have done so?’

‘There might come a time some turret might be pointed at us, and I fear what might happen then.’

Or what whom to see himself for and whom to dare talk to him then; since he had little to no understanding of the mechanics which involved trying to slit his fingers before he grew old and alone. There were dark days coming ahead and their beds were but put in metal string and would to be put together, they were made out of teeth. He merely grinned at them realizing the despot was but of a mind unlike any other he had come to antagonize, during his mad stay in his gut.

He had been but a gut-wronged, strangely robed deformed mongrel who spoke to little men in his dream. Before he could find out where he was he had but wished he wasn’t there. For, during every night, every man’s mind entered a weird concocted tunnel that interconnected with billions of them out there until they formed the grandest most unnatural slurp-down bottle uncanny drop that lead them below it. There they entered the core as their ailed minds, those melted brain molecules but melted together and were made shape, into most peculiar beings that walked the plains of the land.

Some of these brain-hardened tumor giants or fleshy heaps that were put together on a whim bore the multiple consciousnesses of millions of them who could not concentrate on one thing, therefore only mixing their memories and forming the most unnatural things as they walked along. But they were hardened and projected through unnatural husks that pushed away. Empty in their guts since that’s how they came into the world and that’s also how they would return when the time had come, in finality, the dread would not succumb to man but man to it a she would see instead. This world looked even more deformed in the eyes of his. That in truth, being somewhat even purer than what one ought to see through. His spine being but put to shreds, unnaturally so until he became them at the hour of which, a more colossal one arrived.

He’d been set aside for a moment. Made out of eighteen times their girth, but most importantly his head was of a strangely cubist abstract shape, as much of an oxymoron as that seemed to be, it pushed out of its neck gap, that hole where everything else wrought itself in and had become but the most unnatural predatory pouch, where little tadpole-like muck-stings swam inside, constantly eating from their progenitor-maker.

But he was useless and meaningless and stood in a corner and only threw tantrums. Because there were darker beings out there who appeared to have bubble-makers, the ones you'd blow soap-balloons with your mouth, but in reverse, they were drawing in the universe and eating them through these scepter-like bubble makers they held in their hands. They were the real Progenitor-makers, and they constantly choked with the stars. And fell on stairs as well. And one could see their insides being lit by yellow colored spots that only burst like sparks and came out inside. Like little specks of star-dust which refused to set aside, were become of a single thing, a light that refused to die. And wings were spat as well, they ate, but the most unnatural celestial wings they could barely be aware, off. And these Progenitor-makers came around and stopped eating for a while, completely dominating the sight as they but started dancing like wild nightmares around the giant they were taunting instead. It was fallacious but elating, seeing them that way, and neither of them would change it for a thing. Damn stars, moons, broken apart, they were begging to be shot.

That was zero, one dot-dot, thirty two, dot-dot, fifty eight, it was the timer he'd put himself through in order to wake up. Baesant but did not understand what happened but he was there, in the hull again.

A few alarm clocks had been employed. They were cut and put on top of weird tables that were themselves wrapped around by ropes to everything around them. What seemed to be a corner of men had been one for others.

Living in the hull, there were but blimps inside of it as well as floating cones that pushed around them, always flying, always of a piece, and strained. They were but those of their own; little more than eighteen on their way, having come out of their fat.

'Blimp-head, it's what they called me. It's what they used to call me, back in the new days of the future, from where I came out of.'

Worn out, whored-out shoes of a dancer, like Fred Astaire, ugly fellow; grown up in the age of Commodore sixty-four, listening to Sting, his ears were flat. He was the son of a child and was but a wild hair at command. Smoking a packs of unlit Cuban cigar, fought in Congo, he was here, he was there, flinging around, the monkey at the Zoo, flying a kazoo in both arms, counting the stairs they made with the extra rope they had on them. Depressed, all of them, but him? Bonbanne was and Equirot from the Isle of Rquir', it was somewhere in Ham, somewhere out there.

He was a mess, and a racketeer, plain.

'I see, here's a drug, I see, here's another and that's how I lived, pre coming to the hull.'

'Come again?'

'I lived on scraps most of the time, you'd understand if you were down there with them.'

'Whom?'

'The foreigners, they're ugly and obnoxious, they ruin everything. They ruin everything. But they're not blame, perhaps, Fleur, you should've considered what they are in the first place.'

'What would they be, then?'

‘Simple victims, I would fathom them no less. Strangers brought into a world with a promise that it might be, somewhat like theirs; and who could blame them in all honesty and who might come with anything now?’

Do you not see them bleed with every step? Are we not to gut the pigs under distress if they’re here to stay?’

‘Now why would we do such an unreasonable thing as that?’

‘Because we know, so much better that it is not safe by any means to keep them in, to invite them, those whom had been drawn to our world with the allure of something more than what they were promised.’

‘But we are here and they are there.

They’re beneath us, we’re above them.’

‘As it ought to be, but you are certainly missing an important detail that you may not have come to understand just yet.’

Man is smiling, he is rose. From where he stood but vivid lights were froze in space, their colors were but largely estranged, peculiar and queer. Yet he looked down and saw through the bulk of air, what seemed to be a strange relinquished woe he seemed to share with them.

‘Ah, I see it now, you may not understand how it works here and there, or on any land at all, but we share something in common, which is to say, that to this day, there’s few people who shared in our regards. Wouldn’t you like to know more about that?’

‘But you still haven’t told me why they’re different than us, especially those whom came to adapt.’

‘It’s the generational leap that’s long worn and plain to stride beyond us, they’re the result of the foreigners having come to claim what is rightfully ours by simply being here while claiming whichever help we may be set to offer them.

That’s a convenience they shouldn’t be allowed to adhere to, as it is ever to clear that they will only invite people of theirs in our homes and everywhere.’

‘I’m inclined to think that you don’t know your own people, since they are the ones that invited them in, in the first place.’

‘And I think you’re naïve as to think there are only a sole people to blame for such a problem, as to be the sole cause of war which brought us living here in the first place. Let’s not forget that allowing people to simply pursue whichever destructive means they might adhere to is something no sane man would come to pursue.

Also, as I said before, it was not the hope or the means of the people, or their choice which had enacted them to enter and do as they please in the first place, but that of a small minority that ought to have been inconceivable, let alone touched, which in turn managed to create such chaos as to start a war.

Is there no better way to look at it than this? Do you know so little as you fail to understand that there could be no peace as long as the foreigners keep to their customs as to impede the natural flow one one's peoples? Could it not be even clearer that one could only keep to themselves when such a thing occurs in the same way a lioness it kept around as to surround its cubs when such dangerous practices occur? How is that not natural then?

'We're not lions and most societies that have a matron don't seem to bode too well.'

'I concur then, you don't get it, do you?'

'I really do, I seriously do, it's only that I fail to understand what's that got to do with this war?'

'Because the war started because the foreigners trafficked their own people as well as others inside our country, that's why. They have abused the system, they have enabled the means of conquest as to replace tradition, custom and faith in order to replace those things with that of their own.'

There is no better reason to be mad at this point and time than that, not just at them but the men who enabled them to come in the first place. Since the traitorous swine are just devils dressed in the same skin as us, when in reality they're the other side of the same coin the invaders ought to have arrived from.'

'What can we do then?'

'We hide, we have nothing better to do since we're but a few men living inside this petty hull. Eventually even it may fall.'

'Isn't this cowardice the same thing that brought us here in the first place? From the fiery embrace of your heart's content? From what you seem to have searched, and found a reason to survive until this point? Since most of us are so peaceful as to live normal lives, as long as we're not bothered.'

'As long as we're not bothered; and that is the problem you fail to realize, that's the false conclusion your pettiness and ignorance has come to. It is in your failure to think over a few more generations as well as your children and your children's children and your children's children so on and so forth. To make do with the lessons of the past and learn out of the fact that they're incapable to fit in, regardless of their circumstance as a group since their attempt to develop their own identity is but poison to the land and to its people whom were there before them and whom developed a far stronger identity than that of theirs.'

On the longer run, they will always but adhere to one another and to their own kind, always sticking to their own, always ignoring what's important, or what plight inhabits their people and those similar to them from every corner of the world.'

'How can you speak like that when you yourself is but a coward then? Besant, you're not a philosopher, you're not a man of the book, you're no one, you have no power to you or any kind of connection that might be helped, you're but a man in a blimp throwing rocks at people; what do you think you can hope to achieve?'

'You're a fool if you think you only need those things to succeed, there's quite another ace underneath my sleeve I've still yet to unleash upon them.'

‘And what then, would you throw out man and child, woman and child, traitor and child, and whichever else might stand by them?’

‘Have you learned nothing from history then? You talk exactly like a child, unable to grasp the fact that there is no other way left. There has never been another way, in all honesty, as God is my witness alone, but to butcher every single one of them, without mercy and without any relentlessness to be given away. In the same way the thirty year war has almost completely resulted in a death that could’ve been avoided, the same practice could be and ought to be enacted again.

For that is the unbridled spirit of the people, which may never be hid away from, but lays in waiting to be unleashed. There’s only time and a cause, until people will start butchering one another again and again until there’s nothing but a pile left of them and nothing to sing off.’

It was thus. Few hours on the way to New Berlin; of course there was but no possible way of actually checking whether or not there was something there to begin with. Since they were but a bunch of brats, throwing rocks at the little blimp inside the hull, unknowingly bringing destruction as it happened. Mid-way in; at the middle-split, the blimp became two of them, but somehow stuck at the back, as if they were molded like that, remained. It somehow got to be an even easier target for either of them on both sides. Always but a foot in, always but to hit the mark they did. With a single finger, thrown as well, destruction now came from both ways, as a matter of fact they were of a head brought down, it was there. Floating at the top of the Eiffel without a throat but metal racks coming out of its bottom nonetheless. From that raving hole, the top of a place cut, with many long wires and support metallic pillars coming down, metal nets and various other metal-dead men put in through, it carried them around jingling before it could get through. There was but one problem, with what it bore. The throat of a giant machine came out but they knew it did not belong to it, that was not so.

And every tower in the hull stretched but piece-like strings out of their thickest sides, only to connect with it, when time would not abide. It was so. And would to be, this was but for a dark-embed show.

Down the malignant core; though twisted as to show another world; there was but them.

Horn standing her ground and Lurid being strangled by one of her largest veins; but the city they had settled into was finally attained. For what little there was to it.

One of the tallhouses wore a floating stairway that lead to a smaller apartment giant-bullet shape with a flying wing on the side that stretched like a shop back of a stand in the air, being attached to the back of the bullet if the stairway lead to the ‘front’ of its curved door. That back of a stand being attached with tiny pegs that are placed in rows of three, two more rows, above and below being curved, then attached to smaller jointed pegs that are attached to others in order to make a pseudo-looking counter clockwise rotated ninety degree rotated half cut of a child’s drawing of a hill, seen from the left side of the bullet while its tip points at the watched. From the stand’s back, there was a dreadful image of the people who had once lived inside of it, all being drawn out through a secret shaft from inside the bullet which rotated and twisted their bodies on a grinder, drawing them forth on an industrial-like machine that embroiders them on the long straight-standing back, in the same way a photocopying machine would draw a piece of paper, slowly taking it out.

There was an unimpressive thing, aghast. It worked its way on top of clouds. During births it could simply lay, and when the time had come, little of it were to remain. There was but one who joined in, deeper through. And stayed their way, they lived inside of it for longer times than would be allowed to.

‘I, Barding, first of the Sappying, call forth upon you to lest.’

Would they walk back upon broken recliners? And who’s to stay no one would take its head down, and live in it because of the sheer size it is?

It was not often placed that one would find the time to impart such information by any necessary account, if that may be. As one would look back at the hull and below in, placed below its direct shadow, in dead-center, a park of sand where dark Semites of dark blood appeared to be the culprits of theft, accompanied by their darkened likens as they seem to have ravaged the nearest store of eight barrels supply o liquors. Indeed, although there was and should not be any possible means, or shouldn’t have been, for them to come in, their unbridled malign nature has only managed to draw them in, managing to snick in like a pair of treacherous snakes, as they so lonesomnly seem to be.

Regardless of it, they do appear to be in a queer hurry, that they might make it through before the first pyre burning in the distance, and bears their mark in the sky, as it makes them draw even nearer, as to push everything on the side and listen to what appears to be, a little bell of death which calls them back from where the lay. On that street where he had seen them, where they met like on the briar, like little wooden people talk, with little trees and wooden barrels knowing. Wooden streets and wooden windows watching and frames of crystalline-glass, from which pours the bleeder, trying, meeting their demands. It was just so that he had fed them, thirst to be felt.

There in the dead of night, to follow, a child raised a rock instead.

‘That’s a fancy accent you got here, kid, mind sharing one with us?’

‘I’ve only come to take what’s mine, I paid for it.’

‘We haven’t seen you around.’

‘But I have.’

The kid lied, covering up for the woman that sent him to recover those, back in the park. She had lost two bottles and was in deep contempt to have them lost. They were but a pair of criminals, bloodthirsty while the means to kill the child were yet to be employed. He had a rock, dead-midst the road, right street lay a man, the other one opposite of him with a bottle in his hand, near the barrels, slowly moving. Luckily for him, the parking lot near which he stood had plenty of rocks which he had picked on his way, too soon, to check the brand. The man on the left approached. Slowly, looked to the right, tail of eye on the left, arm pointed that way, rock in mind; he told him.

‘Don’t you dare!’

‘Won’t do it, I’ll stop.’

The kid started making laps around the man, his bottle held tightly, but not the one he was looking for. He looked at the pile, at this small fort of barrels and of bottles. He couldn't draw away from it, there wasn't much to ask, nor to see. Always of a mind to ask, he wasn't seeing them eye to eye just yet. But it's not there, neither of them are. Has she lied about it in that case?

Seeing no other way out he ran, and made it through. He wasn't followed, but on the place, of sand she sold him, through.

And through the night, the nightless sleeper woke and when he finally rose, on the door he froze at the sight. The door was open but pushed inside, not opened like a normal door, but through the frame as if shortened, in the same spot unmoved. A few inches or centimeters inside, and deeply pushed, as to see a dark gloom lit lamp lit outside, or a single passage, like that of a giant cut in a man's chest.

Desperately the boy checked, carefully not to awaken his grandparents instead, every room and every safe lock, and everything of value, they were all there, inside, without a missing piece. Without anything he swore to lose, or anything he might piece back together if chance was but made otherwise. For a man to look alone in place, there was a swamp of races outside his home instead. All but of a piece being dragged along, as if they were a part of a skin-melted avalanche which drove into the nearest moisture it could find.

Awakened at least, after a short sleep, doubting what was going on.

A giant formation out of his forehead, with came out as the tip of a great structure, a sting-corner with eight sides, all which had almost torn him to shred, before he walked through the door, realizing it hadn't been a dream, instead, he noticed giant boulders, all which had heaved the insides of his building, not to allowed escape, unless one knew how to safely ascend below the edges of the crater made beneath its prowess. For that was what the blimp had given then and it wore the air, with every stay; as it turned and made it so, the matter, there would be nothing less pushing its way.

One thing mattered for few, for a little more than a while, dreaded, on streets, but the looks of anarchists, all wrapped around, their feet and mouths, all looking like low-lives. With the sudden breaking, and the sudden worn. And the sudden way in which the land was destroyed, the future was unstable.

And insatiable disease there lay, upon each land, upon where, one could say.

That every piece of every floor was taken and put inside their bodies-gore, as if to have become them during their say; one should know that only Horn was the creature that was given a break from this uncanny show of strangeness that inhabited her life. And there, across this fanciful room, which had. A wheel on the room, well lit, wooden barrels inside, a mast and feed, nets and even a table with a working fridge, and plenty of room in where food was waiting. Through and through and little lights, of sinew-yellow, organ-lams, walking on the walls and curving, and a strange carpet-rowing back and forth, the strange water underneath her, through which she was reminded of her home and the floor-cabinets as well. It was all too quaint, the painting was of her. As if she had been waited.

How could one ignore it for so long? How could it be allowed to breed in itself; as Lurid had but found out, once fully stretched and with everything to shroud, the insides of the meat-field, the insides of her large appeal, the bullet was disfigured itself, especially as it happened during nights. When one could clearly see, it appeared. A checklist embed on a man's coat. He was but plain to see walking around in a place he didn't belong to.

He but spared no second prying, not to make himself accountably saying. Between him and the other man, standing in formation as if cut between the finger's scent there was but a mule moving a chart from behind. It dragged at it for hour, carrying little boot-baubles that were squirming inside. Insidious little things always trying to take a bit out of one another, never prying too far; always trying themselves, bite after bite after bite after bite, antagonistic, leper-trunk. Followed next, there was a block on the main road where there stood but a little glowing thing, they called, a pest. It nurtures everyone into disease. All but move as they please.

'There, the shot of air, and wonder, they but released something in the air!'

Cried the strongest, cried the men, and into the mucus membrane of the walls they found but the little more staying, worked to death, little more than living pavers, whom were clothing it with little filaments. Always every few meters away.

'Watch it there, I'm worn out.'

Said a man defiled, half a face gone, this was half-a course a core but bridled, most of it, partially absorbed, half of it, sighted.

A man was but a strange creature with no sockets, as they said. It followed around and had his guts out warned to stay his ground or lost whatever left his mound. There he walked and wailed again, agitated of what happened, his head was but in pain.

'You're not working that tool right, pull it.'

From the top of the man ripped, from the bottom but a sink's worth shapes of deformations all around his lower bodies, all pushing out to hold. River and flows from the upper body from where pulled but the crown of a body wrought, and twisted, ripped apart and turned and winced. They were paranoid for some reason, seeing things, floors were but theirs and would be, before they missed it.

It was by no means simple, trying to spare one another of it. Their fingers were wrapped, their scowling faces brought down, their necks distraught, their dead-men watched, and little people snapped around the hour.

Not a soul made a scene as it unfolded upon them. They were pale, out of it, anyway. Trying to regain composure; as it dreaded coming out, pushing about the place, in a myriad of little spots, from which horns were wrought and bastardly torn apart as they shot around. A million snakish shapes, all shooting from inside their faces, bursting like the top of rifles, spreading between each man a cycle of pain and brought again, there were little dead following them.

'Torn to shreds just as expected.'

Their breaths were just plain, they were unnerved even by such standards as to make themselves welcome home. Trying to bring as much destruction as they possibly could. Since they were not of this world, since they were of plain thought as to ruin everything their tiny protuberant minds could pain the seas. And they could see them, being wet, all around them, moved around and ahead, from where the little lifted unnaturally gilled being emerged, fat mammal-like twists of humanoid contortions which wore no limbs but the meat of course, it was the thing which united them. With every turn and every stare, they were only growing and would show, in a dowry manner, their long eyes, hid beneath the flaps, drawing the water in like sponges, while pushing those who could see them away. They shared, in the midst of a few seconds, be it a few more minutes, the sight of whom he walked to them. A head-light of pus above their heads, from which but stepped, uncanny matter, formed with legs put on top its head, twisted into every turn and mourning for a back that turned, forwardly as to become a ballista, but the creature was but many a leg alike. Long, but like a forest dented, they didn't look like legs at all. Once the transparent cartilage seen, between each one of them, and the wings were cleared of any doubt. It was them, which were, of whichever shout. They flapped around and spread but specks and underneath it, yet were dead. Some sailors whom had went to see, they were of another part of the world, yet clearly something was wrong with them.

Lower body parts still alive and nerved, pushing as they foamed in every possible turn that could last. Dreading to come out from their own chest cavities in which they dug and set about the place. And entered one another as well as they worthless, faced-in trunk and spare, whatever lay there, to their employ, they pulled the rafts in while only being able to mourn their fading humanoid-souls, whom had, at long lost made it before they could finally be put to ploy. Dance of moons unkind the night; in the House of Bullet there was a guttural flying thing they called Benign. As it pushed out of the tip of the arch, whence it had come about the place at last, there was no reaction from the floating degenerate, wax-bodied-like melted Prayers whom were holding their sermon as if to see, whether or not they being would answer the call, out to be with it, and what to spare, it was that kind of strength that made her unnerved.

Horn had settled through. She was unaffected, she was yet to be touched. The first sight of the work-town was but of much demise, distress being settled so. The Prayers were now known. Peculiar in sight, long tails that led below on stumps they stood upon, in flight but many of disease, what it looked like, piece by piece. Was the cage to be called but fattened, as to beat in it, sacramental battered little joints that thrashes around, as violent as claws, would hit and spare, like rapiers, but intestine-like instead, all trying to drag themselves away from their prisons floating in the air. Of maddening woe, whichever it was, not have been known. Of little more than it was to be closely put. And dreadful in reality, croaking would.

There in the sky lay the Blimp, with its backside having become but an unnatural wormish-human torso-like haired-gray, unnatural stretch, of which heads were but mainly put together on a trunk without throats, they came from inside of it, no doubt there were more. Peculiar spiked rims around the throat-end of the chest as well, from which poured out but little clouds, which pushed out of him, to tell. Of what disaster this being promised, of limbleness it mattered less; as it happened for it to bear out, little beads-like stones attached to long rods that twisted and pushed out.

From its bowels there came peace, and from its songs they spat out, but little more than giant rocks and whips, and everything about it, much estranged, with the exception of its insides which were forgotten as well.

‘There comes the dreaded lord, the new-comer of the skies, the one whom lay claims upon all.’

Some had bowed and were known, to have been spoke, through their minds as well as crow. Would appear to each in part and ask of something to be done, of something to be freely given, of something they would not have conceived if it was fair to so after time.

Some gave limbs, others were asked something bastardly as to take a life within the hour, or make it so, disturbed them, louder. As there were still men in town ignoring, plain to see, always knowing.

Always of a pasty nature, beneath the rims of the street, the pink verdure; but of a far more destructive force than man has ever seen, it was his, of whom were not on laid in hiding any longer but appeared as thin as a sheet of heart, but tall as eight feet and starved. Of such a speed that would continue to spare and go out of its way as to endure through the worst possible and worst uncanny signs of destruction that came upon its way. Twisted and benign it was followed by many others, coarse-crop-corpses, CCC's with bloody airs, surrounded by a miasma, eyeless and whitened of hair, but moved and had to stop from time to time. Theirs was a speed unmatched. First man was grabbed or at least the half of him but ripped to shreds, twisted away and made into a flying device which was sent along its way. Some had come and picked the buildings, drinking from them, seeing them bleed. IT was unnecessary to believe they had come from anywhere, whether or not they had always been here, or would come to bring ruin to all. No one could be spared any longer and no one would but face such fierceness as to realize, there was no way out as long as they were there to fix, only the world for themselves when time had come to bring the peace.

It was unnecessary, everything was, life itself, in their eyes, but bloodily forbidden, one of them was shot.

Brave man he were to stand. It looked like a pure one as well. His face was frozen like a deer, only to be caught and disappear, upon two hands that met at last, coming from both sides, his head was splashed, no burst no boil, no blood that wasn't absorbed, no body either as more simple slaps followed through. And the worst part was the fact that the bullet wasn't even caught, it simply bounced against the skin, as if to peel and lose appeal. Fear was but what had got them. In such disaster as to be forgotten; that's how low they had fallen before they'd get to know, whether this world was theirs or whether to have thrown it all to shambles when needed.

It was something one could not prepare, for the waves of air which dragged them along to walk on pints and bottle kegs, as they were rolled away could not have brought any other. During this peculiar pandemonium, as much was clear, that they feared, once they had appeared, then at last.

‘How do people with no legs eat?’

‘As simple as pulling a claw over their wings and pouting their mouths as they push themselves down on their pray.’

‘Yes, I know exactly what you mean, my face may be torn in half, I may have just one eye, but it's painted.’

He was half-a moon, while bleeding from the missing half, on an open floor which lead into a landing zone beneath them. Dressed like a harlequin.

‘I can definitely see it and I must say that I am not exactly, least of all impressed.’

The sky was become floors, marble checkerboard patterns with weird pincers for every square and every empty space in there. Deformed accordingly and wrapped around the clouds and every bird and creature set in flight.

‘Still a loathsome creature, are we not?’

Do you still feel guilty, then?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘Your time is running short, your body is torn, in a decade your hands will be worn out, almost completely. Whatever you decide, do what you have to do and do it as fast as possible.

Otherwise, there will be consequences to all.’

‘I know; I think I can. I can still make it, somehow, only for a short while.’

‘There’s no such thing as a short while.

And I won’t be there to see you through.’

‘Wait, are you leaving?’

‘Of course, there’s nothing left here any longer, don’t you get it yet?’

This was done by your choice, you’ll have to stir it through until there’s nothing left.

I wish things had played differently, but I cannot stay with you here. I can’t watch you bleed out. I’ve seen enough, I know where it leads.’

He spoke to the Half-bled. His other eye appeared just as lifeless as the other. There was no pumping device down there any longer. He had been wasted upon one of the highest towers inside the town, secluded at its peaks, untouched. With him gone, there would be none left to carry his dreams, no one to carry on what he’s started. Where he’d darted and what was wrought out of him. He could’ve joined the man at any time on his way out, there was still time to return, but only a few years, that was all he asked for.

‘A few of them will take a toll on you, as I said.

I’m tired of starting this conversation over and over again. You will be left alone to your own devices as I make my leave. And afterwards, I don’t think we’ll ever meet. Everything’s already said and done.’

He said, just as he plunged through the river lain inside the second floor, seen through as he left, suddenly gone through, disappeared as if he’s never been there to begin with.

Afterwards he was left alone, to complete what he started, and then what? To start all over again; it was all that he knew, and it was the only way left to escape. But even his sculptures were just as torn as the one wreathing hand that was left. It was impossible for him to create anything decent, for his every attempt seemed to have something molded in them, his every touch, and every pick but embroidering a memory, something that would serve as a reminder, something to put them down, from one side or another. A failure to achieve beauty upon the highest peaks, sculptures broken, lain across his feet, upon a filled hall, where all stared back; in a hall of memories, in a hall of mirrors, where all seemed too flawed for a normal man to look at, that was the only thing he was left with from this point on. Too attached to leave it behind, too attached to make any noticeable difference.

And it time the stone decayed, with every marble floor but coated in the acid that was produced in his veins. Like a rabid moisture that spread upon the splashes, many followed; before he's even forgotten of his choice. He could've left, a long, long time ago. But upon the decade he could not even pick up a pick, let alone a brush. The man eventually died in there.

Outside, there still lay a few streets that were, somewhat unaffected, yet the plight of one side did show upon the citizens and upon the rows made as if to block each street. From the distance and from where lay, they but wreathed themselves out, nothing more to say.

'Eventually someone ought to do something about them.'

'We can't, the city is in chaos, I think it's late.'

'We have to return to work, shouldn't we?'

'The schedule is already lagging behind. We are indeed running out of time unless we push on. We should, at the very least try making it before the hour.'

'I know, I know, but are you certain they won't simply break through?'

'I'm not. You know I can't answer that.'

It's not something I ever thought it might happen, we were safe until their coming, until this sudden break in. Perhaps it's time to consider an alternative, if that's still possible.'

'And what would that be?'

'We have to push them out by force, or try something, when the time comes in any case.'

'Who's to provide us the means? Who's to arm us then and with what?'

They would have to consider as much, there weren't a lot of options left especially judging by the extent of their advancement at most.

Certainly so, and there was also the other problem which deeply affected them just as much.

They were ingratiated, by whatever means possible, they were torn between the tides, all worn out and mangled, and below and above, all walking like probes, trying themselves out, ripping each others' arms, then reattaching, until they could not do it any longer. Every single time another arm reappearing out of nowhere, until they realized something about the sixty ticks, like the beating of a broken clock which almost tired itself out after every try. There was as much about it as one could call it. Always made for their pleasure and defilement; within the hour they knew as much, and it would be settled after that. That's when the true war showed promise.

Robust people trying their spades inside the large carrying rollers brought from the back. Their giant long-cones backs appeared to distract from the fact that these vehicles were close to being completely decayed inside and would to be put in part, inside the walls themselves, having taken the same gritty appearance the rest of the town appeared to bear. Little specks of gray-seed-shapes bits of dark grayish tiles all around the floor melting, through which one could see the ones that remained below, in darkness aching; there lay only a few people as ingratiated as them.

Inside the hull life couldn't have been better by any means.

There was nothing as hardening or bothersome as trying themselves again once they realized that nothing was entering their toes, their fingers, yet again, put to waste.

'You know there are flying catacombs somewhere above the clouds, right?

They do seem to be going around the general gravitational wave around the fine curve of an elongated sun-curve that's dragging everything around?

And most important, it looks like I do, almost a complete carbon copy that's been made to look precisely like me in such a way that I would be inclined to think it's actually a homage to my whole being and how great I am as a man.

In all honesty, I would not be surprised if those catacombs were nothing but a simple excuse to carve a means of getting my attention, which had been well received for the time being. Such craftsmanship is unmet by any sculptor of our time. In all honesty, I seem to believe that there's no greater man than I am, who would be more deserving than these peculiar things set in my image and mine alone and you want to understand why?

Because I may be one of the handsomest devils there are in this world.'

'Then how come you're in a blimp with us and not down there, worshipped?'

'But that's simple, I think this blimp has been constructed and abandoned for no other reason than for me to be completely isolated for the rest of the world which would immediately be put under danger, that being ever-so much, pleasant as it were, the dangerously close to being jealousy man seems to display towards other men who are much greater than them.

In which case, I have no doubt that I would cause such a ruckus that, my very presence amongst those layman would cause such a disastrous result as to even be the first flipped piece as to start a civil war In my very name. And although I would be inclined to endear such a thing, especially since that would only reaffirm what I already know but I would also be at danger of, well, not that there's any man alive that could claim my life, but my general state of mind as well as beauty could be affected.'

'And who are you exactly?'

'I am but you, my dear Besant, I am only you, a reflection trapped on the other side of the hull, I'm the blimp also, I'm all of them trapped on the other side and I cannot escape no matter how hard I'm trying and for that I need your dire help in this manner.

I need you to make a cut so you may finally free me only so I could retreat in some of my flying catacombs, that I may lay in there for a while, so I may gather my strength and lay there for as long as possible until I will have attained the might needed to come down onto the earth as a godly figure which shall bear the fruit of worship given onto me by man.'

'And where do I fit in this whole equation of yours, if you don't mind me asking? Since we both look alike, doesn't that mean I should be worshipped?

And how come I didn't see any signs of, whatever you just said when I was down there, among people? I think there would be signs but I saw none.'

'But that's because you haven't.

Fine then, I'll make you a deal, fifty grand of coins, all mark-clean, if you make a tiny slit so I could get out. And I shall show you what I am.'

'I'm not buying it, go pest someone else.'

And the image disappeared soon after, without witty comment, without a retort, or any kind of thing that could leave a sting. It simply went out of its way, as soon as it came along, as soon as they looked, at how the hull had ended, long contorted, better-fended, inside. A pair of lumps and beating organs kept by a spine and an overly wrought rib-cage which had been completely molded as to be part of the metal frame; leading to the rest of the blimp which only grew and grew onwards. But the peculiar thing was this as well, past the organs, many heads. Some of which appeared, or at least one of them in particular seemed mad, seemed to be bothered by something, as to put itself through a rack of hardly-matter, put through after and after until it couldn't help itself no longer. It bore some kind of irksomeness he hadn't seen before. As if the reflection was but a trick which had come along from inside of it, and went inside, when more, of them started pressuring it to retreat, back at its feet where it was safe and they could feel it, as much as to wonder, whenever passing, after. They were but trying themselves over, always but within the hour, like little creatures that had stumbled onto some malignant power, which made the apparitions dance again. Everywhere, most of them, all of the sudden popped, as if in existence, then out of it, growing.

'I think we should gather out men.'

'You mean all four of them? '

'I'm serious, this isn't the time, we're under siege, we're in danger.'

'There's no such thing, shut your mouth and go to sleep, there's a tent on the side. There's a dead otter inside I've taken the life off on our way to the landing, at the time we had been released.

I've taken its life for a reason and I won't let you leave until you understood what that reason is.

You must know that I've already made the necessary arrangements that it had grown, like a fat giant pickle that's been left inside a jar for too long. By the end of my speech you will have entered it and slept inside that green-soaked otter inside a dead tent that's covered with red stone crystals and red-growth stone pounded hearts, and little broken cracks with little growths inside of them.'

And he had made a point of him knowing as much; going as such, and being made aware that there was no other way inside that little coil he was to enter. His was not an eternal sleep but a shut-down. His brain would enter a state of failure as the dark people will enter the tent and start devouring through the layers until he will have been auto cannibalized.

He explained to him what those dark people were.

Penthouse didn't understand the reason for it, but they will appear. Black-painted figures of his own, made to breathe inside his throne, the lungs, which threaten to over encompass everything in their path.

Their fists bearing little iron picks that might wallow as they turn his insides out, but that wasn't as important as the breaking of the tent and being inside the on-looker, the room of the device, which only neared the sight of man near his death; as he was offered a simple sight to the core and the rotten frame, the bone-like formation which decays and is to fall.

Though taken and broken, then remade, it could not get far as one to see, the giant floating baboon-shaped creatures with many arms to be. Called upon them as they would constantly wreath their limbs and work within, to cradle and to spare, whatever else there is and whatever else remains. Spread between them, they seethe and say.

'Wake up already Penthouse, I need to know what you see. I need to know where it is.'

Besant asked, before he could look away. Even through the broken tent, he could still see his friend, of head-split in halves and ripped apart and put behind a small cart, from which the dead-otter, warm inside would still convey, much of what was left behind, much of his lungs, opened, as to lay.

He took a knife out, split his gut open.

Out of his pocket he pulled out a small communicator shaped device with a pump attached at the other end of it. He shoved it through his heart, the other end recoiled for a moment as the very thin-rope like arrangement started warming itself up. Within every passing second, he started considering the latter, how he should just shove the knife inwardly, much deeper, put him out of his misery. Yet he had to know, he was aware of the existence of the core.

He knew of it, he had to know of it. All was but in his dream and if the previous nights were of any confirmation, it would get even worse than before. He could not account for any further change that might've happened inside of him, or of anything that went through his head, if it ever got so close to it, as to spare a single moment. He started pumping a few fists in his throat as well, it wouldn't do much harm any longer, being as exposed as he were.

But, strange, even the stairs, the dome to the strange fall, upon which the device looked but like a flaccid pipes that lad down. Two spikes for eyes emerged, from a peculiar thing that would much further contort his body as to turn it, rip aside. He was followed by dark figures, many hooded, others wearing cowls. Some had taken a step further to hide themselves. But they couldn't hide the face tubes they shared between the four of them, common box. A gray thing that was wallowing with its legs out as if they were eating it. And it was worn. That wouldn't do either, too much to spare, too much time. Many days worn out, many things pushed behind.

A rotten floating cadaverous device, but that was only a distraction from the ones that hid behind everything. They whom behind tiles stood and rested; upon which one suddenly broke loose, he never witnessed it. Or would've liked to forget; but it was there for a moment before it suddenly came out and right through. A giant peculiarly elliptical pair of protrusions came out, all of whom stretched, immediately if not materialized across the room as to form a maze of little thin rods interconnected, crisscrossed, forming various hardening block-like spheres that pushed down cylindrical discs both upwardly and downwardly from which extended yet the men, whom died for it, but no lower legs. They floated for a while, no features yet painted in blocks of colors, all grays, with no eyes, featureless, but one could see why they were specifically mentioned. At times they out-stretched their talons in order to make motions as if they were preparing themselves to gouge out the eyes, but always stopped at its command. Their mouth-regions, or what would've been started deepening in as if to leave canals, where little thin-palm formations connected upwardly to the very region the sounds came out off.

'I do hope this shall work, you must wait for a very moment until I fully get a grasp of this. I'm terribly sorry, as you must know, but I feel extremely, I don't know how to make it sound, disappointed that you would go without saying a word.'

'Besant, it's you, bloody bastard, where are you?

Wait, don't answer that, where am I?'

The sububrs.

'I tried looking for John somewhere in the archives buy I couldn't find him.

If he was with them since the conception of the band, you'd think they would've mentioned him somewhere.'

'They let him go half way in their professional career, after they became successful and you know, got that change in style musicians seem to go in once they start making money.'

A wild thing their whole deal was. No one would've expected him.

Most importantly a man appeared at John's house one day. He was an old friend, Mahogany.

They shared the pleasantries as he stood by him for a moment.

He seemed to be set on asking about the air-rifle set that hung around the room.

'This old thing, it's the doctor's order. He said something about trying to get it off my chest somehow, it's supposed to be antidepressant or some dumb shit like that.

They ever told you why I was thrown out?'

'Beg your pardon?'

'You came here to ask about the band, haven't you?'

'I suppose I have.'

‘They all do nowadays that they finally split up. Every now and then I wake up with some young man or some teenager knocking at my door, trying to get an autograph or paint some dumb smile on himself, and some queer eye.

And the only I can think about is how I’d like to smash his nose in for bothering an old man who’s.

Damn it.’

He stopped pacing around the room, his violent march only having picked up with what he was doing. He spoke about it eventually after being put on one of the beds.

He was a big man, solid but time doesn’t wait for everyone.

‘It’s that damn thing.’

‘The reason you’ve retired, what was it?’

‘You really want to see it, huh? You people just can’t mind your own business, can you?’

He finally come to pull it off, the patch. It was still there, right as he had initially gotten the description of it, the eye that was growing inside of him. Still filled with pus, still moving, having eaten part of his high cheeked bone, his eye as it drained most of his bodily strength. A few nurses were accompanied by a strange man who appeared to put the eye on some dormant state with the help of some heavy dosage he couldn’t always get his way through.

While asleep, John was caught in an endless dream, where he was stuck inside an airport, trying to wait for the next flight. And he always remembered it.

Having lived through this event several times; it was like a game for him. A woman was carrying a heavy load of explosives strapped around her chest. He knew who she was, and he had to stop her from getting to the plane. While, she was in after him; in actuality, the woman was trying to find and take him down; and he had little to no idea why he was the ones she was after.

He didn’t know whether or not she had been given a description of him.

But it felt like he was walking from one thing through another.

Got up from the seat inside the waiting area; right inside the room.

‘Twenty years I’ve toured with them and that’s how they fucking treat me. Tossed away like a fucking dog.’

Wearing a bullet-proof police uniform; but couldn’t find a gun. The other men refusing to give him one.

‘I served in the army as well, you know that?’

I’ve done my share, I fought for this country, I tried hard enough to make, and what I end up with? No pension, a probe in my chest and this thing lodged in my fucking eye.

So, if anything, I will do what I want to, and if I want to have my fun and shoot around some wild coyotes or some bottles, I'll do it. You won't stop me, you realize?

Now give me that damn gun before I pick something heavier, Bob.'

Standing in front of the girl; device around her ear.

Sometimes she seems to think John has something to him.

As if he can go back before the moment he's died; like an immortal lousily fat left let himself go, god of some kind. But as soon as she approaches, she takes a seat. John knows what's about to happen, that's why he doesn't even look her in the eye.

She's a short brownish hair with a fair tone, looks like she comes from a good family. Sad look in her eye, knows what's about to happen.

He wants to say something, he's tried it before, but every failure is an instant detonation.

John's ear cocks and turns.

Another failed attempt, out of the bathroom window, at the distance, long drop, one of the highest floor inside the airport. He knows that dropping off would kill him.

Someone alerts her from the distance, sees the microphone around her ear, her lips moving, then comes the light.

They're onto him, somehow, everyone's out to kill him. It must be the feds as well, it smelt of them and their involvement was stamped all over the place. Including her, an agent; got her ID after tacking her down, right as she entered the door, both arms pinned down, still goes off.

Wherever the trigger is, it's not on her. Must come from someone else, she's a plant, nothing more. She knows she had to die, but John knows that as well.

'It wasn't supposed to be this way, you know that?

I know I didn't anything wrong, I didn't slow down, I kept up the beat. I was there during every session.

And they never found a drummer as good as I was. I was a star, I was like, I was one of the greatest drummers of the decade.'

'Then why didn't you join another band? '

'That's because, it's meant nothing to me afterwards. I was only in the business for them, I only got there to begin with because of them. And with them gone, so had the magic of music.

Would you believe me if I told you that, I haven't listened to any music in twenty years?'

'That's definitely a lie.'

'Believe what you want, punk, but that's the truth.'

‘The radio was turned on when I knocked along your doorstep.’

‘I was listening to a podcast, nothing more. That’s not any music I’ve heard off.’

‘Fine; but surely you must’ve kept up with the news at the very least, right? Of them splitting off?’

He knew that there wasn’t any way out and he had tried it.

He’s seen too many people die to have it any other way.

Someone he’s entered opened the door to see himself walk straight out of his house, around the highway and on the road. Desperate to do anything needed in order to survive.

But turned around and she’s still there talking to someone as she’s readying herself to go through the motions.

‘Listen, you don’t have to do this girl, I’m giving you a chance.

You don’t need to die, see?

I could step off there, I could get run over by one of the trucks along the road, you don’t have to do this.

There’s no need for you to die. I know what’s about to happen, please, don’t do this.’

Still talking, reddened eyes, she was on the verge but was unsure if the distance would do it. Plus this time around there was no debris to fall on him. This was his chance to at least make it so she didn’t have to die. After spending so many times dying, waking up in the middle of the night, having the same dream over and over again, this was his chance to set it right.

One of the fed vans suddenly blew one of its horns. Right on cue, they took their time, flashes their lights a few times over and then. There was no bang.

John could not understand why it happened, always him. It always had to be him.

‘I’ve got no prospects, kid. I’ve never had, no one wants to take up on a washed-up drummer. Truth be told, I’m in debt, a huge loan taken a few years ago when I was still, you know. When I still had something to go on.

But soon I’m about to lose the house, kid.’

‘Is that what the luggage is for?’

‘I’m staying over with someone, he’s some old friend I’ve done business with, think you could keep this between the two of us?’

This was his chance. It would go different this way.

He had to wait, talk to her.

Find out her name, something might change.

Curl into a ball and cry as she approaches.

‘Don’t touch me, don’t touch me!’

Everyone’s staring, awkwardly, they’re trying not to make a scene out of it. Everyone starts waking away.

Eventually he finds out her name. Not mentioned.

Does something rash, start talking to her.

‘It doesn’t have to go this way, you know?’

‘Sorry, do I know you?’

She comes through the door, past the line, makes it half-way through the seats, John stands up, comes in, then simply grabs her by the shoulders. It doesn’t kick in yet. He looks around nervously not knowing what to expect; not many people are staring at him. He simply puts his mouth around hers, they tenderly kiss for what seems to be the good half of a few minute; she joins in. His arms slowly going down her back; he pulls away. The woman looks confused. Both of them are.

They get into the bathroom, enter one of the stalls. She starts pulling down her pants, but when he reaches around her chest.

‘Don’t. This stays up.’

‘All right.’

He does his best not to seem suspicious.

Pulls down his pants as well; they last a good few minutes like that, staring dead-straight in each other’s eyes. Then they hang down, lighting up a cigar. He initially refuses it, but takes it after, seeing how.

Both of them fall asleep in each other’s arms. There’s a janitor but avoids cleaning the bathroom that night.

She wakes up in the morning and looks at John, says there’s something she had to get rid of. They walk right out of the airplane. They live together, she never mentions the event after. A few years later she’s pregnant, a boy gets brought to live. John’s unsure, still afraid she might be deranged and do something to the boy.

There’s one day he remembers in particular when this kicks in.

They’re in a park, he’s trying to fend off a stray dog, standing between them. She’s standing in the back. As soon as he’s bitten he gets up. Always trying to do something in that fraction of a second; until he comes up with something, tearing off a piece of his shirt before he throws it away, the dog chases after for a moment thinking it’s food. John turns, grabs her and charged through one of the abandoned houses; dog chasing after them, there’s a door there; she’s having a laughing fit.

‘Cover your head!’

They push through, close the door, puts her down, then stare at one another for some time. Both of them laughing; they make love soon after.

That's what the suburbs were like.

A boy around fifteen walked around with his hand wrapped around a radio-machine while jerking around a semi-automatic while flashing a copy of his open-carry concealment print he wrapped around his chest. He drove a convertible around town and the cops didn't seem to notice one bit or to give much of an understanding to the youth that happened to gang around, during the recess time. Since that's what kids do. And before you knew it, they were joined in his car carrying modified automatic while doing whatever sort of hallucinatory gem they found along the ground, dropped by one of the bad neighborhood rats they happened to come by. Easy target, easy on the rocks, they said. Before they even knew what they were doing, it was already late. Having entered one of the rich folk's premise around Tassel, they were already neck in neck trying to make it the dark; their car drove right through, they were incapable of seeing right with their high dark jeans and hoods over their eyes, with the light beings turned off and the only means of looking around being nothing other than unloading every clip of the automatic the first person who came into view. Shot in the head from an eight ball, he didn't stand a chance. He walloped on his feet, with a cotton shirt-silk and a glass-milk bottle filled with broken blood, he came right though the Geisha wall, as he entered a room filled with rotting cadavers.

'Found the light switch.'

'Then what are you waiting for dumbass? Flip it off.'

'All right, don't fucking yell at me pipsqueak!'

He turned the light and they could all see that the old man was stacked. It must've been everyone in the neighborhood he killed with only one exception, them.

'We're heroes, this is great.'

'Yeah, we sure killed the murderer, and look, the bodies are fresh.

Could you believe it? We could've ended up as one of those corpses in the pile.'

'Or you would.'

Cried Robert, who finished reloading another chattel inside the pluck; momentarily aiming at one of the other fellas' as he checked the visor, tried the clicker, then made sure to pull back the safety once he was done.'

'You just fucking killed him, why'd do you it?

Wyatt was our friend.'

'Don't you recognize this place yet?'

Everyone turned, they gasped. In the whole ruckus they failed to realize that this was his father's house. They killed Wyatt's father. And Wyatt's father killed everyone in the neighborhood. Even the cops.

‘I think we should leave this place before someone blames us for it.’

Then the children left the premise, which fell over itself, like a demolition plant being smashed through, since there was no master of the house keeping it alive. Wyatt’s mother was crushed alive, her head finally smashed by the side of the roof which came on top of her, leaving a trail that split her throat, body, and her cunt as well.

Afterwards the kids were feeling daring.

‘I stole his wallet, you know?’

‘I took his ID.’

‘You know what this means boys?’

They were all smiling as they headed to the nearest liquor store. While in there, they showed up to the Clerk, showed him the ID and asked for blood-alcohol.

The Clerk came up with a few bottles, split-open every cap, slit his throat and bled into each bottle, after which he gave them the drinks before he fell on the ground and died. But they stopped, as a few robbers just came into the store.

They were hooded, they concealed their features way too finely, although not their skin-tone, which was obvious by their broken vernacular. One of them spat on the floor, which was rude.

More importantly the kids put their guns behind their backs. Bleak people, they leaped around the counter, completely ignoring the children as they busted open the cashier deposit, took eighteen dirty Washington’s that had been scattered around, having failed to fix the separators ever since a week ago he had spilt a cup of black premium coffee on top of it during one of his night shifts, they hardly kicked the clerk’s body before realizing he was bled to death, then simply made through the kids who hadn’t uttered a word and left afterwards with a bunch of pop-cherry drool-worth lollipops inside their mouths as to not look too suspicious while on their way out.

After taking a few magnets off one of the fridges, they left as well.

It was a rainy dad. In the sky; between the dark clouds, he was standing there, chained by the clouds, weeping upon seeing these vile acts. How his children were set on a path of destruction.

His wrists wriggled as hard as they could. They couldn’t be completely held back, as he tried his best to fight the impulses that entered him. If there was even a slight chance for him to escape, he knew that he would come down on them, only to make them suffer. To punish the children in such ways as no one might’ve thought it possible; beating the utter-living shit out of them, but alas he was trapped in there. His eternal prison; twitching with each lightning strike which marked his back, as his eternal punishment would never come to an end.

‘Hey Green, why is your father in the sky?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘Where’s your mom?’

‘Probably at home; probably in the pile.’

He was consoled soon after by the other children; whose parents shared the same fate. Not as his father, whose seemingly eternal pain would never come to an end. God knows what agonies were inflicted upon him, that he would do such a thing, as to deserve this kind of suffering.

Twenty more years spent in the gutter and a man could come to understand what entered them. It was a morbid state of never knowing where you are, that they could never draw away from.

Corner magician:

‘I shall perform a magic trick.’

‘That man just slit his wrist.’

And he pulled a bloody catfish out of it.

‘That fish is spitting out a sickle, get down, now!’

The children started running as the mad magician started hacking them around the air.

‘I’m going to kill you kids! I’m going to kill you!’

There was a big bloated bullhead in his chest, who started spitting blood-water, immediately staining his shirt just as he started getting momentum.

‘I am the God magician, I can’t be stopped, I can’t be stopped.’

They tried unloading everything on the man but he wouldn’t flinch, they bounced right off. He stopped to laugh at them.

‘I already cut your tires, dumb kids. There’s no escape.’

Soon enough they spread like a row of ants, trying to get themselves out of sight as soon as possible before being caught. It was close, he was always near, closing the door behind them, they hid inside the convertible, then leaped out of it as soon as he began hacking in the car.

He lunged and struggled squirming on the road like a feisty fish out of water.

‘Settle down, settle down.’

My lord, why are thou on the ground, struggling to breathe like a layman?

You are the king of fish, whom rules upon all. Why must you be humiliated in such a way?’

‘I cannot outrun you now, but at the very least I know what I am, I know what I’ve become. I chose to live the life of a man.’

He said to the giant fish which walked like a man on his tail.’

‘I chose this because I wanted to be a man.’

‘Is this what men do then?’

‘Mostly.’

Within a moment’s distraction, the king had already made it into the ground, through one of the sewer gates, growing out of an apartment door.

During dinner; a man was sitting at the table with his wife and child, they were eating profusely out of a little man, with a little conical-curved at the top tar-mold had.

It was flashing with a most peculiar dreadful color which almost blinded him as it happened. As awkward as it seemed, they were stopped, prevented from eating, mid-way fork inside the squirming thing, couldn’t make out whether there was something living inside of it, or not. They were reeling in, hoping he couldn’t go along and take him off their platter. Was this room-service? And where is your manager, he expected to hear. Although there was none of that yet, other than the initial shock; which, even it seemed to be less livid than what they were going for. But they didn’t. Damn fellows thought he must’ve fancied himself a strange rover.

There was a coat hanger the man pointed at.

‘Pick it up, will you?’

It was getting nastily cold, and at the very least, he could try showing up he cared.

Twenty chimes sang around the room. It was just how it was, counting them up.

They were standing in a strange room after all. And the man got up and he was but dreaming of better days. And they were greeted by a peculiar blighted figure, which was dressed in trash-bags with a pumping, many veined purple chest that was much more muscular than the rest of his body. And he had a giant horn coming out of it. His mouth was at the back of his eyes, split in half, chewing his prefrontal cortex; which only made him split more blood, until he got an aneurism. But he was loved. For he had lived in a castle of abuse, made out of peculiar infantile creatures, the growth of which was stunt. He wanted to kill children, but he couldn’t because someone chopped his hands. He was bleeding on the carpet now, merely looking at the family.

Aforementioned, although not, the room was pink, and there was an orange body painted groom who came to steal his wife from him, but this person was demented, pushing himself continuously between the two of them at the table, rolling on the dead little man, entering the cone, like it was a strange cave. For the little man was fat as a pig, and the man was tall and thin; although females only seem to like tall men, which is why she took a liking to him.

It was highly incontestable since they were unaware of what was going on. The scene was a travesty, their children were dead. All dead, all of them covered their eyes.

‘This kind of reminds me of something. Silence yourselves immediately, a kind is talking. I need to think, I just need to think for a moment.

I believe, wait, there are children out there I have to kill.'

And all of the sudden the God-magician looked at his wrist. He saw the fish taken out, he'd forgotten. He pulled off his shirt before the second headed fish could start talking again, as he had stumbled up and down, plain to see what was going around.

'You want me to do what now?'

'Who are you talking to? '

'The colors of the wall, you can describe them to a blind person and he will die. It's like poison to them, that's why they're covering their ears every time you start talking to them about it.

For the same reason, hey.'

'Hey? What?'

'I don't know.'

'You don't know what? Why blind people are being poisoned or?'

'I have to leave.'

Then he made it out the front door before he could witness the slaughter caused by the strange cherubian figure that had appeared. Before the twisted horn had completely splattered their entrails about the room, then everywhere around until they could not help themselves any longer but crawl through the cracks like little gut-roaches and little moths that had made it through. There were thread-curtains stretched behind the pillar framework which was said to have been taken from another world but that had never been confirmed since they feared and they bore the fear of blaspheming their lord ever since they had been given birth to.

'Dark birth, I witness thee.'

Said the servant who was waiting for me outside the apartment. For he had come to greet the King-magician, he bowed, and near him many fish on the floor, tuna as well as macrl, as much, many other akin to them.

But hear, her, hear he, he had but to taste the roof, he made it to the window in order to have a clean-clear view, a panoramic shot of the city. He saw the children making it for, and knew he had but missed the chance to have them. And he had gotten this close to killing them, that he started felling worse. Worsened by what happened around. He simply wanted to make amends with them, before they started committing more crime.

'Crime is a fishy business.'

'Still sleeping with the asphalt blocks?'

Asked the man across the hallway; both of them were wearing noir-hats, and they looked mightily, red. Because of the light; coming from the light. They stared at one another until nightfall. Where the noirlook became even more pronounced as the light-reflection but started spreading across the tapestry, where the most common pattern was the ten of hearts. And there was an actual heart beating in his chest that made him nervous. He knew this father figure which waited across the room, it was his father, but at the same time it was not. It was a fish, a giant one, wearing a coat, with the noir-hat, and he looked sad.

‘I know you’re not here.’

‘He is.’

The Cherubian figure’s horn had just split the door open with his chest-horn, then he proceeded to completely slice it like a certain figure with an axe from a long-before read novel of which little to know about details were much forgotten, yet at the same time he didn’t shout.

He simply walked around and patted the figure on its shoulder if it had one and left.

The Noir was decrepit.

With the falling over tapestry he saw the innards of bell-rust formations put there. Bloodied with some acidic tar he didn’t consider licking until now, they were dirty, he had to clean them, like floors. Always him walking on them; always him crawling like a bug out, with the same head-skull.

‘Damn you, I need to leave, I have to get those children before they flee.’

‘And why do you need to do that?’

‘It’s in my blood now, they’re in my blood, they’re in my mind, they’re the only ones that showed me any attention and because of that, I know they’re the ones I’m destined to kill.’

‘Why is it that every time there’s something exciting going on in your life, you have to slaughter it?’

‘Because I don’t want to become an entertainer for children, that’s all. I want to walk along the peoples, I want to be appreciated, I want to make something of myself, like, like.’

‘I?’

‘Of course, or not you, but something better, something else, something that’s myself, but I can’t get rid of it if I they’re the ones searching for me, if they’re the ones who are interested in me.’

‘Have you considered changing your act then? Perhaps not punishing their child-like curiosity perhaps?’

‘I haven’t, but they didn’t even show that much attention to begin with. Come to think of it, they merely just, turned a corner of their eyes, flipped their tails, and might’ve looked in my direction.’

‘You’re over-reacting then.’

‘I can only do what I can.’

‘No one’s going to punish you for doing what you love.’

‘Then, should I simply return to performing on the streets?’

‘Do what you want, you’re the king, well not anymore, at least not in your kingdom; the next man stepped and came in line.’

The king also remembered the time he was a child. And what he liked doing. I like colors, I like colors, I like colors, I like colors, he thought. He really liked colors a lot.

Don’t shy away from your responsibilities, the father attempted whispering from the other side of the room, hardly the matter as it were, he’d done it. It was plain to see.

‘It won’t make a difference if I return or not.

You should know better why I act this way.

Monarchy is a dying disease, it’s not being destroyed, it’s a rotten horse, a carcass that’s been beaten for far too long.’

‘And the alternative is better?’

‘I don’t know, maybe, maybe not. But it’s undeniable that it had its place in time, it served its purpose.’

‘Men are more corruptible if they are grown.’

‘Men can also be made.’

‘It’s a lot harder when there are too many people involved.’

‘As oppose to someone born into it?’

‘What do you want me to say? There’s no system that will work, it’s not the system at the base of it, it’s the man.’

‘Then who’s to say that the proper man might not be a monarch?’

‘Who’s to say it might not be one that is elected?’

But it was wishful thinking, trying to put every right man in the right spot, at the right time, just so everything would fit precisely as one wished it to. It went beyond wishful thinking, it was fanatic.

‘That’s the right term, you’re a fanatic.

You’re acting as if you’re still a king, but this is not the place to do it.

Can’t you see that you’re doing far more damage than anyone in your place would’ve done, with your power, with your upbringing; but not in a place like this.’

‘I’m only chasing a few children, I only mean to teach them a lesson.’

‘About what and who are you to impart that on them?

In this realm you’re not a king, you’re not human, you wear a sickle, you can only destroy. You can starve, you can force people beg, work them to death, drag them over, for what?’

‘Fish live better because of it.’

‘Fish aren’t the only people that live on this earth.’

‘Fish are to be treated rightly.’

‘But fish are just a small minority of all men. We live in the land of man, you need to act like man, you need to settle for the rules of man. You cannot be both fish and man.’

‘I can, if it’s within my choice.’

‘And look what you’ve done because of it.’

He merely shook the door over from where the Cherubian had departed. It was a bloody scene, as that of a crime, a butcher’s woe, that was clean one blink, then dirty again after another. That was something he didn’t want to admit to himself, yet he was partially responsible for it. And he could not deny it any longer.

‘So, what now?’

‘What now indeed? You move on, find those children and apologize for them, perhaps try.’

‘No, I’m only going to attempt gaining their trust, you know that.

You know what I’m like. I was raised with a crown.’

‘Only to live on the streets doing magic tricks; what does that say about you?’

‘What does that say about you father?’

Psh, fine, I’ll think about it.’

Then he leaped out of the window and stole a car, punched through the window by its side, then leaped inside. Played with its stingy wires, as if they were made of silver, not of gold, then he but messed with the rear-side mirror pearls, and started off the high-way, bold.

Bold move, nice chauffer; if he wore a pair of sunglasses this would’ve been a fair he was in, but he didn’t want to talk of it, at least not when in the presence of the dames. A lot of them present after dark, in the light, he just realized. I must’ve spoke to my dad all night.

Alas, there came a time, between them spared.

Out of nowhere, there came a man, as if appeared from some site. From which utmost benign he were, knocked on the window, drawn down, cracked as it were he stared at him. Driving must’ve been extremely uncomfortable for him. As to have a fish with a sickle wrapped underneath it. Not to interfere with the way the wheel was worked, but mainly, it was distracting looking beyond it, and looking anywhere else as a matter of fact. This man was queer as well, too quiet for his taste, he could eat his face.

‘I am a man.’

‘Go on.’

‘I’ve come to the realization, ah-ha, that I can only remember images. I cannot remember anything of which I read. I can only remember what I see, in my mind.’

‘Get out of my car.’

‘No.’

And then they drove.

When had he entered? I don’t know.

They were both in search of the children now, as they were in need to be taught a lesson no man should impart on an insufferable child without realizing that he risked too much abuse for it to be acceptable. It was dreadful, bizarre. They were staring at neon-signs, like Neon-Tessy. It was a high-futuristic sight, driving around the highway, around the tall beings and the short buildings they were drawing near. Stumps, bloody stumps with little top-rotating saw-blade shaped umbrella-like curved on top rain-catchers, which converted water into life-fluid, put through torture-device strung-together uncanny leper-shaped heaps of bodies which had been cut as to create an iron maiden device shape, through which the life-fluid was put through. It was done, they were smelly. The people around because they were criminals, and criminals don’t wash; they need to be washed by the hands of justice. Which is abuse; a man cannot be abused. He is the abuser, even when pain is inflicted upon him, for he is made out of stainless steel, he can brush it off. And if he can’t, he’s not a man. And if a man is not a man, then he doesn’t belong to this world. That’s the machines could never understand. It’s because machines are not men, machines can only imitate. Although even imitations are still a step above women; in which case, machines are somehow pseudo-human by default; turning machines into pseudo-men by their very nature of not being women. A female voiced machine would only be a deviant in that case. And no one like deviants, just as no one likes high-pitched sounding men.

The torture rows changed with the town, it was a consumption that no one could’ve ever accounted for obvious reasons. Once the tiredness of rows awoke, there were days which parasitically started decaying on top their rain-coats.

‘Found the children.’

‘Thank you, thank you, thank you, thank you. I thought I would’ve. God, thank you.’

‘But I thought you were God, Fish-magician.’

Before he could come up with some witty line, it was, slit. The kid recognized them. Both out the window as the little shits unloaded everything they had, completely just riling the car, which immediately exploded everywhere around, until it became a little river of hellish-junkyard leftovers, still burning, as it was finally put down by a giant large carpet-shaped, forty five by twenty three meters, with the girth of a fat man’s BMI of over one hundred and fifty, split its belly open from which poured a swimming pool of water, which put down the fire immediately. They made it in time, before they could be caught, right in the nick of time, hiding in some backyard of some long-forgotten building that fell over. It was one of the hollow on the inside buildings where the first floor was the flat roof-top of the building, while the last floor as well as the basement was well beyond, far deeper than where it stood sewers, as to approach a drop's worth into the bowels of the ground where no discernible life was to be found.

A peculiar thing lived there, almost twisted in concrete and peculiar growths, yet one shape could be recognized in it, that of the giant bullet which had grown; spread around, completely out-casting itself everywhere else, only to have kept its insatiable growth-commodity in there. And she was there. As if woken up, inside the body of a fat-lumped exposed giant body, a glutton of which, even the facial features were rolled over and put on top of one another, he was her ship, through which she dreamed, but this was a nightmare, and there was no escape for her teeth.

One should've come to the realization that these were no dreams by any means, but funnels that melted through the ground, appeared out of nowhere as they molded themselves to look like the most uncanny things. Weird shapes on every wall, puking the insides of the lobes they mixed and stabbed. Yet she was different. Lurid's mind was unmixed. For what could be said at the very least, she broke through the wall, and the first thing that came to her mind was the uncanny thing that laid in front of them. An unrecognizable beat-in the head abomination of a man. He was strange, he was really strange. Upon being meat by this greasy mold, this tall thing which broke through the building, it was not brought to an immediate act of terror. Instead, he simply offered It a cigar. And there was also the peculiar fish coming out of his wrist which was peculiar. Untouched even, or too touched, put through. Made to eat from around the zone; they were at home, growing in.

They also brought him a lot of shots, the people whom were around. The flesh giant but took what he could as he started pushing through town. It was strange, he wasn't understood, that's when everyone started hunting him around. Before the fire, before the little camp he made around It, before it could be put down, he woke up with a mass of people, all armed. All unloading what they could on him for what seemed to be the good half of a half an hour, then they left as they came, as quickly fading as they realized that it was pointless. But not before those giant meaty fleshy hands grabbed a few men and swallowed them through. The sounds only burst through even harder once you listened to the chambers be unleashed inside its guts.

'It's twenty-twenty.'

But they didn't listen, it's was the lower-lowers where they rested at.

Strange house of green tumors, producing green gas, bubonic mass of peasants gathered round, they worshipped the being.

And with every second it was there, this smoke machine changed between orange, green and red, then spread even father until every iteration of those could be seen mixed in the air. The neighborhood was clean soon after, before the blood splatters could be seen again. And a bunch of niggers even seemed to be disturbed by the folk who appeared yet again with their high-troughs and forks, ganging on them as they were pushed in the other direction. Further in the distance, where there was no one else playing their fiddles or toying with their ploys. They hunted the dark cannibals, and drove them into the darkest pasts of the streets, into an open pseudo cocoon formation where they all rotted away, where their big noses and giant lips and ugly skin mixed together into hardening pools, chewing one another like negroes usually do. Incapable of collecting and helping themselves without other men's due.

It was how they died, they were their own cause and they only spat themselves out.

They were rotten and put to death as soon as the sun rose. Violent animals didn't deserve to live. Violent animals but ate one another on a whim.

It was a dark day no one wanted to speak about.

When the cages appeared in the air, before their fall, on the ground and everywhere else, they were damned if they couldn't recognize them any longer; long-tooth and little eyes, it puked on top the city before it fell and crushed itself between eight buildings. The half-rotten giant then crawled between the buildings. Eighteen carvings in the shapes of men then came out of its body, then eighteen more, then millions of them, then before anyone could make out what they were, they already captured a great part of the city, it was theirs. Smoke-dogs and shot-in-the-head wallpapers were their animals and their apartments were colored green.

'Jonathan Beddings, wake up now.'

'What? What is it? '

'You're going to live with someone from this point on.'

'With who?'

'With him.'

The landlord pointed at the peculiar creature that had been given birth from the half a giant. It was taller, bore no limbs, wasn't humanoid and destroyed everything in its path. It had no eyes, it looked deformed and barely recognizable by any means, it moved on a tail and most of the things it did were bashing his head against every wall, constantly, then against him.

Beddings lost an arm because of it, and an eye.

'I hate you, I'm going to kill a child.'

Then he followed through and came out of the house as the hunt had finally began, while he had been armed with nothing but his teeth. He had a knife.

First child that came into view was deformed and he was lynched in bottles, where his head was being melted in, and every bottle was tied and gripped around each neck, then they were shattered with each shot, then they ate them, the other children, whom were gods.

But all of the sudden, a jealous creature appeared out of nowhere and it said.

'We can't all be gods, because then there won't be no gods.'

He took them by chance before they could even recover from the drowsiness that forced them to succumb, and they were caught by the sickle, then fell on their knees, they were killed. Were they gods? Probably not, he didn't see it.

'Now I think I'm satisfied, although these aren't the child-gangs I was looking for, those must still be somewhere around, I think.'

'I'll kill you too fucker! I was the one supposed to kill them.'

But the boy got his mouth shut by force, he shouldn't have spoken, he's done it too soon. It wasn't likely he was ready, but he was beaten.

In the blimp, there was quiet.

Outside of it, the rotten-battered.

There was a boy.

Today I was called.

I was supposed to go after a lady and help her carry some groceries from point A to point B. It all went fine, until I realized that I was chasing the wrong lady.

'You see now, all people look the same.

All of them, without exception; that means something, doesn't it?'

'I think I know what you mean.'

'Indeed, I was messed with, I am cursed. I am cursed. My sight is diluted by evil; I cannot distinguish one person from another.

And the lady I was chasing after over a few stops? In which I fully waited for her to turn around and look at me, she must've thought I was a thief or something.

Luckily for me, I turned around and went back to point A. I had to, it was a gamble, since I'm too shy to ask whether or not she was the lady I was supposed to pick up. Not only that but I've known this lady for over twenty years. She's my neighbor, but I cannot, for the likes of me manage to recreate her in my mind. But then I recognized her in the distance.'

'So you're not completely cursed.'

'Not exactly, but, I am. At the same time, I think I am.'

They were settled on as much.

Think of it, if I pull you from the device, you will die, friend. I'm not going to tell you this, but I'm going to pull off the cord.

He stood there, a friend near another, they were both considering as much. Thinking, talking, not inserting the little black hooks deeper into the open area around his gut; they weren't inside the hospital branch, but a single platform, open-wide, black in the surroundings. There were black days that followed through. It was never easy trying to eat, and draw from their vile reeds. It was easy, it was hardened, there were dark days. It was easy, they went after, got accustomed, it was hard to see. It was easily the last and only way out; a little pin-gun in each other's mouths. A few men but standing around the blackness of the side pools they were desperately trying to enter in.

Their feet reached the ground. It was blasphemous. It was what happened after, when the realization came. Too much time was being wasted, too many wretched laces.

'There's a cop waiting outside the room.

We need you to talk to him. Do you think you could handle him over a couple of minutes?'

'I think I can.'

'Then do it, I'm not going to ask you a second time.'

They made it through, they listened to one another's heart beats. He got awkwardly close, too close for comfort. It was something neither of them realized just then. They were trying one another, then one stepped in.

'Mir, I need you to describe what the killed man looked like.'

'I thought you said only the cop.'

'And the sketch artist, try to keep up, will you?'

He was sweating, profusely. It was just the thing that happened. When one put a finger and a bobber; hymning all around.

'He had a nose and a wide face, wild eyes, and a peculiar smile. I don't know, I think I can remember him, but if I were to see him on the street. Well, it's strange.

I think I can see him in front of my eyes, he's in there.

It's hard to explain. And when I see him standing in front of me, as if I met him again on the street, it's. I know it's him, but at the same time I don't know whether or not it is him. I mean I don't know whether or not it's some stranger that looks like him because it happened for me to approach a stranger and find out it wasn't him.

But I don't know whether or not it is that person; you know what I mean?'

'Sketch him then.'

They gave him the sketchpad. He tried drawing. He drew a hand-fish.'

'I see great thing coming ahead, in your near future. Just stay.'

Stay along, and don't move too often. It was what they wanted him to do. Cook in the plain-stove to which they attached him to. He was constantly being pumped into by it, for what they burned was the mass of meat taken from the ones that didn't make it through; It was something agreeable. Nice to see.

One of the first friends he had, coming from inside one of the school yards, who had been a fireman's grand Admiral Fleet descendant Grand P. Bath, started knocking on the door, inviting himself in, before he stared at the untidy room, remarking the fact that the nurses and the janitors had done a condemnable job trying to clean the room while he was in. He gave him a sedative he shot at the side of his head, grazing in as it went through the side of his ear, through the bed as it made its way through the floor beneath him where other patients depended on a life-liquid glass-basin that was placed on top the ceiling, being connected to their insides through various tube-funnels, before realizing what had happened, it was late because that liquid was already spilled. They tried getting over the beds and leaping on the floor as they were in a dire need of licking the spilt fluid but, seeing how they were prevented from doing it by the rails that stood between them and the floors, they simply wrapped their hands together and had a group prayer as they awaited their death, which followed in the span of fifteen seconds. They were heard but plainly ignored, as both Cook, the childhood friend and him, Bread-ly, made it through the door, then out of the world where they finally took a deep breath of air and relaxed. Life was short, the car they drove in was a convertible.

I do not know who this man is, yet I am intrigued.

He simply came out of nowhere and kidnapped me. But I supposed everyone is pleased I'm gone, so that makes it right.

There is no place for me in this world.

'Can I tell you something?'

'Shy-away.'

He put his gun away.

'I do not know who I am. I do not know what my place in this world is. I don't what I am, I don't know what my personality is supposed to be; I am blank slate. But there's nothing else I could fill myself with.

Know what I'm saying.'

'I can't say I do. What do you want from me kid?'

'I want to know, where we're going.'

'To the facility.'

'Ahhhh.'

'Inside the hospital; where we shall fix you.'

It was what the strange man said; so it was true. Therefore, that was the word of God for the child, as he didn't know any better than that. IT's what evil people, they don't listen, they lied, they turn away from the true word of God, and that's how there's evil happening in the world. He never found what that criminal did to anger those cops. He only half-flayed his face and made tiny mounts across him so he could home orphan maggots in him. But that wasn't him, it was the man in the stove. That's the story the man living in the stove told him, yet. He thought he must've been the man in the stove, or at least he would be the man in the stove from now on. Because he didn't know who else he could be and there was no reason for him to see or find out about anything else. His fingers were then broken by a wrench. That's how he knew this would be a great day.

Life is complicated for children like him.

He could sometimes see the core and want some more.

They stopped for gas and that's where he saw her, the first woman she ever laid eyes on which wasn't his mother. She was strange and he was afraid. Women are frightening creatures. They are weird creatures, not in the same way minorities are. But that kind of weird-weird, the unexplainable kind of weird, as in, if one were to look and observe one for a long period of time, he would not know what to say to her, or about her. And odd being, like a trumpet tank shooting nuclear-submarine missiles, making the tank really big, and bulky and a bad choice, on a field of battle. And a big target on top of that.

Women are more like tanks than anything else. There's texture to them, but an untrained man with an untrained eye may never understand them. He's not an engineer, and they're not as easy to break apart as one might come to see it as. A woman has large legs that are connected at the soles of their feet with their back-bones, like the rolling bands of a tank. They are employed during war, for soldier to use. Both the enemy and the allies; yet it's fair. Because back home, those soldier's wives are also employed by other people. War is a transaction that way, and women may as well be a trading system between the nations and the powerful. It's what women are.

But here, in this gas station, this isn't a war-zone.

'This is a war-zone.'

And multiple men live inside a woman. But multiple women cannot live inside a man. That man is evil in that case and evil men bring terror, and terror brings weakness and weak knees. That is how the world is the world, is made. The world is but is world, of this world.

'The world is the world, is but of this world, this world.'

'I bought you a cone of ice cream.'

'Thank you sir.'

And then they drove on.

It was a peaceful day, spent on the road. It was nice, it was great change of pace, in some way. For everyone involved; for both parties, they were extremely glad there was no cloud separating the skies any longer. That was one of the hard things you'd get out of moving from one state to the other. You always got to the people, but never got used to the weather, since it reminded you of what you lost. When you were back home; I missed the clothes.

‘The weather, I missed the weather.’

‘Ah?’

‘Did you say something?’

‘Are you making fun of me?’

‘No, I’m sorry.’

It was awful. It was a perfidious kind of weather that made everything look even worse than before. No one like it, there was dread in the sky and everywhere else, there was possible explanation for this feeling of whatever else came along.

People are made out of skin, they shouldn’t. Although that may be, perhaps one of the bigger human organ there is, it shouldn’t. Someone should flay it and fill the sky with billions upon billions upon billions of dead people’s flayed skin. To fill it morosely only so they could understand what’s it like being human. Once the silence came, they were brought in. Rotten as it were, a giant of smoldering meat followed through as if it were nothing more than some uncanny creature with no other desire than that. It bore itself forward, trashing around the place.

‘Jade, there’s jade in the trees.’

‘Gems, I like gems, they’re so pretty.’

‘Blood gems are of the most precious kind, kid.

They may not be as precious as real gems, yet they are made of coagulated blood. You need those blood gems.’

‘Why?’

‘Because they’re blood.’

‘I need them.’

And they stopped near a stop sign, near the soap-opera in the woods, incapable of seeing what had been trailing them for the last few hours, without even being capable of compromising with the machine. The machine listened, it was the one in charge of the woods.

Placed upon its entrance as a guardian, making it seem like the forest was but close to being distraught; as it feared, with every passing moment, as if machines could fear by possible mean; it dreaded being itself.

They didn’t listen much to anything. It was hard as it was. Neither of them, of the people who were present there had any strength left in their bones.

There were singers no one wanted to acknowledge by any means, as they were less benign than the matter would allow one to feel it. They were dreadful, always trying to outdo one another, the opera singers.

‘Men cannot make the difference between a frog and a rock, that’s where the forgeries are coming from?’

‘Interesting, then why do you reckon I can see a sea of bullfrogs leaping around now sir?’

‘That just means you’ve yet to become a man yet, kid. That’s all. You shouldn’t take it to heart kid, but I suppose young folk will do what young folk knows the best, I wager.’

He took it for granted at the very least. And in front of him, a sea of leaping rocks, no water.

The guardian of the forest; it was a peculiar being that always seemed to be present there for some reason or another, like some head light belonging to some abandoned building that refused to go away. The driver having long left the car, reeling in for the others; being content with a few rocks being put inside of it. That, he didn’t like. Since it went into it; the territory of the machine, that box was singing and mowing through the most uncanny things all day, he reckoned it had. And they were only trying their fingers here and there, for no more than a few seconds before they figured it would eventually step out and say something to either of them.

It didn’t come that often for someone to reckon a machine like it, fancying itself a man.

But it took no pride into it and before long, it had run out of pets to mess around with. Sure, there was plenty of leaping rock, although the guardian of the forest had missed the conversation. Sure there were the people inside the opera, the actors, the baronesses, as well as the guests, but they never seemed to live the opera, which only left to the occasional vagrant who was more or less, rather, scanty for its tastes.

‘Well, you’ve stepped into my forest.’

Said the machine; it looked pale, the iron-wrought fired-forged thing said. It looked like a giant elongated bullet that had been beaten by a forge hammer until it had become somewhat dry punish, twisting itself at it came out of the ground, with a great coiling tail but coming out of the other. It stood there nonetheless, trying to fancy itself the company. There wasn’t much to focus on it, other than the droopy things that formed their waves, and their fallen-through, much to his dismissal features that were theirs. It was too clean, too clear. It never shoved itself through dirt. There was no callous, no scar, no injury at all.

‘What’s this fancy noise I keep hearing now, that direction over there?’

‘Wouldn’t you like to know?’

I suppose for a fair fare, I could let you in.’

‘And how much would that be?’

‘A short period of time, company, I want either of you to stay here with me while the other goes inside. The entry is free of charge, but I require to talk to someone and.’

It then noticed the giant of skin behind them. It was, rather, peculiar.

They were both unheard of from that point on.

If there was something, even remotely approachable, it was it, that peculiar creature, wherever it stood, where to be placed, little more than worn around, closer to it, and put into the ground.

‘I remember coming into this place, somehow.’

‘I beg your pardon?’

‘Don’t mind me.’

It was the buffoon, he didn’t.’

They spoke as such, and merely carried on, they were bent on it, yearned to find out what they were after, where to push and what to pull, what entered their heads soon after, was emptiness. Gritty and dry, it was there for some reason, and either man would remember her open and try.

‘It happened earlier in my apartment, I was in my home.’

‘But you were missing.’

‘I thought someone was in.’

He saw the giant dog tied by the least, and kept still. It was enormous, one couldn’t deny that. And Jim only went out for a bag of chips. He knew something was wrong, but rung around the ears, like he was, he started doing something, something he didn’t think before he’d done it. He got on his four and began barking like a dog, who immediately heard it, burst through the door, having ripped off his least, went around the living room, just as Jim followed the mutt, then exited off the balcony, only to disappear completely from the scene.

‘Where?’

But he didn’t ask, as he merely turned around, made his way back to the door, then found him sitting in the same place, unmoving. Weird thing.

‘Why are you doing this?’

‘Why are you barking?’

The dog asked. It was disturbing, trying to make out an accent and all.

It dashed away from its spot and waited at the threshold. Its eyes were as thick as Jim’s hands, perhaps a lot wider as well, which served as a testimony to how tall it was. A tongue to the side, it talked through the giant crack he left in the frame.

‘Aren’t you going to invite me in?’

‘After everything you’ve done?’

‘Is there a problem now?’

‘No, of course now, get yourself in, I don’t mind.’

It dashed in past him, without bothering itself to wait for Jim. It stood on his chair, yet it was different than before. Slender, tall, almost a feminine figure he seated himself next to. It was Unica Zürn. He remembered buying some stills of her from one of the low-lives he used to regulate around the corner of the street, when his neighborhood was in a shamble, as a result of many of the men having enlisted themselves in the draft, having fought in the war, died for their country, leaving a huge gap, it was huge, to be filled. They came live vultures and they sold pictures of her, and only her, no one else. It was peculiar, but he never questioned it. He'd come to idolize her, although Jim didn't know anything about the woman. He simply stared at her, then, he turned towards the screen. It was an old movie, a few adults were looking after a bunch of children who were supposed to cross a damn which was fully encompassed with water. It was hard, trying to make out what they were saying over Unica's incessant barking. She pulled out a knife and stabbed Jim in the throat soon after. Both of them bled and died.

Both of them bled and died.

Yet, during their haste, their spirits were but reborn and lost as soon as they could breathe away. Into another world.

There were no more cords attached, it moved all along, creating small pouches of skin in which it walked through as it swept along through rows of bashed in by fists entrails that had formed the great head of the main-device that was being operated upon. Twenty tables were constantly rotating around it as they would constantly create little blind rotten flying heads that would puke out heat as to boil the little men surrounding them alive, as they only hardened higher and higher until all of the sudden they began losing control. Some pest-people with no legs were there, refugees of the Pest war. And many iliac-peculiar tottering rotten creatures had died those days, with all of their unnamed deities, and most peculiarly the most tormented of the highway killer who had given birth, upon slitting their guts to the Erpyot-Cvar the man with one hundred heads, all being attached to motorcycle-like stretched out necks that had penetrated his back instead. He was the kind leper, or so was he called during mad days where he could not for the likes of him realize what the time had was.

To his employ there were eight trusted people, whom were in his confidence.

Near him there stood a most peculiar broad by the name of Ophelia, tormented human that she was, she had brought a peculiar set of knowledge with her which had rotten every existing stone that had been attached to her, which were shaped like meat-oysters with little blunt spikes.

Upon their sight, as they worked upon the rising main device, they were greeted by many rising structures from the ground, which were the main structure of some good to hold palace of worship that had been wildly spread upon the realm, completely shattering and destroying the fragments of air below the substance-like trail they left behind.

They were highly roofed and wore made outlandish growths, like desert-plants which encrusted themselves at to point upwardly in the air. And they bore many bridges, many gates, many wings and many peculiar hand-like arm stretched formations that ended up into peculiar spherical head-shaped open mouthed protrusions that, upon opening their maws spat long deformed horns that appeared to devour everything that came upon their touch. Everything was deformed, many spikes appeared to bear upon them trails of blood that made the tower-esque figures bleed some more.

A peculiar dark creature emerge, riding upon a steed that had no head but another steed's throat attached to its end which could only pace in circles, until it tired itself. During the confusion, the steed would finally walk the way the creature wanted.

And that creature was Epyot'hn, whom bore himself much forwardly benign. With peculiar tricks, contorted hips, he opened his mouth and would reveal a heat that came out of the hood. For good fortune to which his dire tongue was barely understood. It opened itself in the back, sutured falling, then was brought. A most peculiar skin lancer, whose body was but a distraction, a tumor growing from the man; it wanted to be there, in the air as well. It appeared again. He was in front of them.

Opening a peculiar mouth formed out of cuts, from which fingers came out, opening slightly, there coming out a strange large diamond-end red and mightily flashing as well. It appeared to be talking, backwardly, but they understood him.

'I am bloated, I need to drink. I need something from you.'

'Call it and it shall be given.'

'You see that tower over there? Are you afraid of what might lay in it as well?'

'What do you want from it?'

'A great engine-sword that might complete the gun-truncheon that I might come to be set on flight, upon this fidgety thing I call out of sight. I need it to reach the exit.

I need something that might guide me forth.

I need to see one of the darkly figures that wait for me upon me being brought home.'

For what was worth and what they asked of him. They were worn up-lists put on their chests, the stone-flesh giants being worn and bearing the giant-skinned sheep-lamb formations, the casts inside their heads being uncannily distraught as to not be brought to any of their torn-apart reigns. As soon as they were followed through, out of the casts, which rang as true, they were but fashioned of skin benign. A few champions of leeches were but brought to life as soon as they could be.

Large and armed, with little nail-like protrusions, always feeding upon one another's throats, they joined him in the jointed Morgue and hadn't spoken of it until then. It was benign, too torn apart, they saw this world through peculiar kaleidoscope-cracked through eye-formations. Large as they were, these tank-fat lards, truck-in shape, upon their body-handles stretched darker heads and pushed-out heaps with many beds of skin with long teeth-like pointers that were heaps of many blades had but stretched from their foundations and attached to many men, they brought back. Food that might be put inside, torn apart as to devour, and spread the rivers of red coagulated flowers; before the hour could even come, they were brought back and they would feel their guts wrung out.

But the creature asked again, and the explorers only followed then, through the stairs and through the cases all the broken, swollen faces were but caught by themselves. Many followed through and were but put down, in the seas of sinew.

As much was settled to be called upon, so they found the engine blade which had been a spear of gut-shaped unnatural beings that were barely put together and were shaped like weird anomalies of barely shaped primitive chipped walls that were barely put through and would look as if they would be lost if seen through as well as what they formed. Upon their wide-spread long wings there was nothing shoved inside of them any longer as they were brought about the hour before they were allowed to walk again.

It just so happened that the creature attached this peculiar device to its back, immediately flying wherever he pleased, as if it would disappear and appear again and again where it wanted, only to have to the portal, where finally it sounded the alarms of the passing.

The time had been set, and what enacted it to come upon the world, was the hour of the execution, when a dark wind was felt by each man inside the belligerent country, all at once, as they were but incapable of helping themselves, all worn out by the many hours that had been spent eating each other's reflections which was how they were fed.

Such grim engines appeared. In a single place as to disturb their nearing the coming; as much as a strange as he had been, the man in front of him, Joaquin stood near the dame, again walking as if poisoned, he had looked like him as well. Though it was hard and even harder to do, too harder to make out who or what he was, harder than anyone might've expected him, to settle through. A most peculiar being having followed through this escape plan, as if the mere act of flight had contorted one of the maddest most peculiar portals that could ever have been founded, through the wings of sky, which had been cried upon, they finally appeared where they had to be, no longer put to wait and die. They were fat like potato-fields wrapped together, eight rolls that are put around one another, incapable of doing anything else. Growing in each other's guts, in their insides, where they danced with most peculiar unnatural head-strong tendons which rose and formed, darker hornet-like shapes through the long peculiar scepter like pushers began giving birth to large formations of bloated shooters that would one day inherit this world. This living device, this peculiar thing that couldn't be explained, this disease would not stop until the world was in its veins. It moved precariously until it could not help itself but leap away. Every now and then it leaped about the placed, eating men, when all of the sudden it opened out. A large skin-crystal metallic formation shot highly-calculated limbs that stretched and pushed everywhere they could until they could no longer help themselves but record everything they would, everything that was within their stretch, and everything they could wrap their hands around until not even the likes of a dead man could deal with them any longer, as they spoke of the most precarious evils of the world, this strange device. One hardened hand in particular made the long-stretch across the street, bending around the long mine, kindly knocking on one door, as it was allowed in, upon having entered the premise, it knocked off every single jewel and every glass case, the finely crafted and wildly fashioned false eyes and the diamond man who shattered and die off the cradle. And they mourned for the diamond man, for he had been killed too soon for his own good and he was dead and they had carried him away into one of the darkest dens, into one of the darkest falls humanity had ever suffered going through. Upon a cemetery made out of tombs and coffins, most of which being cracked, chipped and shattered as people needed more space in order to bury their sons and daughter and each of their dead fellows, finally being allowed piece. Yet many corpse parts could be seen just about everywhere around the place until they couldn't help it any longer since they were but incapable of making out what had happened there. Since after a few hours a lot of the corpses appeared to have completely coagulated and have become the most uncanny of the trenches, which were used to give birth to the dark birds. And the dark birds were giant and were made out of corpse soil, that is to say that it wasn't a real soil, but some uncanny thing made out of disease rotten corpse parts that had been grinded together, which were carried to the plains of another planet beyond the world in which the killers of humanity, the gut-wrought peculiar men lived in. And they, of evil deed, as they had known, lived inside huts with uncanny robes made out of made-together wives that were brought on from the most distant placed of the world, having been forced to eat their children from their way on, only to have been sutured into ritualistic robes these Vile-killers employed in order to make their bodily-maligned plans to go on as they were called upon, no longer being capable of hearing, as their dark crowns were but taken hold, and had stolen their eyes, which were pointed in every direction. With them having worn millions of them, but then, upon the hour, where peculiar black roses appeared out of their empty gullets and most disturbing looking empty sockets, they formed a few lines that were shaped like eighteen finely crossed v's that had barely been put together, only to have begun chanting over and over again until they could not help themselves but chant again, for they had summoned a weird peculiar creature which had been rotten for billions of years before it came before them. Amohrs was but there, in flesh and bone between them, as to have been made on the spot. It flashed in and out of existence and would only be brought to the darkest knowledge by himself upon having realized that he was given something to be fed on. He had been utmost darkened days that refused to go along and when the portal from beneath the facet of the planet fully opened, another one was summoned by another pair which pulled him back while the first one opened as well, ripping him in half as these vile killers laughed at him. Angered by this act, Amohrs but spat a giant hole on the ground, levitated towards his lower-cut body half, as it neatly reattached itself back in place. Then he went on to grab as many of them, and squished them into his black-purple palms, his eight maws shaped, his exposed eye-brains but puckering as they boiled the air, him having only a deformed fetus trunk-tail with many shapes coming out of his as well as sweeping long tin-like coils that came out, eating what they could off the ground. It popped out of existence and appeared into one of the towers, where the experiments were taking place. Inside these strange chambers there laid some peculiar vale-shaped bunker top heads which began growing from place, revealing many test-like peculiar trap-like cages where they kept the most unnatural animals they were shoving pins inside of. Their eyes had already been liquefied by the time he had arrived, having reduced his size as to match that of the scientists and the vets that were responsible with killing the animals in the first place; at the very least those who had failed surviving the initial experiments.

‘What shall we do about it?’

Then upon the realization that he wasn't in the initial tower and the peculiar location that had once been settled before, this peculiar being only realized that there was nothing it could grab from the wild surroundings as to realize where it stood.

There was no joy in that place, which only made him leave as soon after, as to enter some peculiar groove where he would be at peace, at least for a good enough amount of time. Where he was met by the animals of the woods who, upon seeing him, decided to come out of their hiding spots in order to greet him; them being gutted from a peculiar coming of his he had come to use as an excuse to completely gut and rip them apart.

But this was no normal groove by any means, as the very branches and coils that could be seen around only, furthermore confirmed the fact that everything was mechanical in nature, without any possible exception, having made the most peculiar growths that could be put in place. A peculiar sight had come upon a mad-man, he was a man of science after all.

‘I am Lam.’

And Lam made sure every other man had stumbled upon the middle of the groove in order to observe that everything was going as it should. There was no longer any reason to wait for something to happen as they were already a step ahead of him. Having applied some of the control mechanisms that were put around the placed which were already producing cat noises but were shaped like roaches and dead-otters, being acted upon as to control the very heap and mass which had been under their control, forming a strange pair of four shaped antlers which rotated around, then moved left, right, left, right, eight meters in whichever direction, then it flew randomly around the place until it had gotten the god’s attention who could not help himself but, furthermore be mesmerized by what was going on. And there were giant-rat helmets they wore, the scientists also had swords on them, which had been called. The swords bore evil eyes which spoke as soon of the twists and the dyes of the mad world they lived in. Only one of them could survive in order to contain the god for a long enough duration of time that they might be able to draw from him anything, anything, even if it were but a crumble of power they cut put to their employ, it was worth everything to them and it would be worth everything to them, if only they could grab it. Which is what they settled with, as soon as their blades could finally make contact with one another, they began charging themselves as to do what they could In order to destroy themselves; paranoid yet driven to a supreme act of violence that could not be withdrawn, madly in doubt of what was going on, they could not forget of the suffering which entered their guts by the time they had come to accept that most of them were no longer alive. A swift dancer of the blades he were, come upon him, he’d closely snapped a neck, then beheaded another, then but sliced another man apart only to be met as soon as he would by someone who could actually fight. And both of them but met blade and blade, neither of them could accept it, but they were already met. Made to be uncanny as they shook each other off, then pushed around as to pursue the utmost dread that had lain in the air, what followed after was the smoke that came out of their bodies as many of the scientists were not actually dead. They’ve been pretending, reanimating one another as if they had never been taken and cut, then they brought each other up on their feet, only to have lost their sense, of what was it like to be human, either way. During their fight, the god was finally amused as to finally be shook upon the brow, as he had awakened himself, which was what he needed in order to look around, as when the time came, this peculiar creature but erected itself then walked away. No longer interested in what was going on. As this strange being that had killed the scientists, or had destroyed their initial minds which could not be recovered any longer upon their initial coming-to life had finally granted them the peace that they needed, upon him turning around. The strange scientist that had come from Amohrs’s groove had but spun around and killed everyone, this time permanently so, making sure they were grinded and would never get a chance to rise from where they were, as to be remembered so.

‘All within reason, for which I think I ought to have you flogged and beaten into the ground just so I could make sure you’re actually dead-dead and not pretending this time around, for which I’m certainly sorry about what I’m about to do. And let’s consider just as much, I’ve done nothing of the sort, I, who was one of the first men to greet you around and come and stumble upon my very own home have come to ask this of you.

Please leave my sight and don’t return until I’m calling you, otherwise, I will do my best to pull out your lungs and walk in them as if they’re my shoes, and why? Why do you think that is?

Is it not because I’m evil? After all this time you should’ve been able to pick it up, somehow, along the way, you should’ve done it.

I can only promise you this, since you cannot seem to make up your mind already. I know who you are, and I know what I am, I've been trying to find you in this place long before your conception has even taken place, yet your refusal to acknowledge me seems to anger me.'

And the scientist turned from the man as he was struck between two others.

One was a creature who had killed its own insides. It was the upper body-long extended worm-like thing with many heads which stood upon a down turn flipped blimp, standing near the man with the fish that came out of his wrist and the scythe and both of them were unaware of what was going on, they were in a daze it seemed. Before they could even wake up from what was going on, they realized that this man could not be trusted since he not only wore a rat-hat but he wore a broad sword that appeared to be sharpening itself with every passing moment, but then he went past them, seeing how this groove was a deformed city one side as well as a place where giant malformed cages were floating. Him having already made it past them only to greet the person he had been waiting for, in a long-long time. He was a tall peculiar figure, much taller than him, who appeared to, upon the sight of the Scientist, to shove a bunch of knives in his chest which travelled past his back, becoming skin-bulbs that appeared to become some peculiar growths of skin, which were kept by stalks, one of them having redistributed some of his muscle mass inside of it, then immediately pushing it through the bulk of his chest, organs, his throat and his head as to form a last-line of protection through which he may be able to completely protect himself from him.

'I am the Foreman.'

He said and he was a dark figure that appeared to bring ruin wherever he went. Yet he was strong and all mighty and incapable of being defeated, for he had many others like him which had finally made their way.

'It's been a long time but we have finally come to construct the machine which will infest the metal groove and turn the trees into real trees that we may employ to carve the insides of so we could fill the pits.

We have to fill the holes under every possible circumstance, otherwise.'

'What and what could happen then?

Dear man, do you not realize what might happen if you, if you even put your fingers inside of it for one moment and one alone?'

'No, I've come to realize that I don't actually care. Mine is a lonely choice to make, and this court may not, by the likes of it dare take me, by any means, to hold me under any sort of contempt for what I've done and I will kill every living thing if I have to, for that is the thing which keeps me going and without it, I may as well just stumble like a foolish creature and die.

As there's nothing more keeping me alive, other than the purpose that's been driven me to this point here.

I need to fill the holes with bodies, I need to feed them with meat until they will have been fixed. There's no other way to fix this brokenness there is.'

‘But I see nothing that’s in need of being fixing, what could you possibly mean, good man?’

‘There is, but you fail to see that everything’s broken and that everything will be broken from this point on and onto the other, it’s something we will have to find out only then, when I will have been gone, whether or not it shall be fixed or not.’

‘Please, oh, please, oh man, could you not tell me? What if there’s even the slightest chance that you may stumble and you may come and cast me into whatever there needs to be done that I may make and craft with my own hands?’

And what if there’s something I could create, and fashion of the metal itself and of the innards devices that are hidden inside the groove?

Must everything be destroyed by such means? Is there nothing worth sparing in this trail of much destruction you’ve come to employ and share upon your path of many malformations and cruelties?’

‘And how do you know of me then? How could you possibly know what I’ve done?’

‘I can see it in your eyes, Foreman, I know you’ve done some things that may not even be redeemed by any man, that may be destroyed, that may come to unfold any such ploy as to bring destruction. Yet I question this, you reek of death. How is it that a corpse like you still breathes and walks as it desires so?’

‘Is it not clear by such means as which I’ve come to employ upon it that I survived?’

I’ve come and travelled through his guts?’

‘Whom? ‘

‘The being whom had pushed but through, the creature we shall know as true. Mannofilthde, we’ve spoken before, he’s but a contortion of what’s it been and with him lost, there’s nothing we have to fear anymore. With him having gotten us through, I fear there’s no remark we may be able to claim, we shall be calm as to look around.’

And they weren’t in the groove but in a room with black soil, and dark-stone halls, with various gargoyle statues and various deep-bite canines lacking in virtue. They were stopped, oh, woe to them, oh, evil figure who’s seeping in behind its den, why have you come in here? That’s as much as they wondered, incapable of knowing what seethed and what came after.

It seemed clear that somehow there’s been a ruse, somehow there’s been a fall-through one could never think of.

There were dark creatures that created everything and they were tall and uncanny and they were morbidly set as if to push themselves through. Most uncanny canals wrought and shaped as to look like uncanny mazes made by crafty worms that were also riding in the most peculiar tunnel-makers. They were queer and not to be seen, followed through. Oh, dark beings, tall and mighty, shaped with bile-holders with many bellies, giant and feisty, put together but separated by cylindrical black rods between each pile of meat, each connected and at every whim, there was but an uncanny thing, like little springs of shoe-laces of black strings, yet they were nothing other than exposed black guts. And upon these bloated sea-mines which were tied by their black gut-chains, at the top stood a most peculiarly deformed abstract spherical tendon which extended into four long rectangles that held two inverted overlapped pyramids of mid which had both of their sharp tips connecting inside the rectangle, yet they were made of meat and more primitive looking, even by their standards, holding billions of mouths and infantile creatures insides which were struggling to get out with every possible second that had passed. Their giant bile-guts, within the frame of the main creature, all bore sutured peculiarly extending chest-mouths that appeared to be devouring little barely made rod-like figures that were almost peculiarly human-headed at their ends, or cranial looking. These limbless human lollipops are eaten constantly, yet in reality they are nests with hundreds of people inside of them, bleeding constantly as they're being put through some uncanny unfathomable grinder that may never be touched upon.

There was also evil everywhere around, it was in the air, a volatile thing that appeared to melt the strongest of them until they could not help themselves any longer. Too many of them had suffered, too many man battled each other because of this miasma which gave birth to a small town. In this small town every single man had become bloated and became a giant building, of which mere glutton-might had devoured their limbs, as they frowned, incapable of eating anything any longer. Being so restless as to become incapable of controlling themselves, they started inhaling and exhaling violently until even the slightest incapable men, the frailest of women and their children were drawn inside of their mouths as they were slowly being chewed upon, spat until this process repeated itself so many times that they all began creating various rivers of blood which carried over into the blood sea which, accidentally had completely swallowed their complete DNA material, contorting their very substance with everything that could be put into that malignant pool that began mixing with every sea-creature and every other man that fell from his fishing boat.

That fishing boat was shaped like the mass of a whale with a head that looked like two put together human hands, as if to make a prayer, with giant twisted eyes on their knuckles and seething teeth and foaming lances make of cancer tomes that were spread everywhere around the sea and on the ship as well, as every sailor that was on the ship and on the flying dock that was chained to the ship and kept, prevented, not allowed as one would do, from completely going away, they settled with doing as much as studying the tomes and what they said. And every few page or so as it happened, there was nothing more that could be said, as the evil crept in every single present tome, corrupting the men who were now conjoined as to finally reach the middle pages where they summoned a most peculiar entity with eight most peculiar torsions, contorted limbs, as well as replicas of themselves as if they were looking at a mirror that was above of them, furthermore them having completely created humanoid circle that began amassing as many features in the middle as if to form a pseudo open mouthed pucker which drew lightning-like atoms from each of those floating look-a-like bodies, in the middle of whom, they formed a two sided, fallen-elongated warped, or pulled from both sides comet with peculiar features from which a horn-like stretch shot into the ship, spreading within its every side until it pushed out of the main deck a few rafts that started going in as many directions as possible. And the rafts themselves were rather queer and uncanny as they were but made and had already basked into this strange essence which had been put into it to begin with, having not only corroded itself, as it became, or it had formed, a great invisible tracking line that had been carried over by invisible flying servants that were baboon-like simian wasps embodiments of which wings were bloated balloons shaped like cruisers, with their canons growing and curling along outlandishly as they became bloated heads that would constantly bleed uncannily until they will have become incapable of preserving themselves or stopping from the most uncanny motion that was begun. For their first part of the ritual had already been finished, with them having formed a great sea-space constellation that completely projected itself from one side to the other, bouncing upon themselves and moving along, there had come the time where the beams were summoned back home, to have become the most corroding things to have touched the watery insides of the sea as they, upon reaching the ground, made peculiarly deformed stoles of walls that were put together. Vivid-looking abominations of many shapes, abstractions that spoke to the most uncanny beings that passed through the veils of the ocean, until they couldn't help themselves but float as well. It had been observed that upon the release of this peculiar ritual, many if not all the sailors immediately died, and they were not mourned for, not would anyone realized what happened this day. It's ever so clear that one could observe something that would be deemed to mad to be completely explained, as the docks themselves became, stretched by all means, but not in the same manner one would manage to pull a band of rubber that would be forced to go beyond its limits, indeed, that would be most terribly wrong, as in turn the wood was pushed and continued stretching until it had become almost ooze-like as to have been forced, upon the midst of its complete push-through to, all of the sudden shoot in every possible direction, completely destroying everything that had ever reeked of human life, if there's ever been one there to begin with. And then the wall of creatures forced every living thing inside of it to spit in the sea, making it so everything was infested by pollution.

And there was freedom to it, to the dark being whom lurked with its self-eating, under-cannibalizing brothers that had been shaped like their fat egg-shaped skin-like transparent mushroom, many piped singers, of which many speak-through heads only made is so many other bodies continued floating through them. For the singers of Yyork showed utmost compassion upon having their master finally return to the place upon which it had, for such a long time gone through, now, upon having return upon the deformed lands, upon the plane in which it lived, one could see that the entire planet was but a peculiar blackish sea, a march upon which moved many isle-like creatures that were just like it, or at least appeared to represent some decaying flora, fauna, or some other kind of peculiar feature-filled formed that began spreading their infinitesimal degenerate feature along as they continued their peculiar existence which had never been stopped from ever pushing through, until no one could ever be made to feel accustomed or be forced to make such moved as to feel as if they were forced to lose themselves through the most uncanny destructions. Signs as those could never even felt to be. In this reality, even the ghostly likes of molt would live through some peculiar sponge-like being that were drawn deeper into the march-pools where they would live forever as they saw it fit, where decay was welcome for those that managed to pass through without being completely blown or completely destroyed by such forced as to crush them so.

One had to fear such a base as that one belonging to them. Since they were most capriciously a peculiar lot that shared both instinct and heritage as that of man, yet at times hunted it down; which couldn't have been further from the truth as they prepared for war and brought, upon the call of horns which were shaped like animal-bones the first sings of the coming of the great destruction which could not be delayed nor stopped any longer. A heart was beating with pus and most peculiar metal bonds and alloy, a pool inside of it, yet it was floating in the sky. Many decayed having turned towards it in the prayed yet many of them would've just as soon realized how dangerous it was being there as well, as such a fall would most likely even come as close to shattering their left sided femurs, bringing destruction and pain, eternally so until their remains had been completely made and put to waste.

'There's danger there.'

‘Then don’t approach it, you need to call it you for me to see, I’ve got my eyes set on you and I can feel such agonies coming from you.

Ah, forget it.

Follow me through, we shall go and hunt through the plains, I know of such emptiness such as there is somewhere, out there, we’ll head back home when we’re done.’

Upon the country yet they walked, incapable of holding each other off for what was worth, there was terror and dread in their eyes, they were frightened, by what?

Always there, as the picture of a picture, somewhat impure; broken but made to look like them, an annoyance as they failed to realized.

It is not us, it can’t be us.

I do not recognize myself in the person I see.

One of the Decayed Sages stopped them along the way.

Decayed Man and Decayed Pin but didn’t know how to react upon seeing this strange creature as they could not interpret the way in which it acted.

Yet it spoke of something they didn’t think they would hear.

‘I’ve carefully crafted something for you, it’s a tool.’

‘Is this a stringed pipes with little toes curled at every side of them?’

‘I’ve made it myself.’

He pointed at his own feet. The Decayed Sage had none left but it had been worth it. But lo, why would he give them, of all, two strangers who had come from a far away land such a thing? What, within reason could be said about it and why were they made to be the victims of such oppressions as to be forced to listen to him preach. And give instructions as if how to use it, and how to clean it as well, how to furnish it, how to, so on and so forth.

And who could question the strange man that appeared and bore, with his little monkey paws and peculiarly distraught reins, upon the peculiar bullfrog lance upon which he strode, on the body of many rolling protrusions which were cast from the heavens from which he was cast away, he froze, incapable of realizing where he’s been. Is it not clear any longer, of what he’s seen? A much perilous pair of columns, darkened as the most peculiar clouds, most of them would hardly matter, but looked upon and looked after. They were tall and gritty, collar bones surrounding them, peculiar heads and many dead-formations coming out of them. With most peculiar swords of skin which bore their eyes, their features in, and would but eat and cast as well, if it weren’t for the bridge they seemed to beg. They were vile in nature but moved with it. For ever was the soil penetrating the ill as to come through the mass of clouds. But the bridge itself but malformation, a creation of many hot-ironed metal names and outlines which were put together on top of Stagnation. For, it was the greatest of the flying beasts, this starved out giant without peace and with little in its mind, its throatless form, its span of beating wings and most peculiar heads that erupted were but strange blades themselves, cartilage and of face, stretched upon it, such embrace, at the middle carrying its beating hearts, all exposed for all to see drained as every drop of blood became but a strange step, a doorway in the sky made out of clots, from which the flying men who stepped on air, the Numroads were but to beseech as to enter for their lead, consumed upon entered only by one of them, inside one of the inner-body pockets of Stagnation, where they did the most cruel things as to pass the time where the Radiation-fellow began to sing. His throat but throttling, his open wing but came to view. He had but cut himself and bled sinew. He was distraught for having waited for this long, him being caught and made to wait in the most distasteful place of all, the spot beneath the groove, where they shook him, dirt-people with spear-points and javelins they but hooked him in the head for torture could not be denied for one like him.

He listened for hours, though no one else could feel the certain vibrations that entered the dirt and went through all as if to be put forth, where all but shook. There in dreadful hope they started begging him to let it so, for all world but survived because his majesty allowed it to. He, who were not a god, but one unlike no other, the tortured man was the key-point of suffering which drove the beast known as Stagnation to be set in flight. And as its great shadow stood upon the Groove, they had but listened and little to know refused to understand, why was it that the leprous metal trees began to sing and shake, as their remains were shackled to the grains. From where the infants started their flight, in order to stop the Numroads from entering such spots that were benign. One could not by any means understand what had entered them, for these limbless dark things which leeches were but cousins, which skulls and rib-bones that of men but started emerging as they began procuring the most peculiar dark smoke that would tell. Of dark being, they were brought, they appeared out of nowhere and grew on their backs like little pests that couldn't be stopped.

Yet again, there enter four of them, and one parasite was brought.

'But what have you done brother? I see that you've become sloppy as well, I couldn't understand, I don't, why is it that she's here, that dog? That giant thing which eyes are but silicone-reflective, most peculiar in shape; I couldn't understand, why and why as well, is he here?'

A lesser servant of Guenon, a peculiar thing of its own, the giant head, which was promoted, of growth such as it would breeds, the many roots but peculiar and strongly-folded.

They were joined in discussion, as it would but put the dog down as if to listen and to wonder, what had entered the dark heart which began signing, the madness of no appeal, the strangling motion and the feelers which made the walls.

It was a simple room, in all honesty, it had two tables, a strongly rooted lamb-shaped lamp to the ceiling, yet, and this was important, its wool made the stuffing of every corner of the room, and that stuffing looked and acted like some kind of strong foam that would prevent anything from passing through as to destroy what had entered through their hearts, them having already created molds and various shapes inside, which were acted upon like woodoo dolls in some manner to no effect, other than to symbolize the fact that they were loathed by the creature which erected its head. It cut lay around the muzzle. If one were to remove the lamb-hat he would see a most peculiar barely textured form like that of a rat-nose that was extended in a low-facet hanging like tri-dimensional thing which, would only serve as a decoy for some glorious tumor-like growths that looked as if they were made out of billions of facets as if they were miniature oblongs, or satellites which were somehow brought there.

And the Guenon creature but sat around the table, joined by the dog, the others having already drawn to the darkest sides of the room, being incapable of understanding what this room was to become. It bore tattoo-like drawings, some which began to grow in side, to glow as well, when the chanting had begun.

‘You know why I came here, no?’

Magnificent of dreams, you’ve bothered man many a year and now I’ve come to call you, on a whim. You need to stop for your disruption will only bring the likes of theirs, from the depths of which no one might spare a word.

You shall bring something of man into the world. He might live the plains of his planet, since you have disturbed the only solace he can find, in dream.

And past the stars he might find us wasting time on moons, dancing on the pipe-held platforms as we await our god upon a swoon to emerge. Him whom had been served as such by the naked-to-the eye primordial creations, we could be punished as well for what we’ve done, do you not understand this, lady?’

And all of the sudden she had become, yet again, in her form, Unica but joined him during such a meal as to be sworn to the second she was there, asking what to be.

‘I’m listening, oh grand man, whom I may only serve if I’m to be listened to and ask of this, I wish I could learn.’

‘Do not dare trick me with such words of piety and command; I know you fiend had only taken her form, as subtly as to call upon the likes of men. I will not listen, I will not be tricked then, but lo, I need this of thee, for you are called to a stop or at the very least a reprise that may push through the most unfathomable stopping. You need to slow down, too many a man died in their dreams, only to be wakened up remembering and sharing it so. Your dreams but drain life and might bring us.’

‘Closer, is that it?’

Are you afraid I might warn them by accident of who you are?’

And all of the sudden Unica had but taken the appearance of Guenon who had appeared, very much alive, like him after a fashion. Both of them but staring, incapable of reaction; but both of them knew better than to serve and what would happen after could anger but the worst, and could but shatter, the feeling that pushed on.

‘You needn’t worry, I think. I will find a way not to disturb you any longer, I wink.’

Unica winked.

It was glorious how attentive he was and just how much agony, the lamb had to be drive through as it peculiarly jointed, wheat-like skin tagged protrusion finally expanded as to make a hole with a long-malignant black tongue. As soon as it entered the wall, it formed a girth-like shaft of meat, which connected to the other rooms, and with another one like it. From the back of a growth-protrusion it formed a reeling wall which pushed down, reeling in and out, until a cartilage pair of stairs drew down and became the means to enter through. It was a strange-way, a stairway that lead to a convoluted system of small dens a man could enter through.

But they relented, the flight above the groove continued.

And most importantly they were still running around.

A little group of a few men and women who were joined by another man who had found himself stumbling, from end to end, away from the Crone and the beasts as well, he whom was Ptolk, was but met by Brim, Clerk and Dock, the Unnamed doctor and most peculiarly the buffoon, whom were on their way, but not likely that they should call upon what went on. They settled upon a door, and chose to open it, seeing how it was but an open supply storage empty hole, a stretch from which they saw a walk through platform they could stand about as well as a great hollow of dark on which stood a few rails that pushed ever-so farther into the abyss which lain around. The hole was too great to be encompassed by walking, it was dangerous as well as perilous because of the power and because of the lightning, as one was in need to call the great cabin that would take them to the other side. As a frame of reference, this thing was colossal. Eighteen hundred men could be fit on that small walkable area where they stood, behind the protection fence and the many panels and devices that were put there, and even taking into account the giant machine Clerk had entered in, one could at least paint the hollow cabin-like push through as being the size of two, standard eight-floored buildings put together, droned in and allowed to make way as they began pushing through distantly.

‘We found it, you damn madman, I can’t believe you actually found it.’

‘And what would this be now?’

Before a decision could be made or them be allowed to continued, something had to be settled. They formed two groups, one on the left and the other, which was formed of Ptolk and the Unnamed-Doctor, who appeared to still be haunted even in the worst of placed and of times, in the recess of dark by the most peculiar still-born mutations whom dragged their giant-prolapsed trunks and wombs in which they carried their own infants as well as shrouds of skin and weeping stills which were frozen in the air. It was something only he could see in this deranged dream that would never end.

But something had to be settled as well.

‘Lock the door behind us.’

A military grated door appeared to be closed, segmented as well as well-protected against any kind of well above average assault. It just had to be said here as well, there was no possible way either of them knew what life was on the other side of the rails, but they had to keep their wishful thinking, in grace and in asking. Whom shall start the basin and the panels, during acting, as such, by case, by case.

‘I don’t think there’s enough power to work this.’

‘Damn it Brim, and you woke up now?’

Did you wake up, all of the sudden with this in your mind? Couldn't you have told us before we made plans?'

'But Dock, we've only been here for a few hours, that's all, there's no need to stress.'

'We waited a few hours listening in case, you know who might stumble.'

And they only saw that thing without a head once. Dirty creatures defiling everything, that means.

They came to the realization too soon and way too contrived as they were.

'You realize what this means right?'

'I think I do ma'am. I think I do.'

'Who's it going to be?'

First they drew the lines, neither of the doctors would, for the likes of them be out there by themselves, not to waste too much time thinking or to, risk their lives for someone they didn't want to bother with. Yet they rose from their seats and joined them in council.

'Who's the younger man here?'

How about the one who's closer to an athlete?'

'Not a lot of pickers, doc.'

Sardines are disgusting but so are weak men. But it's important for a man to eat sardines as it helps with his brain. Yet one needs to be aware of the threat of mercury that's in there, even though that's minimal to every single case-to-case basis, canned food always represents a danger one should be aware of.

Alongside other unneeded things and other filth that are put inside, mercury should be the last thing one has in mind when he's talking about it, let alone eating them. They had to settle on it either way. Who was the weakest, the stronger and who could make it past and alive. Through as long a run as it had to be, to which, everyone turned to the Buffoon who was very much alive now, without any disgrace in the matter, he simply bowed his head and accepted this task as being something he couldn't draw away from any longer.

'All right, I will make it so, you can count of me, I will.'

Unroll the military gate. They threw him out, they kicked him in the arse before they locked the door.

A fine turn of events he thought as he was met by a peculiarly shaped room that looked like one of the twisters-dots put together sheets with the exception that those weren't colored and instead most peculiar cylindrical objects came out of every place, forming prison grates and bars that appeared to be struck in a most peculiar field of rotations from which they couldn't be stopped, producing as much as eighteen mouths-each but, not real mouths. Yet, instead they appeared to be stuck like the little washable tattoos you'd get after unwrapping cheap chewing gum, with the exception that they were actually made out of some thin wood that was put together in them. As he approached them, his suddenly reflex kicked in as he leaped behind like a scarity-cat or flew backwardly like a kite as mouths started spitting black squid-like oil splatters of pain that had dirtied the floor and on which he could've slipped instead and hit his head.

'Bloody rude bastards, I almost fell.'

He said, but just as soon he covered his mouth and looked around in order to check whether or not someone had heard him, then looked and got out of his way, being incapable of knowing what had happened or what would happen, as his very heart would've stagnated if that was the chance, since he feared so much, no dying per say, but somehow disappointing everyone. And he feared, he feared he could be touched. A dark skin bird was on his shoulder, like a crow with a peculiarly twisted beak that pointed as its forehead like a hook contortion. Which opened, awkwardly only at the tip, both sides which made them seem like they were cut-outs, or missile-launching doors, aiming a little knife at itself; threatening the Buffoon that it would kill itself if he just as much as moved his brow too awkwardly in whichever direction he threatened it to do it.

'But please, oh please don't do it, I don't know what I could do if that was the case.'

There were power tools that acted upon the engine-producing electricity compactor that was the main power source of the Hospital. The pumps working out the elongated rotating buffed-bloated coffins that were being action upon like the most peculiar wind-mills as a system of bands carried coal-like electron filled sacks that appeared to power the machine in the first place. Eight bands in total, conveyer-belt like, which carried these sacks which were dressed in depressed in humanly bloated rib-cages which had black worker-worms with head-spikes at each end; pushing through to the eight doors of the peculiar main compactor which acted like a stove, yet appeared to have long worm-like coils with funnel-like cut-in half basketball-like open ends which drew in the power from the innards of the machine. As this mill extended, one could see the peculiar rotation of the coffins as soon as he entered the room, with them being completely exposed and freely set in sight. Behind them, on the second lever, as if it were an actual mill, beyond the human eye, a scene could be set to unfold to an engineer who would gladly set his eyes on the peculiar pumps that appeared to be constantly pressing into a strange grinding device which separated the meat-electrons that made through, carrying them to the coffins which appear to have iron maiden torture-device like spikes which constantly feed on the organic material which the main frame on which both the pumps, both the panels, the coils, the funnels and the grinder are attached to which is shaped like a giant clock-like battery bear a few coils in the back that are connected to the greater framework of the Hospital which in turn seem to power the whole thing at times. This whole system depending on corpses being brought to them; while before the arrival of the Cleaners, this task had been undertaken by no one else other than the Janitors, it's more than clear that some peculiar bloated giants that are highly gelatin like in form and rather amorphous had taken their task instead, with them having been given birth upon the sudden coming together caused by the butcher-task the Dirtier had come to proceed into, while the halls and walls, floors and what not had been completely painted in the gore produced by the splattering of the children, the men, women, the guards, the patients and whichever person happened to be in these halls, eventually, these giants formed, almost transparently seen-through, bearing nothing more other than the will of the electrons which appeared to have been made or contorted out of the essence of the killed Janitors whose souls are forever caught in the Hospital and the lands below. Their mere essence and spirit completely pushing itself onto the strange creatures as they would stop fighting their inner needs, this possession preventing all other tasks these dumb abominations made of splatters would've most likely adhered to, that being, most likely, they would simply roam around the hospital only to cause as much destruction as possible, as they are driven to the specific rooms where, they might slowly be converted into sacks, put through air-shaft-like carries that would eventually pack, store, finely wrap and absorb the electrons that are in the air by the peculiar bubble-rods that are placed between the air-shafts. The meat-bags acting like peculiar rods or arcs, through which the electrons are pushed through, all of the sudden absorbed from every possible direction until they will have reached their epitome of power, only to be lead through the shaft then through the trap-door in the ceiling while it's absorbed by the stove-like device after rolling down the belt. Yet this was only a matter of the infrastructure, one would still have to find the panel which was controlling the electrical point itself in order, to have come or stumbled onto it, to have directed enough power to that room where the giant movingcabin had to return to. It was a matter of utter urgency as the men were rather starved and they were mightily aware of the fact that the Buffoon, Zlazlov had a tendency of taking his time. He had stumbled upon a wall on his way there. It looked as if it had been at least partially eaten or taken apart by the time he had stumbled onto it. He didn't know how to react to such a peculiar being as to finally make sense out of, having stumbled upon an open brick which revealed an arachnid-like spindly web of black wool-like foam that had curved out of itself a scarab-like figure that began growing out of it, meat-like as it grew four great heads, and they were but hairy on the back, as if they were filled with mold and a carpet-like substance of evil. Its two other hydra-like heads appeared to belong to two peculiar beings that were made to have put their long-wires which shot like arrows through the woman's head who stood in the middle. It was a peculiar thing having met them here, but the strange woman introduced herself as Rose, the creature on the right as Pagan-beggar while the one on the left was but rather unknown. Upon their exit from the brick they revealed a larvae-like body they shared together with no recognizable humanoid feature other than their faces, which were very much like protruding for some reason.'

'Why were you hiding inside a brick?'

'Were we now? I don't think we were.'

She looked back, having taken the fact into account, as she did seem to appear out of nowhere.

But most importantly they brought new from the most peculiar place they could relent to the man as he stood there and listened to the paragon of peculiarity that had inhibited their minds, they were incapable of making out what had happened to the world, especially since there was nothing more peculiar than the strange encasing which had been made of the carpet and the peculiar change which took place over it. Slowly, Zlaslov's eyes started emerging as they dragged around the rims of the reflective surface which laid on every facet of the Woman-wall behind Rose and Pagan-beggar, seeing a most peculiar twist-like face take hold, with features on top of it, and many other things of their own. Many faces appeared as they formed peculiar deformed speech-pattern representations on top of one another, stacking as they would begin devouring their own heads only to have spat themselves when no longer capable of taking it. They stretched and slowly began pulling the wall in, having greased their way with every brick until the wall completely disappeared, a thing which appeared to have completely left the buffoon with a feeling of unfamiliarity and frightful eeriness out of which he could not draw away from. He feared what this meant for him and what it might do to his mind, yet he relented as well and when his turn came, he asked.

'Will you accompany me to the panel room? I need to find the source of power inside the hospital. I need to direct the electricity usage so I might escape it.'

‘We’re inside a hospital? How queer a place this is, isn’t it?’

I would’ve never thought it so?’

‘Where are we headed to then?’

Asked the unknown left figure, left as it from where the buffoon was looking at, or from, not the other way around. The figure being right of Rose; brought to a peculiar consideration.

The Mold.

It had been completely taken out, solidified and made to loosen itself in the depths, from what looked at first to be a complete burst in the back, where the mold-like substance shattered the back of the boilers, through the side of the city, below the depths where nothing else remained, other than the most uncanny to be in-hive like gallows, there they spread like the most unnaturally uncanny beings, where they forced themselves to grow through moisture, having encompassed the area upon which they had finally stumbled upon the darkest of placed, the mold-road, an already existing place barred in and made to be, built by their predecessors who had evolved. Having become much more solid than they ever were before, until nothing had stopped them from spreading and going where they pleased, being incapable of fashioning themselves out of anything.

Little dance-fighter.

With a peculiar hat, him, the plain man wore an armored-head, a helmet which brought the common man to laugh at. Upon the sight, always bent, his horse would know and expect just as much as if to show. He feared what might happened next, if one were to catch me when I’m there.

The man thought, and he feared not, as when it happened, he had a blade others would’ve brought to their throats than suffer themselves over, it was dark and uncanny, it was dark and benign, always tried for and always made for, he carried extra swords upon his back.

One day a peasant emerged out of nowhere, and he had but merely pointed in the distance, taken as if he had been abashed, incapable of finding out, or being brought to know. What he did show was but a bag of stoned, they were luscious, it was all he had. With a mere queer eye he said to Aoughot.

‘Here’s your payment, yet before, you need do something for me.’

‘What is it to be called?’

‘I want you to slay the hen. Yet to know, they’ve gone rampaging again, I fear of them I need you to do as much, I need you to find where they are so you may kill them after a fashion, when I will have been brought to justice.’

‘But what crime have you done?’

‘I’ve spoken of them and that’s forbidden, that’s the law of the land. If they were to find out that I’ve told you of their exploits, why, they would, they would.’

‘Kill you as they flayed each man? To have become one and entered its skin as well?’

‘You need to go and you need to leave, you need to bring me their beaks.

I need to eat them so I may grow my crops, can you not understand that my life depends on that?’

‘I don’t know, but perhaps you’re right, I should settle with as much, I think I’ve got to know.

How mighty are they?’

‘Sharper than in lance but in this grand city of Elendsworth, no one’s safe under their watch.’

And the man just as quickly covered his mouth, looking around the roof-tops, in this dark side of the city, where shadows ran amok. It was not a mere flimsy think, trying to take what he thought so. He feared just like any man and what might happen to him after that, just as then, he considered as much, what could they do to him if he was brought, first the quiet, then the stop. He felt his heart beat out, then out-pace the man’s steps as he considered. Take the stones, his lips were neared, but he was too afraid to mutter, like someone who was paranoid after a matter, nor for a second more did he consider himself worthy of what might happen then, or for what worthless thing might happen after. He accepted and set after, trying to find triangular roads that set after, like rafts upon a sea of stone, he went through and only found himself standing in the middle of the market. Everyone quickly dashed to their places, whereas Aoughot was but surrounded by a bunch of chicken. They were evil, they were vile, distraught. They wore human eyes with human sockets cutout from the men they’ve slain, on top of theirs like goggles. Human teeth were nowhere to be found but as soon as they opened their beaks, spear-lances of meat shaped like small pikes or wooden trunks came out, pointing at the man’s head, who looked just as confused as everyone else. And the chicken had glowing auras underneath them which looked like laughing chicken that had grouped together, spectral things that shone with a dark light that appeared to completely devour the hot-sun rays which made contact with them. Soon after forming peculiar worm-like formations that started chewing on the little bugs and tiny microscopic insects that stumbled upon the worming-dark colored aura that surrounded them; as soon as they came into being, these chicken-images began deforming themselves as to form a mass of dark organic highly structured systems of cartilages, meat, feathers, beaks and eyes, like the frames of highly industrial factory buildings, or the mold they would have together, which thinned more and more until they made tiny beaked elongations that stretched around the curves of the worming edges of the auras which had caught the insects inside of them, having begun the process of devouring them, slowly enough that he was completely distraught.

Aoughot started chiming in. He slowly got off his high horse, which had been a bad choice, as just as soon a few of the chicken leaped in the air, then charged the horse, burying themselves inside the rider’s companion. Before he could turn, the horse popped off and was immediately split apart in many pieces, being immediately shared by a bunch of leaping hen he couldn’t do anything about but get out of the way, crouch, then get up, place his hands around his face as to fend them off before they could get a hold on him. He had almost completely lost his life just by a mere chance, as he barely made it through, crawling under a basket one of the men from the market threw at him. That had been a giant basket, and Aoughot’s frame was much smaller than that of other men. Having barely crawled out of the scene in time to survive; barely having known how he’s made it through. By the time he pulled out into the dark corner, he suddenly lifted the top-head of the basket only to find himself facing an utmost bizarre creature he had failed to recognize, but soon enough his vision started pushing through, finally adjusting itself as to reveal.

‘You’re one of them.’

He said, right before it pecked his eyes, gnashing as well as completely obliterating them out of their sockets as they bled on the side of the pavement. It was gruesome, and the other chicken followed through the massacre, leaving off nothing else but the man’s helmet, which was still warm and still untouched.

‘I am the scum-tormentor, I am made of you.’

Her voice spoke as she revealed her open gut in which rested a large tuba-shaped cradle that was shaped, at the girth of its long shaft-trunk like an entire bath, in which swam little traction, there were inner tractions that worked up the inner sides of her machinations turning her into a most peculiar gut machine that walked backwardly on a peculiar belt of skin she puked out of her gut. It just so happened that she could not help herself any longer, as she simply drove out of the small house she was in, rolling on top of her pseudo-running back, that replaced her lower body side only to observe the most peculiar thing happening in the middle of the market. Set on flight now, she began puking strange cube-like rib-bones filled with gaps where multiple replicas of her organs pumped as they were attached to actual legs that spun around the inner frame of bars and various other metallic grates as well as rectangles which were inside of the cube like hamster wheels, until they could no longer help themselves but draw in most of the attention which had already been dispersed by the strange on-lookers.

‘I didn’t think I’d be met by something as queer as that thing, my dear, what do you suppose it is?’

‘Evil man, evil man what has become of you?’

She spoke to what appeared to be a standing body. Its head had been eaten, this being a different man. Yet, he wore the man in the market’s giant deformed potato-rat helmet. Yet, there was no head in the helmet but a chicken with human eyes.

‘I need you to bring me home.’

It called itself Platter. It was invited soon after to attend such a disgusting ceremony as for the normal man to have become completely disgusted with himself after being exposed to such a thing, that is to say, that the mere event was nothing short of a disgusting nest, in which they stood. And then.

Somewhere down the hallway:

It was all too clear that there was a wing that was out of service, it was hard to look at and ever harder to make out what was going on. Little actual wings cut and being bled hanged upon some molded rack, spoiled by rust and eaten away, like some peculiarly deformed more than bore-through great bone, from which he sprouted soon after. This unnatural thing.

It spoke, it spoke, it spoke.

‘It spoke.’

‘Of what?’

‘It’s rather awkward.’

And they only approached one another when the need was right.

‘We are the gut lords, we are the gut lords, not to be disturbed now, but I feel like you just pulled a brow, had made it so, I whom had been killed and left alone to sow in quiet, I couldn’t understand what had taken them this long.’

‘Where and what must you speak of?’

‘I speak of a cruel day. I speak of the time it approached as of what it might convey, there’s something in it you may not understand in the same way I can.

It spoke to me.’

‘You ingratiated moron, just tell me.’

‘But how could I? Since I’m but a tease, aren’t I?’

He had made a peculiar doll. It was made out of two gloves he had united together, fingerless black gloves, united at the thumbs, then around the entry point, pointing at their arms, and then.

‘You pulled a head and shoved them in, formed a rose for its head and, a lynching rope out of a finger? Are you insane?’

‘I couldn’t help it, you know me well.’

‘But friend, lichen of remains, what of this town?’

‘What of it?’

‘What will they think of it?’

There were no cards left, they were eating out of a dark gritty leg, a most peculiar thing around them. Larvae-grates, blackened as their remains, they only spoke of the terminal inside the great watcher that appeared. All insects would near it, and speak.

Silence, silence, silence, it watched, its face has already been eaten by crawling patches of black, hollow inside. Not an eye could be seen, but it made it so appear as if he knew what was going in and out and what would enter around it. He had a giant thing lodged inside, him who watched. He was the night stander, the ones that made it so we looked and respected, the law would be enacted on each man that did something as vile as. Silence now, he could hear us, think. He can definitely hear us thing. It’s his cranial mass, the second one, sprouting through his chest, charred-dark, inside of it, not a giant brain, many brains, many lobes, a twist of many pools but it knows, they’re not functional.

‘I sometimes wonder when we’re alone.’

‘We’ve talked of him?’

‘Why?’

‘You’re wondering just as, you know, certainly you must understand why there’s so many of them in there. I know it, he has it inside, they’re many.’

‘We’re both talking about it, aren’t we?’

‘I remember something I’ve heard about cognition, you know? Come to think of it, a great bulk of the brain function is used for other things than the cognitive ability, right?’

Well, do you suppose that creature, let’s assume there’s a giant brain inside of it.’

‘But I’ve seen it eat them, it must do it for some reason, it absorbs their minds.’

‘Yet, dumb-dumb, he’s killed what now?’

‘I don’t get your point Jones.’

‘He’s eaten lobes belonging to criminals, now you get it?’

‘So, you think he’s.’

‘At least, at the very least he would’ve displayed signs of aggressions if he had inherited their minds, no, I don’t think there’s a skull inside of it. I don’t think there’s brains.’

‘But it can hear our minds, can’t it? It must be capable of reading us.’

‘Would we still be here in that case?’

Of course it was a coincidence, it couldn’t be. This thing, if it were the case. Only if it were the case, for it to have devoured and absorbed the minds of various criminals it had eaten before, wouldn’t that mean, that it somehow developed an intricate brain, such as that would go beyond that of a primate? It had to be so, that creature practically had no arms, it was engrossed in that peculiar chest filled with sockets and cavities, so many gaps, and most importantly.

‘If there is a giant brain, in that case, it wouldn’t matter now, would it?’

It could not be functional.’

‘That’s it, you’re right, if there’s enough. Wait, no, you’re onto something, I think you’re right. If there are organs inside of it, if there’s mass, that means he would need an unfathomable amount of food to be consumed in order to prevent an organ of such size from decaying and eating itself. Let’s not forget that a brain that’s gone through the process of starvation will begin auto-cannibalizing itself, and there’s no way there’s enough of a gut inside of it to process that much mass.’

‘So there’s a rotten brain inside of it.’

‘If there’s any at all, I think, Jones, that we may be onto something. It could also explain why this mad beast had killed so many people, wouldn’t it?’

‘I suppose it would.

I suppose we should not be here.'

'My dear frain.'

He pained, he splashed his face with red, taken from his gut, he did. Jones wore a smile of red. A face of red, an Injun, ingeniously painted in a color that would make him stand out in this grainy land.

It wasn't grainy as in textured, but most peculiar to look at, all clean yet dirty, their eyes were grainy and gritty and ugly. They wore little bolts in them and spoke with their mouths fool. They were wondering when time came and what they should do.

'Little peril, little peril.'

Called the neighbor, called the neighbor.

He wasn't sure how to respond.

He was a tip coming out of that house. It looked like a giant dark red pencil made of iron put its tip out. Little flies flew around it. They made it awkward.

Both Jones and Wont just, were incapable of figuring out, what.

The watcher passed between them. He looked and then he left.

They turned back agin'.

Incapable of figuring out whether or not, the tip was the one talking or if there was someone behind it. That was a strange realization of its own. It was bothersome.

It was peculiar, how it started reeling in, with grates coming out of the building through which the first signs of twitching came. They splurged out the most incessant liquid that were but grains and little field made less solid, crawling around but standing in place. Those were his gardens, he could treat them as he wanted. And from below there came. Upon a scepter-bow, with two arms hanging upon a string, though he wasn't cut within, little of the matter, a child-sting, standing on its tail, an unnatural girth which expanded its head. Until it pushed and strung, and large about the head, a gong-like formation upon which played but chitin-tick globes with bore little faces, all but condom-filled with drowning blood, which loomed around the crimson edges in which but a dark mark came out. They only focused there. It came out of a charcoal hand which extended from the side, two more at that, they looked rather iron-wrought and twisted in their turns. Cunt-openings in the globes, he but took a single dripping thing, a mouth-full of blood and but sank his teeth. For a child his age, though youth would tell, he was but tainted, and yet, he wailed. Its tip was crossed, both Jones and Wont, they were there, seeing his rise, from the back but more arms emerged, carrying little eyes, immediately he threw them off the street.

'Fetch me those eyes.'

'And if I don't want to?'

'I'll have to get them myself.'

‘You don’t want him to do that.’

Said the Tip, it knew better than to push its own luck, as to make it so.

There was soul in the way they but splattered the little puckers that were that. Many of the lamps, they crept around and moved from place to place, dragging one another until they wept.

‘Look at what he’s done to our streets, Jones, are you going to allow him here?’

‘Of course I won’t, but shut up for now, damn Lump, or I will do something, you wouldn’t like it now, would you?’

‘You won’t shatter my head, will you?’

That bulb see-through but a brain lodged, glowing instead.

If I could shatter but a robe, and make it so one but knew what to sow; they sought him after, it would seem, when all was done, he was still breathing.

Many of the eyes were of different shades. Mutations for the irises that looked the more humane, yet the other ones were but completely, they were hard to look at. He’d been busy. Thought Jones, no one goes through that much trouble, no one goes searching for those kind of things without having something, something off. He was off, but in a different way. It’s as if he snapped his finger and the world was lain before him. He was no price, nor the devil. A peculiar creature of his own, perhaps a god, perhaps but poured through and dragged from below. Perhaps given birth from the blood or spoiled, worthless or roughened up and lo.

But how could that possible mean what it means?

The eyes were but taking bodies of their own from below the streets, in the bowels in the making, by the black trucks and the tufts which were delivered for nothing else but for them. Both Jones and Wont were but struck, they hadn’t been met before by any of this or that. It was peculiar, seeing them rise, first submerge in the ground as if to ask.

‘Are we stepping on them?’

To which Wont but turned at the figure as saw it nod its head. It was acceptable. Look at him, nonetheless, standing inclined, with all of his wicked arms but contorted along the string of the bow. One could but formed the circle and its dark markings which seemed to change, in that forgotten language which only said. Hurry up before I come along. Hurry up before I come along, written over and over again. Its teeth but even more contortedly coming out of his face, pushing through the lips, the cheeks, while eating what it could as he had seethed for it; there were two Steppers, who were watching from the distance. Regardless of this dark connotation, they were set on the vile thing, seeing how the culprits always acted during, night. They were simply but incapable of setting themselves right, and putting on a fight with those eyers that dragged.

They wrap rolls of bleak-canines and they put it as stuffing between each brick so as to have no man slide and fall off, to the side and break his neck, but stop. When to blink and hence, they would see that they were still crawling to get out. It was soft between each edge, but of a different kind. It seemed to feed on softness, feed of moisture while always making sure to put on a great show, for those that came before it. For, it was there where the eyes had buried, where they began spreading out of as well, having gotten a few bodies for themselves without a bother, they but moved slowly after.

A reassurance.

‘If they get away, by any means, I will put this all on you, that much you should understand. I won’t be pleased to lose my toys.’

‘And who would be, having them escape when there’s nothing else.’

Draw away, taken by chance; it was mightily peculiar, quite silly in some manner how a lot of the windows just had them in there. Large metallic tips sprouting out of them, being there, ominously so without saying a word. Without a doubt, they were but incapable of speaking, unless kindly approached, either that or they were simply tired and when tired, one could just forget. Who she was or when or where; not to mention at the very least, I’ve never seen them go outside, I’ve never seen them head anywhere beyond their windows openings. Jones considered the following. Run past the watchers, abandon Wont to his fate, seeing how this dark creature would but make them pay for something they had no possibility and no chance of fending against. And for the jist of it, he wouldn’t bother. But who was the man and who was he after?

Couldn’t try, but I couldn’t leave him behind? What if for a moment? What if I may do.’

By then they realized what mockery of a play this way, with them picking the eyed cherries, without wondering what came into them.

Why, every single one was taken, and every single one thrown back into the garden from where they sprouted, with the exception of an eye. One of them held in his hands.

‘I’m still owed one.’

‘Not so fast now.’

Wont began tightening his grip, it was a queer thing what he’s done, but he felt little to no shame any longer, nor had he any care for what entered him now. It was, how they say, a bluff.

‘I will crush it until you hear me out.’

‘And you’ve earned my undivided attention. Speak up, so I may hear you!’

‘As I was saying, what is your name? Why are you here? What’s with the eyes?’

‘Two questions at a time.’

‘Eyes, and name.’

‘Well I suppose, since you asked me so politely, they are mine. I am a collector. For my name Choulretch; it’s as much as I could do for you as to take on the kindness which is returning my dearly trinkets.’

He was a collector. Choulretch but resign, with a single sigh, he was but of a mind to ask him.

‘What do you want of me to say?’

The room is dark and all too blunt. For the touch was made. It was all fashioned to be felt, down to every microscopic detail, to the very bolted embroidery of touch by a hand of iron which appeared to be caught by the side and have entered through. Each touch felt like a finger that was put inside, a little needle point but touching and pulling that inside, eaten-rotten.

Little shapes all across the room, like hollow-entries taken from crime reenacting scenes, where they outlined the most peculiar insects, which there but pinned down, it’s how you got their souls, for insects would not die.

‘It’s for that reason that the cockroach refused to die. His soul is but pushing through the outer-world as it always tries its luck.

I’m going to tell you a secret.’ Said one of the giant tips that appeared to be sprouting from the other side of the wall; it was as thick as it was never ending and always protruding out of the darkest stench. Where they came and called with the most diseased loved symbols which were but pinned in bugs. It’s a cruelty no man would handle talking about, as he know what lays in there.

Every soul is pinned within the shadow of their bodies. They are doors, through which perfect casts may come out. Yet, if one were to shine a light when one of the beings is stuck in the process of crossing the world.

No one wanted to mention what happened then. Seeing coffee-roach spot on the ground, shining a light on it, seeing how it comes out. What a wretched, long stretched, giant and folded across the wall or too thing to make it so. An abomination that can’t do anything, that cannot survive for long, dead meat that’s left an even bigger cast. It’s what they feared most.

So many rooms were just left behind. It was dreadful and disgusting, seeing roaches with little heads, and little first short comings then giant bodies on the side of the wall, falling on top of themselves while their exoskeletons but bursts in the room, always spreading but the yellowish scum.

‘I do not like this in a bit.’

The cleaning man said. He didn’t like being there at all, it made him too uncomfortable. He was told as such.

‘Every room, if not, perhaps I’m exaggerating, but most of the rooms in this town have them, you needn’t fear, at least I hope you don’t.

Honestly it’s a mistake, an honest mistake, how would we have known that the after-images, these left behind shadow-drawings left by their bodies serve as doors? We did not know.

And how could we know that they are also acted upon by the coming of the light. It makes no sense, for no sane man, at all. I do not understand. It's like they're always there, invisible, on top of their shadows, slowly coming into existence and then, you just shine a light on them and in the same way a man is but putting on a shadow-puppet show, they explode; they pop, they spread across the room, giant meat-factories, for us and storage.'

'And you want me to do what now?'

'We need you to, clean, but not clean-clean. We need you to jerk a light on top of them, we need the room be cleaned of cleanness, you understand, so we may eat after.'

It was their sustenance, and it was perhaps an endless thing now, unless they overdid it and somehow created and never ending expanding shadow of roaches which would make them rule this world, or take claim of it.

It was that deformation of the portal through which they came through the world which made them, which turned them in a worthy adversary, as the cockroaches were intelligent, as they were dark and frightening and evil, as they sometimes came back with exoskeleton-hidden calcified hardened knives they hid inside of them, like scalpels or put together blades. Making them hard to counter and even harder to put up with, especially when they spread. Some men were of the belief that the world was filled, at least the world outside the city was filled with their shadows, from which they emerged, and that it may be too late for anything to happen after. As some of them already exploited dawns and the rotations of the sun to grow to unnaturally giant forms, with which they had dominated the outer lands.

It shouldn't have been said or a given but they were filled with it, filled to their guts, like barrel-mouths rounded, always spinning and dazzling as they spat out of their holes on top of the table, and that murky rhombus on the street. It was like a touch of disablement you couldn't draw away from, always pinning it on the one little filth-watcher, who was but sinking his tubes inside the Baroness, on the side of the street where he had kidnapped her and appeared to be doming in the most peculiar blasphemous of lights, the touch of the moon. It was unkind, it would be unkind, to lay under the shadow of the twist of roaches, in the woods, where during the most serminious access but came out of nowhere, when one would expect it less, they appeared. A great pair of galleons, the wood's leviathans, all put together and encroached into one another, as the most blasphemous thing had happened. In the heart of darkness and the coming of the great light, they had finally come to life, they have come onto this world and then, they died. Yet their carcasses remain, ever-looking before the dark plains where no one sings and no one watched. Their giant shadows overlapped, being put together in the same way a man would step on another one's shoes, yet even more robustly so, to the point where this peculiar growth, their approach into this world could no longer be stopped by any mean. They were but there, together united in their malignant yellow blades which had crippled and bled out, their conjoined nature leaving nothing but the means through which dark refuge may be sekt, such as the likes of the Baroness who found herself there, pinned against one of the dark buildings of yellow-cartridges, seemingly a false-organ that was brought by the insects from their peculiarly entranced underworld, of which no one may even come to understand what thing of dreadfulness was there, below of them. One of the floorboards creaked as a man approached. Most, if not all appeared to be dressed in the Roach-Regalia for some reason or another, yet there were signs of some giant malignantly red-colored tawny grasshopper as well as their malignant deity which was in search for a way out. For somewhere below, farther down these malignantly flexible gates, the one that was attached to all, their entries not to be worn, dictated but the rules.

He had but made sure they went clean, and gluttony was but within them, at every turn.

‘Hang the Baroness!’

‘Kill her, she doesn’t belong in this place, kill her then we may feast on her remains.’

Corner:

How could he deal with her now? She was but risen and to follow.

She didn’t know of the inner system and of the bands, of the coffin-blade, a windmill-stove turned the power on.

Now to join the mind of Silo, the being who stood next to Zlaslov, the being that could not be seen, it was there, within the grasp, he was in.

‘I’ve seen this sign before, today.

I’ve seen it somewhere else as well.

It is an ancient symbol that’s been carried over many generations forth, by my people.’

He could almost sense it. Touching it with his hand made him feel at peace, somehow. It was, peaceful.

Rose only kept a memory of having entered the peculiar place, out of the boiler.

It was peculiar how she remembered nothing from being there, but she would. Couldn’t remember it exactly, yet one could see why.

It was a dormant place in all its beauty. It was a Necrophiliac-lord who settled to disturb the peace, he came out of the body of a Dirtier creature and but disturbed everything.

He looked likely to disobey. He was bulging with muscles and with hardened spike-scepter-like spears coming out of his back, made out of meat, pumping heat as it wanted to destroy.

‘I will smash your guts open and throw you into a candle-coffee!’

‘What?’

The patient was caught off guard, he leaped off the ceiling and dropped in the quarter wing of the wild-white saloons, making too much noise. It disturbed Rose from looking down on her past as well as the Buffoon who settled to a stop.

The Necrophiliac but started pulling the man’s jaw open then started pounding him into the god damn ground with the other fist, repeatedly pounding his neck-throttle until he was completely wide open, then he swinked a little nail-axe punch which splattered him around the room, throwing every limb out as far as they could reach, pulling his guts out and putting them in the back from where a block of meat pushed every spear out, revealing a strange body-machine which just ate everything out of an opening then spat them out. This back factory pushed out red smoke which pushed out red clouds from which blood started raining out, which began coagulating as it began making little bloody men with little bloody knives that ran around, found the first victim, they all climbed on him, started violently cutting before they finally leaped in as if they found some high altitude plank they were leaping out off, finally entering the man they blew the body of as they were brought back to their real forms, concave little creatures whose knives became hardened fists which began pounding everything, until they began hitting themselves. Incapable of stopping, they traded blows, then splattered their heads open, revealing their long-endured bloody brains that were splattered even farther than before, having made repeated contact with such ends such as were never seen before. They buried inside of them, swam for hours, incapable of forgetting who they are, then at the end of the minute they became a bloody puddle.

But the Necrophiliac couldn't stop. His head was a skull-right end of a hammer-shape with little pints written in and a nail-collar inside his throat and bones, inside of his body which were but wasted by the amount of force they had to endure as he beat himself for hours. He wasn't alive, he was more than dead, he was beyond it, he carried a tomb inside of him filled with soiled-rotten wound that decayed constantly, was but broken into pieces, which entered his gut soon after.

He had four wings in the back shaped like fists, which flapped around and slit and cut everything they could reach about, they bumped and cut the ceiling and made multiple holes, before he entered the next room, pulled the life support off one of the patients who was in need of a quick liver transplant since he was suffering, him being a terminally ill patient who was diagnosed with cancer while this being a chance for him to live a little longer so he could hear his granddaughter's last recorded recital while knowing he had attended her every play ever since she was a child. He pulled all eleven IV's, then he shoved them in his face and in his throat and began puking pulmonary bags which grew on the man's head and looked like his daughter who scolded him soon after for not attending his daughter's funeral who just died then, having committed a violent suicide session where she flayed herself alive, put herself in a grinder, while she was left but half-bodied, still living until she crawled into the basement only to fall on the staircase, grab the axe off the table only to behead herself soon after. It was a sad turn of the event. But the Necrophiliac did what he had to do, punch the man's throat out and eat his skull, enter his body and then become a nasty looking narwhal-morsel seal that crawled around the hospital like an insane patient. His teeth were yellow and he kept moving not by limping but with the help of his wings which could never stop flapping around.

'Someone's knocking at the door, what should we do?'

'I do not know, I don't think it's safe opening it.'

He burst through it, the seal awakened.

It turned from around the corner, on all eight feet. He was strong, and rotten, and with a single punch, he ripped his own head off, making it seem like it exploded for no reason. It still walked.

From the opening he punched again until a good chunk of his collar-bone and chest was left exposed, broken in half, he still walked.

The blood spoke for him.

‘I’m about to kill you.’

The Necrophiliac-lord said. His chest bore red-medals, which were both sharp and strong, like he was. He was promised as a butcher and he would follow through with it.

Above the moon:

They could not fathom the pressure coming on from on top the sky, basked upon the coming of the moonlight upon the coming of the hour, when the midnight struck and the cage appeared in its most wretched power admiration. Insects were but gathered about. IT struck them to be there at such an hour, when it doubt, they were.

It was an austere thing which actually began fattening the rims of the objects, the cage, the inner doings of it being somewhat ridiculously set.

‘You’ve got an oily set of hands sprouting from your back, don’t you?’

‘I suppose I do, what do you think the reason might be?’

All of the sudden the Baroness frowned a little, not knowing how to meet the man; while his Regalia was rather shunned even by the flying insects who couldn’t fathom staying there for more than a second, being rather set on the fact that this chaotic mission of theirs, to watch upon the great citadel made out of their conjoined failed brothers was rather, a complete and utter failure.

‘The core of our planet is corrupt.’

Said the voice from below the ground; as it could not fathom staying there, at all; for what was worth and what had come to stumble onto them, they had come to realize that the hands were only beating at times, of such uncomfortable feeling such as their mere likes could not deal with any longer, for unfathomable days had passed and there was little to no more at that. Not to be called.

‘The chasm above has swept in and spilled through.

The core cannot fathom changing through this rotted planet as I’ve seen through, everything.’

‘You have?’

‘Indeed I have and I’ve seen such corruption in the hearts of men that surround it such as the likes of which no one might heed to deal with it.

We can no longer contain it, we can no longer prevent its twists and changes and put it through the rotten mead there is.’

‘Of course, of course, look at such vile lands, do they not seen in mold and corrupted dens?’

Buildings were ajar and flung, they were rotten after dark as well as they were floating in the sky, lard of rotten carcasses spilling in what appeared to be. Either a spread of great citadels, or peculiar insect skinned peculiar bullet-home, just one had been observed. For when the time came to seep into it and when the time approached, she but came out, finally wringing as they was covered by a flying shroud of moths that gathered; whom spoke to her time and time after.

‘We brought you something.’

Most moths had said, and they were only come after dark, as they had noticed the peculiar skin she wore on herself, that of many insects fading, that of unfathomable touches that could never be granted, eating her from the inside out, incapable of making out what was going on. Perhaps it shall be settled then. Realizing they could not devour this rotten poisonous carcass which grew up immediately in its place, they left Horn to her doings, not before clothing her before. Her legs extended through the rotten buildings, which were filled with maggots and with more. More remnants of people were but set to walk. Many of them could not fathom staying their path. But, at the very least they were calm and they couldn’t do.

Horn stepped out.

She was greeted by him of ghastly figure without legs and a giant mouth.

Eye-slit which shot crystal beams out of it, which shot out like a planetary belt. Only she could see her, and hear as well.

‘I see you’ve brought your husband here.’

It said, without a doubt, this was none other than Lurid, the man she was been forcing herself to bring and keep alive, in a leg-formed coffin the contortions of her being made. It was something she could not force herself no longer. No matter what happened, she was the stronger of beings, at least from around. There was an uncertainty from the boils that grew in the sky.

‘I’ve seen the path of evil, I’m Disgust.

I’ve been brought here knowing of your evil path.’

‘And what would that happen to be?’

‘You chose to sacrifice me from inside your heart. You’re made to bear but you may not walk, at least no properly until it’s all settled.’

‘Settled for whom?’

‘For them to follow.’

‘But they are simple now.’

‘More so than any lobotomy could provide; it is the silence, it is the worth, it is what comes after, so you know. After the chaos happened, call if what you will.’

It’s always been there in some form or another, the filth within it, done at command. Created, spread, or given birth as the universe had come to be, and messed with, as it came around. With it done, there was finally peace, a place to be, and nothing seemed to be as strong as that feeling, which came as soon as one could see it, be.

It was it may.

Horn looked at him rather untrustingly, as she couldn't understand just what went through him. Why was he acting like this?

They were settling with as much as they would have it.

Immediately after, a flying envoy was sent her way. Now she would be received.

It was not by the command of Disgust that it happened, entirely, though it was no mere coincidence that she was there, sipping on what appeared to be a bottle of open-cracked Champaign with little crumbs of little Sailor's eye-lids in it. Which appeared to be forced to swim in the most unfathomably inaccurate fashion since they couldn't, or weren't likely to help themselves at all. They were drawn, as if they were alive.

Looking at it from the empty dimension; a land of hard gray with nothing in it except when the echoes of distant world made thing appear there ever so momentarily. It was for this reason why they called it the Lands of Memories, as there was just as much coming from the other worlds as there was nothing in this peculiar universe. It was gray, and all of the darkest of the lightest oblongs were but the tears of a the Gray fiend who couldn't stop weeping because of, not merely and not only the sheer exhaustion but the fact, that mere fact that there was nothing in its heart any longer, there were only the reflections and the echoes it would hear before being abandoned again. It kept a hold of its desire to visit those worlds once, but it could never come to pass.

Regardless of it, on one of the distant planets, as peculiar as it seemed there was this thing, alone, of all, and much more likely to be lost and forlorn, there was a bullet-shot floating into nothingness. There was a flying creature that looked like a peculiar mass with many barely put together segmented legs that never reached the ground but with one of those things, those wild appendages, it held nothing more and nothing else other than a bottle. It was peculiar and not only this but unexpected. The bottle was whole but as if phasing through it there were many bodies, or people who were constantly winking. Yet they were not alive, they were frozen, yet sticking out of the bottle, out of themselves, yet they were all connected inside the bottle, all their heads put together, all their eyes sticking out of the glass, their facial features, themselves, and she didn't have a care in the world for what happened, nor would she wonder or, least of all care for what was worth. They were not to be called, not to be put to use, since they were tainted, hard to touch and unfathomably wasted. For this universe could not put them out of their misery, since they weren't there at all, they merely opened and closed their mouths in exhaustion.

It was just as much as they could do. And there was no reason to pray or put themselves through what happened after.

'The envoy has arrived.'

Disgust said it nonetheless. It was a peculiar thing, a great machine, unlike its flying predecessors, this ancient talk lookalike, was pierced by many plates which stuck out and spread like a tiny forest of little nightingales that were put down and planted in the ground like a rain of arrows which had tainted their likes. It was insufferable, trying to explain how it happened, yet their guts were not only exposed, but the blue liquor started spilling out of the tank-machine itself. Two wheels being up and down, beneath and above it, going along like a drag alone cart that was worked upon a circus-pass wire. Yet the wire had no beginning and no end and it disappeared after a few meters away.

It was peculiar, how this vehicle turned left and right, instantly, as if there was no stop to it. As if it walked like a man.

It was simple, indeed.

She, not Horn, the woman down there, from across the Attwork-fading was but watering the skin-plants with industrial water-panel she carried on her back, from which tubes came out and swept liquids into her peculiar water bottles. There she stood, being followed by the Hound of Dreams, which was indeed, uncanny and was sipping out its own back. It was peculiarly wasted, the bowels of the beast enacted revenge upon the trenches. It pukes on them revealing the invisible people that hid and tried making away. This was a realm of laziness, a shadow of its former self from which no one could even get up from and there was no reason to spare. Or even be aware, that this was once a city-grand.

‘What are you trying to achieve here?’

‘I do not know, I do not care to know.

I’m only to make sure that you are safely driven to the other side.’

‘Towards what?’

‘Towards the great damned fallen citadels of Insects; there and only there you shall stand and paint the days, you shall waste away and do as I say.’

‘And If I refuse?’

‘There’s no refusal, only acceptance.’

Such was so, that she was given only a chance.

The blotches of skin were within and they dangled from side to side in order to join the ride which was but forged into the broken skies that danced.

A mad voice came out of nowhere into one of the bloated flying devices that came into existence. They, whom were but VCR-tablet, which were flattened devices with hearts of evil.

‘We’ve realized something. We must obey and skin through the necessities of the most unfathomably made destroyed ones that might come to hunt us when the day of the dark cuts comes.’

‘What does your vileness means?’

‘I do not know yet, but there he is.’

For he was arrived, out of nowhere, lord of most benign killed cattle whom he governed on top of, being uncannily incapable of pecking the bile.

‘Again.’

The streets were dark and pus was mild. There was the watcher, he was inclined.

The tip pointed curvedly towards the street with such a mad appeal as it wouldn’t have known of otherwise since it could not, by the likes of it understand what went on.

There was an uncanny sadness there.

A sand of living meat but moved, a heap, a heap.

Quarter-wing of the Hospital Entry:

A door opened, then pushed back, in and out, in and out until it couldn’t work again. There was a little thing that didn’t work.

A peculiar priest figure appeared to be molded in the best, him the patient entered through it and two front legs were formed instead. Those who prayed joined him like an altar until they were all covered by the most uncanny corpses that placed, upon the marks and upon this peculiarly empty grave appeared to form, an unfathomable cast from which holes opened and little pints drew on. Many of the days were passed as it but formed the dead cast for the other being to draw on. An invisible pillar of ghastly shades shot through it, from which there came but a single giant spore-light shape that followed, entering through him until, uncannily, followed but a single jolt. They changed it again, with a heart-shaped decayed looming corn-textured faces with many little bodies put together, from the hollow casts there pushed an unnatural stalling pair of curves, which ate and pushed away from where they stood and there on. They started creeping out, punishing the curves along the walls in which they inserted themselves. Dark as copper, tawny but not burnt; the coil-like split looked more like open beaks, instead, neither of them mourned as they lifted this graven bead, of which but head, the priest being replaced with an uncanny dead. A figure with four heads, but not a single one humane; a chest which pushed out of itself until it thrashed around each contortion that was said to be around the room. It shaped its place into the world, bore not leg but a mermaid-tail, a siren-like pucker that came out, rising itself as to eat what came around and loomed in space. A barely appearing unfathomable being crept instead.

‘We’ve been waiting for you master.’

It said and just as soon it started moving around until it could no longer wait, not to be said, not to be pushed ahead. A peculiar banana-shaped claw entered through the first of the bottle-shaped wall, from which there splashed the face of an unfathomable crept in through the wall dissection. It floated in the sky like a phallic erection, then flaccidly it began melting, while forming four jars, all of which but rubbed each other in motions that entered one another’s little tick heads that came out. Spinning only to the side, where two bars pushes both left and right. Flag-like unwrapping with parchment skin-shades; now they came to be revealed, as soon as they would lay, there was but no reason to stay as such and wait for something to enter on. Before either one could say a thing, they joined this creature and wrapped all in.

It bore strange symbols, this unwrapping peculiar newspaper shade. There was no infamy to the man who slit his throat on side.

‘To them their gods and let them stand.’

‘The mirror, the mirror, it watches, at last.’

A few men passed near the nurse’s office, which was placed near their room as well. The surgery came soon. The mass of contortions came sooner than expected, drawing some parts from every side of the room, every clean scalpel and every clean cutter being shaved through and cut in dew. When what drew after was pulled and scum and drawn behind. It opened down in the back and below, thought this was what distracted them, neither one should know, just below the floor a hole was made. The corn-like face opened like a door there came the livid shard that moved through the ground-tunnel it dug through like a mole. Hardened by the hour before it shone in place; rummaging after as if it could be sought.

And to the ground:

The hound below was a mark, it began flying. Incapable of stopping itself, the being placed itself in position, having finally arrived at the spot. Being as close as a few meters away from where the flying vehicle was, it suddenly opened its back as to make place for the lower wheel to enter it. There was to be no satisfaction whatsoever from this, this chaotic thing which happened there. It lay frozen still but now attached, its canine head but started inflating and stood on as so reveal a mouthful with most peculiar wasp-shaped formations that began pushing out as if it were a boy whose mouth was filled with apples, pointing at the right direction as these queen-wasps started emerging out only to point at the right direction of their travel.

Disgust approached Horn.

‘May you do me the pleasure of joining me?’

‘I shall, I shall.’

With which she but took no notice of nothing else and but made it through as fast as they could make it, being more than reasonless than for it to be called. The heart but beckoned for something akin to it to happen when the time drew on.

There were perilous wails out there, and some were yet to happen.

The machine, this vehicle was but worked on the most intrusively secretive of workmanships, that it to say that at the very leave it was worked as if it were a control cabin. Little hands jerked those things off, always going off their mark as to do what one could not.

Regarding the little patch of land no one wanted to speak about.

It the distance one could hear a wail. It was there for a long time, and there it remained.

Raised but not as a bump, it was much sharper, it formed some kind of pseudo fort that no one came near, as the lot was much stronger in it. All of the sudden out of it emerged, as it dragged, but flaccidly on the ground a humanoid-thing with four more bodies behind it, they were all connected too thoroughly to be allowed to move, yet they were also but open, after they stood up. Despite how tall they were, they opened nonetheless like a door. A thinner body came out of them and appeared to be completely engrossed. A dark thing with little more than a main tulip dark body to it, that had two wing-spanned extensions that resembled the main body coming out of the tip and at the base, which they themselves carried two tulips on either side, which extended as to reach themselves, forming unnatural looking knots in the middle, yet always reaching the ceiling and the ground. As soon as it was out, the knots formed a line that pushed through the tulip and two more that shot perpendicularly in the front, as to form a triangle, the middle region of which filled with skin. Two grasshopper legs came out of the base, which were incapable of leaping but dragged the body through, until, finally a peculiar mass of growths began coming out of the tip, featureless but dragging in.

Little pus-like marks with little rods and wild long worms extending from every side of the body blooming over as land-antennas quaking in their place as they spread, receiving no single but sprouting gin-canines that were filled with the liquid, transparent as for dead-marks, written everywhere around the body. Pale as a sheet, this peculiar thing looking rather paper-cut from the way in was profusely bleeding on the ground. As soon as that, the servant closed, and with the door, it followed through, this champion who walked on dead finger-toes, both hands and arms, like a little ray or some plane that was yet to be set in flight. And both of these vile things but stood against the fort and for it. On both sides, in wild attempts to protect and defend it when the time came and when it approached before the time could shoot on their sides.

Wild thing emerged as thin, a servant of the land, and dirt within. It's been a while since there's been some air, some sherry-tinted, worsened ware. Bloated as with many limbs, all but wearing scimitars of face and thing, bone emerging yonder, every single one of them but bars. Many thing metallic spikes, coming out of their very backs, holding large chrysalis on top their curving, large contortions, never yearning for the weigh that was put on their maliciously deformed fat, with their tails but niggardly and put on every side. They were but worn out, a gut opened, they were wearing dark powered devices, metal pieces that were contorted. Inside of them at the very least one could make a dark machine, one that was speaking, even then, one that could not be aware of what was going on, since it was so confused, a man. Could be made out of it, yet there was no little more than chance, which spoke of it, as well. One could not tell of it, the goredom failed.

‘You will not be allowed to intrude upon the Great-Fort Yhle-Klyi.’

Said the peculiar dragging Pale Thloshie Glytit, as he had prepared himself to long-come forth and put aside whatever worthlessness there was in gut. To have them both strapped and flayed and put aside as to become one as such, destroyer of mass; apathy and gluttony, he was the butcher, he was the saw. But they had settled to surround them both, thinking they would have such as it were, a better chance.

‘We cannot be destroy, you must see some sense into that.

You must know by know that we can grow our bodies from the littlest of particles of skin, from which we may regenerate ourselves even to the most minute detail, even to out mind's content which shall be unaffected as if it never were destroyed to begin with.’

‘Then why are you so afraid of us? Why must you think of flanking if you cannot be destroyed at all?’

‘It’s rather simple, oh Pantheon of malady, you whom directly affects this peculiar reality, you need not know of little more there is.

We cannot die eternally without bringing him down at our feet?’

‘And I suppose you are to make him known to us in that case?’

‘You insolent creature, this is not in the realm of secrets, but that of warnings for what is sane is sane.’

And they revealed of mad quest and peculiar benign speech of what perilous ascent there was within them as to have themselves but caught off guard and put within the mark of yore.

Inside the blimp, where all was normal:

For a little while, all was clear and all made sense. No one to be bothered any longer for what appeared to be a long, long time.

Besant stood up, he was placed between Quarter-Wing Eiffel trench Eight, it was the last one to be placed between the men. They were cannibalizing what appeared to be a strange shaped sea-urchin that had its head pushing out and pouting. A little more than eighteen people were present there, who had appeared out of nowhere and not only that but they seemed to be somewhat incapable of breathing on their own, not that it mattered in any case, shape and that, was to be their doom. As soon as the men were done eating, there wasn’t any chance and nothing to spare any longer since they could only breathe in side, in part. What came about the hour was them but fixing the fuselage.

‘I think this one should do, what do you think, friend? Francis?’

‘Yes Besant?’

‘All right, it’s nothing, I was merely checking with you. It has been a while since we spoke and I was starting to be a little too paranoid, you understand that, right?’

‘Of course I do, who wouldn’t be in that case? With everything going around here and you know.’

It was just as thus that neither of them would cross each other’s paths. Being there at the very least, for hours made it so there was no reason to flicker or to snicker at one another’s throats, since there were a few more than obvious twists and catches as to know. Neither man was trustworthy for what was worth, at least for the time being, they but put up with each other. For such insolence was nothing to beheld, neither of them being as close to making it past the blimp and through the town as well.

In the case of which, it just so happened for them to have been ever so pushed farther in, and much closer to the ground level, at the very least having approached some of the lowest hanging denominators meant, just as such that there was little to nothing going on for them, in case of that one ought to call them for what they are, wretches, many of which felt touched, in the same man was, in the same way a tome would be wrapped so were the buildings, every single one of them folded and put together, squirming out of its organic surface until no longer was it capable to kick right in. Little drones hit inside of them, puckery in some way, with many twists and knots and limbs where to a point lay but four screamers that had been attached, whom were always but munching away what they could from around them, before one of the thatched windows opened, and just as soon, a peculiar figure came into view.

‘Think you could perhaps shudder up for an hour?’

Thought so.’

He just as quickly noticed their reluctance to agree with him, these noise makers but sharing within one another’s most peculiar and most tormenting of things he could not draw away from and who couldn’t make anything out of the incessant noise-making and the strong gibberish it had created. Having resolved with as much as unloaded eight gallons of boiled water on top its face; couldn’t be stopped.

The way in which it was in the process of forming around the pillars around the sky turned it into an unstoppable matter that wouldn’t be discussed. Far from worse, those flying freighter-like things but began launching missiles at every unrecognized flying as well as subatomic personnel that happened to be around during their wakening from their barely induced for coma in which they were constantly set in, as well as, the other thing. Each peculiar flying base bore a set of eighteen cockpit-like devices that had a few people attached to the giant gun-barrel control device, that appeared to calculate and direct most of the explosive as well as every other kind of weapon they had within their grasp. It was even more important to note that there was nothing, absolutely nothing preventing them from fully indulging themselves in creating as much chaos as they possibly could. These freighter-fortresses were but shaped more conical, were far darker and had far more guns and missile launcher than any other earthly creation, which meant, without question that the city was under the Government’s total dominion and control.

‘He’s extremely dangerous, isn’t he?’

‘I suppose he is, but what can we actually do about it, about him?’

‘It’s an axial belt, sir.’

‘What’s that son?’

‘An axial belt attached to his head, it’s appeared out of nowhere one day, it’s rotten his body, that’s why they attached the rest of his body to that infernal thing, sir.’

‘Think you could make it clearer for the rest of the class, maybe?’

‘I’ll do my best.

The way I understand it.’

It happened two hundred years ago, when the first one of the eighteen Industrial Revolutions were to have begun; which we all knew what they resulted in, most of the men and the soldiers being products of the high-intensive testing created by the Wide-spread infections known as the Facilities the Gov called under their employ in order to bring back to life the last vestige of humanity, the last arm of defense it had against its allies and its enemies; a new race, a new branch of soldier, but no, that wasn’t it. Reality was much simpler and much more secretive than that. They weren’t developing super soldiers, that was too risky, since past errors and clouding judgments resulted in nothing other than complete and utter failures.

Instead they only created the belts, which is what they called the upper body halves, which were attached to the men through intrusive surgery, the end result being a DECON group of half-wits that were directly controlled by some parasitical entities that were given birth by simply, continuous bloodshed, murder, blood-derivative being drawn from as many bloody corpses as they could get their hands upon and it didn't end up there.

‘You see captain-master, they had not only managed to alter the human psyionogomy, but they also introduced some peculiar changed in the human genotypes, phenotype and general anatomical structure that was not intended to begin with.

Those thing, they grew back limbs.’

‘As it’s been confirmed several times by the various reports we’ve received over the years.’

‘Years, as in they’ve been active for some time now? Explain, they’re supposed to be dormant, at least the one that survived by my knowledge.’

‘In a moment Carl Rod-gun, in a moment; we don’t have to spoil it that soon before we even hit the mark.

As I were saying, they changed, grew, grew past their humanoids shape, which at that point was no longer in need to be put underneath any kind of stasis.’

And those things, whom dwelled underground were supposed to be left in some space-coffin, rotting. With at least two tons of hard-explosive for every single one of them in a ten mile radius, with deep hollows underneath them separated by a placard of steel that would just as soon be blown out to dust as they go off.

They grow in the most salacious manner from the looks on the documents, there were pictures and Cardot Emissary seemed to be of the opinion that there was something else to them. As he came to understand the exclamatory notations on the walls of their arousal; inside those petty holes, shot through.

A scene below the earth; it pretty much unfolded this way.

If this were classified as one of the attic-cemeteries below the molded by man arks, which were Gov products by all means, these coffins the soldiers were put it would, by all means appear to be completely shot through and shot-off as if they were but pegged by rail-guns; in the most conspicuous, most obstructive nigger-on-nigger sloppy manner. Out of the holes and depths of which they rose in the most uncanny matter possible, that is to say, they seemed to have used those bloody holes and the splatters to grow on, spreading out as fast as possible until their arousal would’ve allowed for grain formations to be made, at least, at the very least a few meters in the air.

They had erupted, a long time ago, as if they had been, close it, but nearly destroyed by the looks of it, there wasn’t anything left to mask.

‘It’s been somewhat documented, sir. I think that’s as much as I could say, there’s something else, if I may.’

‘You may go ahead and say whatever has to be said Johnson.’

‘I think, there’s no way through it, I think those things that erupted out of them.’

‘Go on son, no one’s stopping you.’

‘They’re.’

But he could not say it, baby steps, that was all he could think of.’

‘We cannot kill those things, I don’t think we can.’

‘Why?’

‘It’s because, it’s because they’re their hearts, sir. It’s no mere growth that came out of them, and everything seems to check out, everything leads to one and only one direction. Something in those soulless depths, it’s their hearts.

Those growths that snuck out of them, there can be no other explanation, it’s those men’s souls, something far beyond any governmental force could fend against.’

‘What do you mean, soldier?’

‘It’s hard to explain sir but I’m going to do my best.’

He remembered something he kept to himself for a long, long period of time. Over something that now seemed miles away, in a lost pocket of moving sand in which he almost fell through.

‘I was met by one of those things, once. Though I swore I would never tell a living soul about the dreadful thing that stumbled upon me, I saw it.

Beyond them and under the rising sun; it was as if I was blinded by an angel of death just as I was about to get swallowed by the depths of the sand, that I saw him.’

‘The angel?’

‘My rescuer was no such thing, but, yet I saw him in his eyes nonetheless, and as I was pulled out of the trap, slowly ascending from what seemed to have come close to being my end, I felt its beat at last.

I don’t understand what happened. Nor could I ever explain it to any living man outside our regiment. But I felt it, something beyond human, yet something more human than any man I’ve ever met. It wasn’t just him, or the carcass, but that beating thing which drew me over from beyond the grave.

And I felt fear then, such as the likes of which I’ve never felt before. I saw something in that creature that was no man, that I still see in myself even to this day and for that reason I’m afraid that I’m not going to face a monster if we are to cross paths but a human in all his vials and all his might.’

With that the man fell to silence, and they approached the subject no more.

For the time being, the skies were clear. Everything seemed to be.

There was a good reason to take a breather at this point in time, since, with everything taken into account, life slowly began rearranging itself to what could be called normal. It was irrational trying to justify anything that had happened in the past few days, especially since they were under constant uninterrupted surveillance, which included one of the corner shots of the Jourie street, right by the mirror-view of one of the flying citadels.

There was a scene unfolded.

‘You lousy fat-mouth little shit, I demand a refund!’

‘I already told you so, we don’t give refunds.’ He snickered underneath his breathe just as he placed himself between the man and his silent companion.

This was after all the nigger-lynching district, and a few of the boys were put behind the glass-cases, being well-stored and all. It was something close to the red district with the exception that behind the glass, there lay multiple lynching devices that were attached their niggardly thin-reed necks they were. And people were gathering around the hour, they were. Paying high-bills in no time, cheering on and on only to see the Negro die; it was one of the high-ends of society seeing niggers get punished, capital-punishment after capital-punishment for angry boys, whipped around the cellar as to be made more tender, to begin with, simply killing them was fair too easy and gave little to no satisfaction.

And there was always a room filled around the basement during game’s night.

‘Do you mind? We’re have a game of solitaire.’ First man spoke as the other came around as baffled.

‘Think we could perhaps silence the ruckus, please?’

The man in charge just as soon cracked the whip, put it in the negro’s widely out-pushing gulley, had him just as quickly turned around only to put some special ointment on top of him, rubbing it in and out, as he was put in one of the large-coffin shaped holes in the walls, drawing back the grates on top of it, right before a few quarters of the cells were filled with some cold-skin bare eating liquid which left the same kind of marks a tawny man would bear just as his tan is wearing out, there being a few centimeters of stone raised just at the end of the coffin-hole, just so that the liquid would not spill out. Otherwise, there wasn’t nearly enough room for him to move inside of that crammed spaced.

But there was enough space left through the grates for the Bucklemaster to crack his whip on top his nasty looking Negro face. His big nose but ate the size of his face. A boot would do if he had the time, but now he had to push back the fun for a while, as the gentlemen were playing.

Indeed they were, lynching niggas here and there. They were lynching niggas everywhere. There was no stop and in time they lynched the other shit-bottled people as well. It was only rational, with Cadet Brynnham on their side victory had been assured. And with his victory in plain view, the logical conclusion was just as quickly carried over with.

‘We shall not allowed the likes of negroes to infest and spread in our cities, so as to destroy and contort everything that’s our, as to adhere to their niggardly behavior, as to allow their likes to commit acts of theft, murder, rape, so on and so forth, as their kind is known to succumb to, therefore, from this day on, no monkey shall step in our glorious new city.’

At the very least until his time ran over.

It was clear why they did it to begin with. They were mining nigger-ore from the iron-poles, which was needed for the latrines, the natural subhuman habitat, it's what it was. Many of the boys were kept it checked, put in copper collars and made to move to the abattoirs with little more than a blood debt to pay for their incessant heinous crime inheritance which accompanied their murky race.

'What a weird time we're in, aren't we, fellow?'

'I know, say. How nice of the Jews that they came all back together to write another work of fiction like the Holocaust, I seriously enjoyed the first one, with the saw blades, and sphincter-pumps, the electric floors, the saw-blades, inclined platforms, the Jewess-raping dogs, the gas-chambers with wooden doors. What a marvelous piece of a weird fiction that was. I seriously think it makes it one of the most sold out works of weird fiction there is.

It's extremely interesting, although not as formal as other works of fiction, I think it really helped with the genre while adding just enough to make it somewhat memorable. It may not be extremely well-written, but that's certainly the case with a huge body of work where multiple authors are included. And of course one has to make a bracket as to figure out whether or not, certainly so, what could be considered canon as for the main body of work.'

'Indeed Moncey, I think that at the very least it makes for some interesting read, especially since it's somewhat in the realms of supernatural and normality. I find it rather brave how it lodges on this attempt to paint itself as a real event, as if the authors were aiming for a, rather unconventional piece of work that would somewhat go as far as to nudge in the realms of historical fiction while at the same time keeping the weird element just as alive by the mere fact of the details being such as they are, rather, surreal.'

'That it is, my good friend, I must say that I was surprised, as soon as I've stumbled on the passage that began talking about the spinning flying swastikas which watched over the camps, I immediately fell in love with the entire thing.

You cannot understand how jovial the entire thing is, while at the time same time it attempts to interpret some more mature and distinct themes which elevate the entire work to an entire status. Of course it's nothing near high culture but be that as it may, there's no reason to simply dismiss it for what it is; a somewhat decadent product of its time, it is what it is and it may have aged a little bit, but it's still somewhat memorable. But most importantly, the genre also benefited of a revival partially because of it and although it's always been a niche genre, I still feel rather contempt knowing that it hasn't entirely died out because of it.'

'I suppose it so, although I do think one of the lowest parts of their work has always been the characterization of the Germans since they do seem rather nominally one dimensional when compared to every other character in the novels. I would've liked to hear more about them, but at the same time I'm kind of glad that they're at the same time left somewhat obscure by some means. It adds an air of mystery as for this peculiar race of dominators, of engineers, of manufacturers, the engine of Europe they call them. Indeed, I feel rather indecisive about the ordeal. Despite the fact that one may as well classify it or put it as a epistolary novel, I think the standalone pieces work as well or even better on their own. There's this air of mystery about it, people going missing out of nowhere, it's peculiar but at the same time it's on the nose.'

'As one might say of them; but I do agree that some details should've left more obscure than anything, just for the mere fact that, it would've worked a lot better for the entire story if there some alterations made. That's not to say that important details ought to be removed, but some things and some characters are rather insipid and don't add much to the story.'

'And there are the iterations and the change in numbers as well, twelve, twenty, ten, eight, six, four, one million, it's what bothers me the most.'

'It's six million, in the canon at least, with a huge nod of there being none of them left. I suppose, none of them at all, since it was mainly the dark ones that were killed in the story, that leads to the conclusion of the story that they died. The final chapter of an evil peoples that were thrown about every place they were in, banished for their vile acts, culminating in what seems to be one of the most important part of the story, the modernization of the world. That break between being somewhat gothic and at the same time, the present. They don't make stories this well crafted any longer.'

'Well, I wouldn't say well crafted entirely but you know. It's still an admirable thing, it takes a lot of courage trying to revive a niche genre, especially one that stood at the borderline of being lost. Focus changes a lot so it's only natural that people get driven away from it.'

'Nonetheless monsieur, I think at the end of the day we can both agree that it was an interesting read. Having been acquainted with these peculiar death-camps where sawed-in half Semites were being brought and operated about in the hospitals is not only dreadful but unnaturally eerie. It's as if many of them were made rather closely acquainted with Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, since some of the accounts to seem to refer to the Internment camps as Resurrection or Reanimation camps, although it keeps it vague as if not to stray and, again not to make it seem too unnatural, as to dwell within the occult. Yet it does seem peculiar how sawed in half Jews are suddenly brought back to life in those hospitals, or the ones that were but turned into gas-barrels that were furthermore used to kill some of their fellows, by their own hands might I remind you, which in turn seems to bring us to our next point Marcel.

The psychological themes that are present there, although they seem to be sparse and in-between they're rather interestingly illustrated, wouldn't you agree?'

'I suppose they're not as memorable as anything else. But I do want to make something clear, just so I can be sure that we're on the same page now.

We do agree that the adaptations were rather mundane and rather, plain misrepresentations of the essence of the books, were they not?'

'As it often happens, I suppose it was inevitable to begin with, wasn't it?'

I mean take for example the Phantom of the Opera and they twisted it from a piece of gothic fiction to a more illustriously romance drama, at the very least in their eyes, of course I do condemn that change in style which does in turn seem to make it lose something of the original voice of the author, again, I also recognize that it was inevitable when profits are involved.'

Although the works of the Holocaust were always kept closely to their hearts, with all their absurdities and flying machines and engines of destructions that grinded them into piles of manure that were used to fertilize the German lands.

‘A soap, a lamp, a couch, a carpet- that one must’ve stung them a bit, plates and dishes, the framing of the walls, the stuffing of plushy animals, their hulls of their ships and planes, they even must’ve made the heavy water out of them.’

‘Many of whom died by the allies, don’t forget. I always found that rather conflicting, wasn’t it? The bombing killing so many of them, destroying the ones on the inside.’

‘Well, wait a minute, you can’t forget that they were on both sides as well, it’s part of the story, it’s part of the political theme, knowing that the great Semite Squid had its tendrils wrapped around everything, it cannot be denied that they also wanted to destroy their own people at the same time, so they could destroy themselves before others could destroy them first.’

‘It’s within reason, I suppose, you would expect them to act that way, wouldn’t you?’

‘Of course I do, it’s not only expected but it’s only natural that they felt that way, a natural inclination to self-destruction and to self-antagonization, it’s part of their character and how they’re written. Just as there’s no honor amongst thieves any longer, that bastardization of the old saying seems to be the very core to which they’re written in, isn’t it?’

An evil race that’s brought its own destruction, which has been inbreeding and dying out for more than a few centuries decided to pull the cords off their own, that’s why the swarthiest, the darkest, the most mixed ones died first. They needed to remove themselves from existence as soon as possible but at the same time they had to make a profit of their own first before they faded out of history.’

‘So in the story, this event is nothing more than an excuse, isn’t it? As in, they recognized their own defeat and disappearance, so the most peculiar means of destruction was given birth to, wasn’t it?’

‘Indeed it was, and that ends one of the dark chapters, the beast slowly dying out, finally to be put an end to as they’re bred out.’

‘A marvelous story, I would say, but what comes after it?’

‘I suppose the last thing is their last stand, being a Semite is synonymous to being a sore loser, so it’s expected.’

‘That is indeed grand, their end that is, not their pettiness.’

With that they walked out of their way and left the premise of the fine lynching establishment.

The sun was up, a dark gray, the citadel-fliers were but looming around the place. It was a dreadful yet great sight to behold.

There was never such a thing as colonialism. It was all a ruse, by all means, it was nothing more than a tribe conquering another, in the same way Africans or Arabs have enslaved one another since the beginning of time, so had other tribes, without having to commit to keeping up a false pretense as guilt it, or trying to make exceptions for excuses, it's what they are. It's as simple as an inferior tribe being conquered by a superior one, which ties in to the natural human behavior, that can be observed in every kind of human being that's ever been alive since the beginning of time. Yet this concept of guilt and acceptance if knew and appears to be something beyond natural; beyond the animal nature, and for the same reason niggers for example may never understand since these concepts require one to be somewhat intelligent enough, to have enough control over such impulses as to recognize the fact that one sacrifices a lot to make amends as well as to aid other races that are incapable of helping themselves instead of blaming others for their own short-comings. For that reason the negro will always blame a white, as will the kike when in reality they cannot comprehend the fact that their people have been doing and are still doing the same thing with little to no shame or remorse while feigning ignorance or blaming other people than themselves. These are primitive, savage beings one should not approach by any means, as they lack the mental capabilities of holding their people accountable for what they've done; or as to offer the same things to a white man as the white man has given to others in his turn around. That alone makes the difference between an animal and a man. As man can somewhat put an end to impulses, to his 'wrong-doings' as they're interpreted since a man, or a human being is held to higher standards than animals, as for him, the man, to invite the animal in his house, knowing as it's expected that the animal will destroy everything there is in his house. The animal is a nigger, the animal is a kike, the animal is an Asiatic insect, or whatever else cannot adhere to the terms of a man. Guilt, remorse, those are not things felt by many animals, at least not in the same manner a man does. Although similarities could be found in some species and in terms of how trained behaviors work, that is not the same thing as that which is felt by a man. To be sure about it, a dog may not feel guilt for what his long-distant ancestor did in the wild, a man does. A white man does; a negro doesn't and that is the difference between them. A negro may not feel guilt for his enslavement of other negroes, for destroying that which is created by a white man, for his acts of primitive warfare or cannibalism just in the same way a kike would not feel by any means guilt for his people's exploitations, for the fictitious account written of the Holocaust or similar event, for the exploitation of the poor people, the ethnic massacres of Holomodor, so on and so forth; a Japanese person for the ethnic massacres over the Chinese, although the latter does seem to show somewhat some signs, they're to be a lamentable exception and might just as simply be passed through. Regardless of them, they, whom fashion themselves a people are rather animal in nature, rather than human. I suppose it's only fair to say that there was never such a thing as slavery in the States either since, it's rather clear, isn't it? The Negroes did seem to be driving back in flocks just as soon as they were 'freed' from their masters.

'Children should not be raised in child foster homes, they should be raised by their parents, but they should only be allowed to survive if they're white, otherwise, the other orphans should be shot in the head.

Also, abortions should only be allowed if the child in question is of mixed race, or a negro since it's not murder in that case.'

'I suppose it isn't, and you're right, you're definitely on the right side. I think we should be allowed to slaughter them little darkies, I loathe them, I loathe them with all my heart. I will stop at nothing until every nigger of this world ends hanging down from the top a tree. I want it, I want to lynch them niggers, I cannot help it. They repulse me, they disgust me, they're repelling and I cannot live in a world that's filled with them.

I cannot help them. They're ugly, all of them, they're so disgusting looking, they're so repulsive to look at. And their children are even uglier, they're so scummy-looking like fingered puddings with little holes for eyes, with big nasty-looking fat lips they hold the nastiest things inside. And they're so odd and small headed, so deformed and puffery, fast nasty criminals they are, I suppose anyone would be a criminal if they looked that way. It can't be helped. But someone could help himself by keeping his distance and being as far away as possible from them.

I saw a nasty nigger inside some place I usually attend to.

And I'm not a racist person nor would I consider myself a nigger-lover as they call those other kinds of folk, but know this. There was one time I went to groceries shopping and there was this Negress behind me, standing in line with her little retarded nigger-child who looked like he was mentally disabled but one cannot know with them. I've never seen many nigger children before, so I took it for granted that, it's their natural state, it must be what nigger children look like. Regardless of it, the negress had but fewer groceries to her, so, despite being most of the time shy, I shouted at her that she should go ahead and take my place, since she didn't have much. She just accepted it, like an animal. She wasn't even coy as to say she'll wait, she just stepped in line. And there was another woman with fewer groceries before her, a white woman whom I offered to do the same. Yet she politely declined my offer, which strikes me as the key difference between the two races. The Negro-lady didn't even consider politely refusing me, as to know her place, it's what niggers nowadays are all like. Arrogant, all of them, without exception, impolite, nasty, retarded-looking, bothersome and incapable of being civil; it's not just their culture either, it's their racial background which gives them this kind of arrogance despite having nothing to show for it. And as opposed to the female of the Asiatic race that's been there before, whom I would most likely presume that at the very least would've just as likely politely declined my offer, she didn't even thank me. Primitive little dumb negress; in a just world, I, who was in the right would've stripped her down to her socks and underwear, then whipped her to a stillness, whipped her to her drooling son's contempt; just so the little nigger would know his place. I hated her so much, I loathe their race, I loathe the way they act like. I cannot handle looking at them for a prolonged period of time yet I have to, so I could make sure I won't get robbed or killed, or stabbed, or have such acts of violence committed against my personage as they would most likely do since it's in their nature. I hate niggers. I must be weary of them, because of these days they will kill me.'

'Tell me more fellow, I'll be honest, I didn't know where you were going with this, but I feel the same about them. I'm afraid of them, I do not trust them. They're so evil and scum-looking, such criminal behaviors are not skin deep, but skull-deep.

I do not wish to harm them entirely. But I just want them as far away as possible, so I won't be harmed by those niggers. I know that the child you referenced will most likely grow up to be a nasty criminal who will rape a white woman, like they always do. Nasty criminals to their bone, dark-subhuman race they are. I cannot help it. I think I do loathe them niggers as well.'

Luckily for us, there was no niggas around this place, if there were, I would have to look over my pockets, I would have to make sure I'm safe from them niggas. Otherwise, I would be in grave danger. Who knows what happens in the mind of a nigger. But it most likely has something to do with sports, rape, murder, drugs, weed and hating whites.

‘Niggers are also extremely dumb. They think Mullatoes are niggers, yet.

Well, let me tell you something, I see something in you, call it; we have an understanding. We are both sane people and neither of us feels safe around them niggers. That tells me just as much as I need to know about what they’re like.

They always dress weird, ugly-weird as if they’re trying to get people’s attention; but then they complain about getting too much attention since most of the money they made is stolen. It’s part of their nigger-behavior, stealing it is, committing acts of theft, robbery, and other acts of violence. Even if the creature in question is somewhat ‘well educated’, the impulses are still there and they will always be there, and for that reason neither of them can be trusted at all.

I’ve seen plenty of niggers and none of them offer me any kind of solace as to be around them. If it was legal, I would carry a gun and always unseal my holster as to make sure I’m ready to put the nigger down, six-feet deep underground as soon as it is called for. Look at them, going around your car. They will steal your tires. Careful not to step outside your neighborhood during the night, as niggers will just be at your throat as soon as they find themselves around you.’

It’s in their nature to commit crime, to act this way. They paint themselves as being just like other people when in reality, they’re not.

‘Always hanging in their ghettos, always but trying to cross the border, little darkies can’t help themselves. They see something they liked, they take it. Like sun-tanned lizards.

Monkeys and animals are more likable than niggers.’

And the two men just passed the street without talking of anything else.

It was hard living underneath the domes roofs, they were too wildly set. All of them appeared to be floating from time to time, unnatural things they were. In some way, they were shaped like the island of Cyprus, flatly so. Mechanically set and wrought about the place, as they set each other into flight, before they came out of their way.

It’s a jungle, wherever they go. That’s why they’re so filthy. They make every place they go in their home, that’s why they smash, crush and set everything on fire. That’s why they sleep on the ground and outside.

‘It’s impolite for a nigger to bring jungle-soil when he’s invited in a man’s house, that’s not how guests ought to behave.’

‘Well it’s your fault for having invited him in the first place so you have no right to complain about it now, sir.’

They sees each other as better than one another, they see Pygmies as being sub-human and many others. That’s how the blacks act, that’s what they think of one another now.

‘Witch-doctors hunting albinos, cannibalizing and butchering them for their rituals, there in the jungles, where niggers live.’

But it was all connected somehow. Taken from a lost lost document found on the streets.

The diary of a Holocaust survivor:

I remember the day they took me in to the camps. They shot me at the back of my head, yet I survive long enough to be met by my captor. My name is Misha Razminovich Coalstein, and this is my story.

I was born on the Island of Zion, somewhere close to USSR, between a region named Crime and Holomodor. Life was uneasy, for even before I was born, I knew I would be killed. Call it pre-birth intuition, which is like tuition because I love money. That's all we knew, as a 'poor' Jewish family born in those parts. We lived in a small Zionist village named Israel-Palestine. It happened before the war, before both wars, before all three of them happened and before I knew it, I was born.

The world was mightily cruel, as everyone wanted to kill me. That was what my parents told me; even before by Rabbi chewed off my genitals, I knew this peaceful existence of mine was not meant to last. I was born on a Monday afternoon, in a secluded place, a little far away from the farm I grew up in, near the mines, where we put the dark skinned Jews to work, while we fair-skinned folk watched over, as that was life back then. There were simpler times than there were today. When you could grab a child, undress him and have your way-way with him, with the Rabbi looking in a different direction. Turning a blind eye to the whole doing, while you had your fun; and there were a lot of men having their fun on that Island. It's why they wanted to kill us to begin with.

It was the rite of passage and we all went through it. I was marked by it, I wear my foreskin to this day, in a vial. Eight men had to tackle down the Rabbi so he would spit it out, but not because he was strong, but because us Jews are weak and I always suspected the Rabbi not to be a Jew but an ethnic Russian man-priest who hated us, who wanted to convert us yet who also chewed off our genitals for some reason. I often found myself staring at him, and him at me. Did he notice I observed him? Could he know of what they did to me after? I did not know back then.

They stitched my genitals back together the wrong way. It was done by a German Jew I did not know the name off. He later goes on to perform an abortion on a man; turning him a woman. They put little tubes in his mouth and on the other side, just like OB's, they put period in them, just like OB's, then, they pull them out, they put it as stuffing, as to make his breasts. They chew off his genitals, which I have no doubt that it has been observed here, on this very Island I was born in by someone I deem to be an ethnic Russian Jew, of a Christian background, which brings us to this very day, where I was finally brought to the day of Judgment.

I was a young boy of fifteen, I think I was born in Nineteen fifty, Nineteen eighty ten, give or take. I'm not as smart as the others Jews, that much is clear. I was always last during the classes, when we studied The Tallmud, the mathematics, the sciences and how to fuck over poor people, and drive them into poverty. We did not learn proper math, like they did with the rich Jews who had their special classes, instead, we were only tasked with making it seem like we did the proper numbers just so they feel like we actually did them right, but we always ended up being owed more than we gave and lend. To show this example, take a single day in the courtyard. Outside our class; we're not supposed to talk about what we does, but there's no one else around here, there's no one else to stop me. I am old, I am exhausted, I am almost dead and I'm afraid that my poor heart isn't going to take it anymore, after being shot and shocked so many times I feel as if a stroke is, dearly me approaching.

Ezekiel was one of my closest friends in the camps, in the playground. We grew up together, we were like brothers; as were our parents since it was an insulated community, just like camps.

We were playing a game of backgammon, while being watched over by one our supervisors, who was making sure there wouldn't be no foul play happening. Knowing that someone already tipped him, we went in and already began to share in what we brought from off seas.

'I believe this game is concluded. Indeed it is, that means that I'm owed twenty oysters.'

There were only eight to begin with.

This was a fair game, where everyone knew the rules before it started. We were all acquainted with the term of 'interest' but neither of us ever expected for it to be aimed at one of us.

It says so in the old code of Tallmud, which predates every existing text of humanity, or so the Jews claim, that it was given to them by their father, of lies. But that is something one may not discuss by any means. There's this concept, nonetheless known as no honor amongst Jews, the Jews stole it from the thieves.

The thieves then stabbed the Jews and killed them. And that's how anti-Semitism was born. It's a story that's being carried over from mother to son and its meaning is lost. Only the hatred for the people survives and the meaning of the hatred has no reason other than ignorance for God's chosen people, which can be seen manifesting to this day.

Ezekiel did not know his place in the world. He didn't know you're not supposed to do that to one of your own, but then again it's not unheard of for a Jew to be found lying in a ditch, trampled by niggers or one of his own.

I never knew how it happened, I never understood it and I couldn't have prevented it even if I knew of it.

They arrived on the island during my studies. Eighteen German soldiers that had just deflected from one of the fight in the Near-Eastern region; they looked beaten, awfully so. They were exhausted, their bones were rationed, as in they had to chop off their limbs and they settled on eating their own bones in order to survive since they weren't cannibals, they had to do with what they had. And what they had on them was their own, their own bones, as neither man would come as close as eat from one of the Ruskies from around the graves. Ever since I lay my eyes on them, I knew my life was over. Although at the same time, I felt jealousy for the first time in my life, after noticing how dreamy eyed the Jewesses were upon laying their eyes on the soldiers. They were somewhat impeccably mesmerized by the men. Even though some of them looked disabled, two German men carried one of their own who had his legs, half a body, and one of his arms blown off by a mine. His features were indistinguishable from jack-hammer working its way through a little block of iron, yet he was breathing. I confess that I do not know what the Germans are made out of, yet I'm intrigued as to suspect that it's a hard material, and they're much likely to be iron nickel or something like that. AN alloy that's strong and rouse up; I also realized then that I was just as mesmerized by them as the Jewesses, because of my own short-comings and neuroticism. And I felt fear for the first time in my life.

Before I knew it, before we knew it, before we knew there was a war, there was no fight and we were conquered. It was a short-lived battle, as there was no resistance offered whatsoever. No fight, nothing. We were a peaceful people and they didn't seem to buy our lies or our sweet talk, leaving us, much to our dismay unarmed, incapable of preventing them from taking our women and putting us in little cages they carried on with them, from Germany. They shoved our people into little cages, going as far as to put eighteen men at a time. But at no time were we allowed to be near our women, who seemed to be carried on their backs, like the raping of the Sabine women, as it happened all over again. Even that German man, whom I later come to know as Hans who was a guard at one of the death-camps I was temporarily stationed in, the one without legs and an arm missing appeared to carry one of them on his back; which only made it the more of a humiliating defeat, and an affront to our weakness and failure as men.

But what added insult to injury was the fact that he was merely pretending, as the men simply put Hans down, who began walking on the stumps as if he hadn't felt anything at all, as if nothing had happened and he was born short. He endured through much, and he still managed to get his arms wrapped around one.

Our cages were put together in a tank the Germans used as a raft to cross the sea, where they simply pulled and pushed it, all the way back to our first stop.

We were stationed by the looks of it, in Estonia. I do not speak the language, but thing didn't look right. We were pulled out of the tank and put inside a little giant cabinet, that was hung on top of a spiked floor, while we, being inclined at to see through the cabinet's window were met by a giant German. I thought he was going to eat me. Especially when he opened his mouth and began saying those nasty German words that I vaguely understood since our language is stolen from them. He was like Goliath, like in David, the book. But there was no king amongst us, they were in the states, as one knows, all the Kings are, in the media. I didn't know what was going to happen to me from that point on. He had a death-camp inside his gut, and even then I could hear my brothers screaming in agony as they were trashing about his entrails, putting a tremendous effort into trying to stay alive, for long enough for me to hear that I may one day write down their stories so they wouldn't be forgotten. I remember, everything; but I cannot remember their names, or whether or not they existed at all.

I spent my life doing cruel things to poor people. Those poor people were but dark-skinned Jews I did not know the fate of was. They were probably spared since the Germans didn't expect us to actually work, so it never occurred to them to search the mines to begin with. But then again, the dark-skinned ones aren't even real Jews to begin with. I'm going off track, regardless of it.

He was the destroyer, I knew it, ever since I lay eyes on him. He opened his mouth, revealing unnaturally shaped incisors that had hollow spots inside of them, which spat roped that coiled around our necks, slowly dragging us and our weakly frail bodies that had been starved for years since they forgot to feed us and they injected us with starvation on a constant basis, inside the tank that is, I swear, allowing us to slip through the grates as we were both being suffocated and we were but slowly prepared for the impalement which was to happen soon after. These coils having but opened the cabinet by being actioned in such a precise manner as to create a pseudo giant-key just like the one that was used to lock us into the cabinet to begin with. It was blasted, it was vile, I found myself wondering then, what happened to the Jewesses? What happened to them indeed?

He was a madman and he says, in his language that we understand, as we would understand one another, even though he's not one of us.

'I am great a great German Magician and I will make you disappear.' He says while his mouth is wide-open and gaping.

He was strangling us with the ropes and while we were in mid air, this thought occurred to me:

There was a constellation of death-camps all over Berlin and every falling star was a death-train in which the following happened:

'They killed each man, woman and child, gassing them inside their open-windowed compartments. German kids threw rocks at the already half cracked windows, which further killed them as they stood in, waiting for the gas to take effect. It wasn't instant but they waited, how nice of them to wait, to die.'

This is a real story.

It was clear enough that giant German Magician Hess was but the one responsible for carrying the raft over from below his kingdom where it would've sunken if it weren't for him and his mighty. This giant German of the sea, whose might was endless, his blunt forced set; as he carried on his back but little worn-out black-colored mattresses they were put it as soon as he was tired of strangulating them.

If his belly is the death camps, his back is hospitals. But what does that mean?

What happened to the women?

'I have died once, for every man that died in this camp.' And that's how they count the numbers; a testimony, from one of the survivors.

Hess had an ability that was actioned by his swastika-shaped irises, which were static, but, upon being activated, they slightly tilted to a match. It's as if the entire world was covered in darkness, whereas every object was darkened as if was painted over in an instant, as if they drawn into a dark void. Slowly, red swastikas appeared everywhere, spreading about the place, on top of the pseudo-walls that could barely be made out of in the dark. They began floating, levitating as they made their way across the room, like strange floating molecules that slowly span.

'Is this the power of German technology?'

One of the Jews asked, but it was not one tied to the bed, instead, it was another one who was but pulled out of nowhere, who began floating towards the swastika, splitting him half in an instant, his bloody being drawn inside the floating device before he was bled to death. Coalstein saw it all.

They arrived at one of the camps within the hour. It was a harsh journey especially with the on-going war, more than dangerous, beyond dangerous which was beyond relief. They stopped to drink some water. The beast, Hess had blocked a giant missile which almost came to put an end to their suffering, the allies started too early. But this Hess was no hero as he only desired to furthermore add to their suffering, as he simply wrestled with the missile, wrapping his arms, spitting ropes as to grip as hard as he could before the thrusters could hit full throttle. It was a desperate attempt, yet in a moment, his eyes made a little drawn swastika appear on the missile. And it was then that the main-thrust stopped. It was as if the engine was suddenly put to rest, given peace, a stop to its suffering, to which he took the time to dig a ditch near him in order to bury it there. So it would rest forever.

We were at the first stop, in Lithuania, near the border. By then, we've been dragged through eighteen death camps, and every single time, I'm the only one who survived.

There was a man named Shlomo I met.

Around the court, there was a large barbed wired fence. It was tall, it was nasty looking and they put our teeth-fillings on top their edges, they popped like corn, which could mean that the fence was electrified. Yet the fences were only powered when I was there, to see it. The guards were indeed sick. They waited all day for Coalstein to inspect the fence just so they could have their short-lived laugh at him. It was something that happened pretty often, they say.

'Prisoner, I want you to come with me. We're going to put a number on you.'

It was twenty days in. Most men didn't even live long enough to have a number put on their wrists, they say that's how they counted the cattle, in which case, there men whose numbers were printed on the entirety of their arms, going as far as to have run out of places where they could tattoo those numbers on, so they came out with an ingenious plan. They asked the Jews to remember those numbers for them, and the Jews simply complied.

Many days passed and nothing happened, they were just kept in the courtyard doing nothing. Some German guard simply tossed them a leather ball so they could play around and seeing how the prisoners couldn't even kick properly they just had a laugh and called it a day.

What is a death camp?

How were structured?

Judging from one of the plans which were made by the architect, who was a German man by the name of Warminger Hardenbaff; there were four main parts that made a camp. First was the tents, which looked like puffy-filled little bricks put on top of one another, which had elevators inside of them, which had rails and eight-stacked together bed bunks the Jews were put in and carried to their rooms, the device having received a command-sheet note left on the side of the bunk which would be introduced in the main elevator panel by one of the guards who was in charge of delivering the people to their rightful place. There were eighteen elevators inside the tents, which were closer to hangars rather than actual tents, which explains why the allies bombed them in the first place since they must've thought that's where the Germans hid their ships and their planes. One could understand where the confusion's coming from. It was understandable after all. The elevators were worked by peculiar four-put together, band-wrapped wheels, that were made to constantly reshuffle the bed-bunks together as to furthermore confuse and prevent any attempt made by the prisoners to fall sleep in there. Inside their rooms as well, something was clear, even by the time Coalmine was brought to the scene which unfolded in front of his eyes.

Below every set of eighteen put together bunkers, there was a trap door with grate-like gaps from which heat-vapors could be seen as they were slowly being risen up from where they stood. At any moment, those trap doors could open, swallowing up all of the bunkers which would have the Jews instantly killed, burnt-alive, turned into ashes before the rails on side sides would pull them back, having had chains actioned on both sides, which were responsible for lowering and raising the bunkers to begin with. They looked somewhat similar to medieval bridge lowering devices, or at the very least they showed some similarities. Yet, it's to be noted, as there were multiple levels to the tents, that these rectangular stove pockets were placed in a space between the floor in which the bunkers were in and ceiling that was placed on the previous level. After being submerged for hours, not even their bones could be seen after, having been completely incinerated in a matter of minutes. Tens of prisoners being completely annihilated by these death devices which were but fully loaded with men and boys every ten minutes or so sometimes the trap doors weren't even closed, so they simply chucked them in; while the prisoners didn't even offer any kind of resistance whatsoever.

Between the space that lead to the full extension of the furnace in which they stood, there appeared to be large rotating cylinders with blade and spikes on them which had gaps as to avoid damaging the sides of the bunkers, making their way to the holes as to slice the people who were inside into pieces. These rotund pillars being placed on rails as well as they were pushed from the other side; which meant there were Germans inside this secret dark spot between the tents, in which they hid their weapons. Many prisoners remember hearing distinct shot-noises beneath them, but they thought that it was actually the prisoners in the other tents that were being put down, not those who were being sliced and burnt to death, as they thought.

There such devices in the death camp. Many of them were put to use. The Germans created Death-Sailors, which was a term they conceived for the concentration docks. They dressed the Jews like anglers and made them fish the remains of their incinerated brothers which were delivered from the side of the tents, out of the metal shafts that spat those corpses out of the furnaces and into the pool where they cooled down. They had to cool down so they could become indistinguishable from anything else. And once they were done with it, they would simply be fished out of the water and made to be buried in the nearest ditch the diggers were put to. Today was dock-duty. He was one of the Death-Sailor, with one of the most uncanny figures he never thought he might ever see. It was Ezekiel, his lost friend who was there with him.

‘You look.’

Another testimony:

‘I do not know for how long I've been trapped in here. I've lost all accountability for my acti, I lost account of time, despite there being a clock in the cafeteria. I cannot read, I can't see well; though there was large lines, I cannot make those lines up, I do not understand. They're not numerals but I cannot read numerals either. They are fat, like finger, I think those are fingers; I think they made clocks out of us, it's been so long since I ate. I should go ahead and ask for food but only the daring ones go there and ask for food, I am but afraid to do it. It's the clock, its constant ticking triggers my neurosis. Before he even knew it, he started imagining those as being his fingers. That's how it happened.’

They were inside the pool, with the Germans. They were allowed to have some time from time to time and play around. And the Giant German Hess, he was with them, he was just making giant ripples with his giant legs. It was strange, yet they found some solace there, as if this was the closest humane thing the guards did in a long time. Every now and then a corpse would be thrown out of the shaft. Sometimes they were alive and the highly third-degree burns encompassed Jew simply failed to struggle and dropped at the bottom of the ravine like a little fat boulder, with a little-big fat bottom lip.

It was time to go to bed.

Young Coalstein was but tucked in nicely then allowed to look around.

One of the most disgustingly horrible scenes unfolded in front of his eyes there. They took a weak-thin starved prisoner and made him float in the air. His body began contorting in the shape of a swastika, and then, his body began liquefying as to form the shape of an eye, leaving their symbol as nothing other than some hollow black spot as that of a patch of black blood which oozed around. This eye-cast then began floating as it entered Hess's eye, the disappeared. They spent a lot of time building, making the prisoners build strange things, like two wagons put together, on top of one another which had leather-like bands on every side actioned by the wheels. A strange long pole-like cylinder came out of one of them, like a pump that was just as soon inserted through the other end of one of the prisoners. The upper wagon had a square-shaped hole drilled on its lower left side, through which another, much fatter cylinder was connected to the wheels and the band. At the end of which stood a disc that was segmented in weird triangular slices, whereas in the middle it bore a hole from which a metal hose came out of, pushing into the lower wagon through one of the holes that was drilled in it as well, this one could barely be seen though it was there. A second fat cylinder came out of a second square hole that came out of the upper right side of the lower wagon, around which the metal hose was wrapped around, the cylinder leading to the pole-like thing that was inserted into one of the prisoners. The rope that was wrapped around the second cylinder was wrapped in the same way like a cowboy would but catch a fleeing bull, in terms of not doing anything, something was wrong. Something about this device didn't make any sense, there was no point for the hose or the disc or the first cylinder to be there, yet they were put through the motions. They were made to build their sick-machine that was made to torture and kill them. Could the German, possibly, be sabotaging themselves?

I knew this would be the death of me, but I had to investigate it nonetheless; so I dressed up like one of the guards.

The weird thing was that there were extermination camps in every country, in every town, in every building as well. There were a bunch of extermination camps in a few Synagogues, even before the war started. How does this even happen?

The memory of the dead people still remains in my mind. I still think of them every now and then, knowing that there's no chance I'm ever going to run again over the plains of Zion, in the island where I was born.

For every dead body came with a price; a fund raiser of some sort, that was traded between the powers. No one liked them, henceforth the trade. It had to be done, they had to be killed so the Jews could make profits off their own. It wasn't anything personal, just business. Business between them kikes, it's how it is.

There was the day after. A day passed.

'There's a few people present here, a few Poles, a few Jews, a few Gypsies, a few Communists, a few trouble makers, indeed. Everyone's present, everyone's doing their fare share. But we all know that neither of you actually matters since you people don't actually have any power whatsoever as opposed to we know who.

So I'm going to make it simple. As simple as I can; you've all been brought here for a reason, to be sure. This project you see here, there's no, how do I put it? It's off the charts, you know? There's just no proof whatsoever that it existed to begin with, you know?

There's but, it's not, we just, look. One day we just woke up out of nowhere with a plan; I looked at my wife, I woke her up in the middle of the night and I told her, hey. What if we kill the Jews?

And others, but the others? They don't matter, let's just focus on the latter, since you know, they ruined out economy, they're child molesters, they sacrifice people for their blood libel rituals and what not, well. How about we just build this camp, you hear, and it will have strange torture devices that there are no actual patents for because we're not going to bother applying for any of them and we'll just make sure that by the end of the war, we're going to destroy them completely. Yeah that sound just about right, but we won't document everything and we won't go in detail, leave everything as vague as possible, kill some hooked nosed fellows, some dumb dirty beggars, criminals, Slavs, Poles and whoever else we want and then. Well, we'll just take over the rest of the continent.

Yeah, I think I like the sound of that. And you know what my wife's reaction was? As soon as she heard that, she simply slapped me across the face, then left me. It was then that I realized that my plan must actually be a great one, that I must actually be onto something, and you want to know why? It's because I found out that, well she wasn't actually a Jew, but I found out she was cheating on me. So I simply put her in one of the camps. Just snuck her in; yes, I did, I did that. I just falsified her birth records so I could make it seem like her grandmother was a Jew. Then I just chunked her into the stove, I did.

I don't feel any guilt over what I've done, I'll be honest, I don't really know much about either one of your people, but I'm not going to claim that I like you either. I just wanted to kill my wife and this was the most convenient way to do it. You know, it's not like I'm claiming that I have a pure soul or anything, it's just that, I kind of like doing what I do. I'm not as awful as you people, but, you know.

I've been standing out in the sun thinking for a while now, and yeah, it's been rather great. I just found out I was actually promoted, could you believe that? I'm actually higher on the SS', I, a mere boy with some dreams, who just, who just. Right, I forgot about that, I'm actually, well, you see now, I'm.'

Schopenhauer White considered it for a moment.

It was wholesome, having everyone gathered around the place. They were a strange bunch. It was weird, it was extremely weird, but he didn't complain. He had a massive well-chiseled jaw, he had.

‘I spent a lot of time making many great devices that were not intended for the purposes they’re being used for now. You see, I’m only trying to help humanity now. I truly am, I think I’m a good person, I think I’m not only great, but you know, it is what it is.

I’ve been thinking about something, my poor old lad. Look, I don’t want to keep you standing all day, especially in this burning arid sun so I’m going to keep it as short as possible before you get a stroke or something, especially since many of you do look like you’re likely to get one. So, I was thinking about something, long before the war, you know?

It’s that, hey, I’ve got a baby boy now that I’ll have to look over. And I’m rather afraid of bringing him in since this is kind of a vile world, you know? It’s nothing against you, since I’ve got no quarrel against either of you personally, but I simply don’t want my boy get hurt by a bunch of child molesting Jews. That’s all I’m trying to get at, I want him to live a fulfilling live, in the same way his father had. I don’t want him to kill his wife necessarily, come to think of it, I may’ve come to regret it, but I simply wish there was but another way I could take it back, but I can’t. Especially since I was the one who had to bury her in the first place, maybe I don’t want to have his upbringing lead him in the same place his father was brought to but.’ He took a slight breather. The crowd was somewhat in-between, they didn’t really know on which side to be on.

But there in the back Hess was at the very least supportive. And you could never go back on the promise of killing a woman and taking her of your child. Hess had plenty of experience in that kind of ordeals since his wife had been a giant German Woman by the name of Hilda.

He never considered this but Hess had been a good friend, he was great. One of the greatest people he’s ever been acquainted with. It was then that upon bowing to his friend, Hess but grabbed a passing Semite by the head and squeeze his head right open, like a little melting caramel pop.

‘Hmm, now I see that there’s a great future for me not here in the Fatherland, although I will return and die here, with my fathers and forefathers and everyone else as I ascend to the greatest homeland of all, where I will join my gods in the glory of battle when the time comes. But until then, I will, after all help this world with my superior intellect and superior knowledge and power.

And I shall be joined by you Hess, you will be my companion, the greatest companion there is.’

At that moment it was as if a small swastika but flew through the air, like a little speck of burning-power which dissipated in the air, like the glory of a short-lived engine that has finally stopped in place.

Life on the other side was great.

Young Hess was born in Germany, and he was a great man, a great person, a giant one nonetheless. Living in Deutschland was grand for what was worth. He lived in the woods, where he made a water-mill all by himself. It formed a peculiarly stretching wooden winged bridge that began flapping as soon as it was released in the air. Life was great, then came the war. It happened over night, from what he could remember. And before he knew it, he was already enlisted in the fight.

It was bizarre how he wasn’t even given a choice to begin with, yet they’ve already suited him and made to walk through the tour de France.

Him being with the Eagle-Heil Foundation, which was; it was by all means the greatest Foundation that was ever given life on this planet. For starters there were no Rats that managed to snick in, for the Foundation had no living members in it, yet, something seemed to be working as well as directing the mass-production of the guns.

But woe, it had to be said.

Ezekiel was an angel-artifact. Who has been taken from another life, as his true appearance was that of a peculiarly deformed put-together creature of patches, with many wool and many green threats and swoons, he had been there. Sent to make sure that the evil beings were but kept under control, not to move anymore; one day this peculiar artifact woke Coalstein from his sleep. There and dire he approached.

‘I’ve stumbled upon many things that I do not know, as to look upon creatures like you, whom are not human, but try acting so. Yet your act is to deceive, I know you’re just like a nigger, within your soul.’

He turned around, oh vile thing it was. He shone in the dark bunker, not as if to know what was going on there, he had but froze a speck of a heart inside a harpy that appeared out of nowhere, with many eyes, and an eerie voice, and a chain around her throat, dragged to his hands, as well as he drew forth. This peculiar angel, revealed a sphere inside his chest. Reality could not keep up with what happened, as it was but merely put to such grandeur as to bring a test to them.

‘Why have I been tortured for so long? What have I done to deserve this happen to me at last?’ Razminovich but inquired, knowing of the little things that he had but failed to sire.

‘It’s because you vile things have been deceived; and you are not the chosen people, as you’ve lied to yourselves over more than a few centuries. For your acts and deeds of evil you must be destroyed. For there is a darkness inside of you that may spread like a cancer and cause such wits to be paranoid, in turn you shall destroy us all, even the vile angles that groan upon the strange masses of the broken world.

You must be punished and made to suffer for your acts, and until the debt shall be paid ten times forth as you’ve once asked, then you will be made to suffer continuously until you will have been completely ruined.

Know this, the future is but ruined and dark.

The plains of Africa and Algiers at that, are but filled with masses of disease, with such gangrene heads of Niggarous beings, as to be bloated and floated, allowed such flight. As such gestation of their vileness as to have brought all that which may destroy all; for those mindless creatures that but seek to bring ruin. And you of all will follow through, mistakenly in search for, alas, something that’s not there, to cast.

You must be made to suffer therefore, as your wretched appearance shall chance and be as decayed, if not beyond that taint of Nigger-boars.’

At the incline of which the angel had but disappeared, having carried his message forth, alas not to appear any time soon, not to be found upon such swoon again.

He did not know whether or not that was a dream, but one thing was certain, the torture and everything else that happened was real. He could not forget the pain and death that happened there. How the Germans invaded the death camps and took them over. Misha's life got worse from that point on. With every guard having been replaced by them, there would be no mercy left to spare, there would be no break, only work, that never ended. They were chained like niggas. Whipped ever by electrical whips, they were being submerged in the pools which were now electrified as well, only because the Germans were attempting to reanimate them while they were still being alive. That said a lot about our people, since at that point in time we were dying of starvation. We were walking corpses. We were dying yet we continued working. Ever since I arrived at the camps, I have never been fed at all. I have not even received a piece of bread at all. They didn't even keep food inside the camp unless they hid it all in the barracks, but that couldn't be since at late hours most of the guards left the camps and went back home after the night-shift came in. It was how the prison-camps worked in some way. All of our letters were brought and placed in the camp's post office, which was near the camp's water tower, which was placed next to the camp's infirmary that was placed near the camp's research center that was placed near the dog den and that was the most dangerous of places a man could be sent to.

They say whoever goes to the dog-den, they don't return, they don't return at all. They trained the dogs worrisomely so, that they would have their way with woman and man, but not child, they took the children instead and made ice-sledges out of them and played with them during winter. This thing stretched for years, I think, eighteen years at the very least. We were deported, we were being aborted, experimented upon, there was nothing that they didn't make us do. They knew about our impulses, we became the dogs. They made us rape our own children just like we were raped by the dogs. There was a brothel in the death-camp as well. We were made to dress in women's clothes and danced for the pleasure of our superiors which were other, far wealthier Jews who managed to bribe the guards so they could let them have their fun. You knew how to differentiate a far wealthy lazy Jew just like you could make the difference between a Nigger and a Mullatoe, in which case Coalstein was the Nigger, which goes without saying. It was a weird thing, what happened inside the Camps. One day were put down in the thousands, and our corpses simply disappeared, while on others the people that were killed and completely incinerated appeared out of nowhere as if nothing happened at all. How could that be?

Were the Jews so inbred that they simply looked like one another? Or were they brought back to life? Were they truly incinerated? I didn't know, how could I? I was a warrior, I was a warrior, I am a survivor, I've seen it all happen. We were mining for oil, actioning their large crane-machines, still there, peacefully so. It shouldn't have made much of a difference but this? This gave me a good enough sight of what happened around the Camp. I saw heaps of bodies put together, and I saw something far worse than that. It was Hess who had been staring at them for hours, that Giant German whom I've never come to know. And he was placed there for a reason, I didn't know why. After standing for long enough to get a good look of the sight I noticed that some of the apparently dead Jews began jerking around, as if they were some carpele out of water. They weren't dead, they were merely pretending to be dead. They were dead soon after, since that butcher simply butchered them. I think there were at least eighteen hundred of them in that pile alone, and I didn't know how many of them were alive and how many of them were actually dead. I think they were all alive, but not any longer since they were butchered by him, violently. He destroyed their corpses. I don't know how it happened. It's as if he opened his mouth to shout but he hadn't. It's as if they were there but they weren't. How could the ground shake just as he was looking at them but only that portion of the ground?

That felt as if he was in a photo, in a frames shot with the bodies that all of the sudden began being shaken by someone who was impatient while being in one of those old red lighted rooms, waiting for the photo to be done, but being incapable of truly waiting for the liquid to drip off. But moved in front of someone's face, randomly so that it would look like a weird animation of some kind; and then, they weren't there. Their numbers disappeared as well; but not their numbers, which I remembered.

I met Hans during one of the rare days we were allowed to eat, off the floor, off the ground after being made to crawl like dogs. One of the prisoners there was whipped until he was bloody, until his skin fell over completely and he couldn't breathe any longer; he was to be the meal, he was ripped apart and they made us feed on him, to cannibalize on the man, and devour his organs, and drink his blood, although there was food on the table neither of us went near it since we were afraid of it being poisoned. We could not trust them not to poison us after what happened. Even after they left the feeding-room inside the infirmary where the other prisoners were being taken care of by the Camp-nurses and the Camp-doctors and the Camp-physicians and the Red Cross was there as well with their volunteers, we didn't know what to do.

It happened. They disemboweled my friend with the help of whips they wrapped around his throat, his legs, his arms, they were horse. Horses brought from the Camp-stables, tied to his limbs, then one of the guards simply shot above him, startling the horses which ran as far as they could, in the Infirmary and beyond.

There were days where the fences looked like walls. There were days when the gates were open and we could simply run away, but it was too late. We were already beaten, mentally they had us. Even while their watchtowers were empty, we were made to fear. Invisible Germans could be there, watching over us. I felt one breathing, at the back, of my neck. As I turned out I saw nothing there, only thin air as the breathing stopped. I was afraid that might happen. Already abandoned by the other rats who most likely made their way back to one of the Non-invisible guards only to snitch on me so they could have me punished. That would earn them a few days off the camp. I never saw them afterwards, so I could only assume that they were killed soon after.

The punishments were the worst things that could happen to a man. Since they did it in the circle, which was the middle of the camp that was surrounded by every building and everything that was inside the camp. An ancient gable was there, standing over me. I was put underneath Hess's giant boot and made to be crushed underneath him for hours. He could only think of one thing while he was being tortured, what happened to the women?

Well of course women did as women do in this kind of situations. There were no Internment camps for them, they called them Impregnation camps, since on the first occasion the women got they just threw off their clothes and spread their legs for their captors and that's what they did all day. One could be made to think that in some way the German Guards had become the Jews, as they were made to work all day instead of the women. Yes of course everyone knew that the Jews didn't actually work all day long so the Germans kind of got the short end of the stick, which goes to show to you can't win them all. Since they had to work with what they had, since most of the Jewesses weren't actual lookers to begin with. Though a man is a man at the end of the day and a man must do what he had to do for his country and for his people.

‘No woman survived by the end of the war. There was no woman survivor, no female survivor made it out alive out of the camps, out of any of them, at all. They weren’t even incinerated, they didn’t even bother. Everyone who says otherwise is a liar.’ – Testimony of a real survivor, who wasn’t a woman.

Rape happened all the time, constantly, without break. Everyone in the camp was shot at least once at the back of his head in order to test ‘human’ endurance. ‘Human’ endurance was constantly put to test, many failed and many were instantly killed and lay dead, at least forty five thousand of them.

The Experiments happened afterwards in the Experiment-Quarter which was located from the pool. They used the electrified body-pool as an electric generator. And the bodies that were dumped in the water by the docks were no longer fished out and buried since they acted like some sort of conductors the scientists attached the ultra-wires to in order to extract the electrified atoms from the ground and get the energy required to store in the second generator they had and the auxiliary one and the made-to do power injector which kept the entire facility going. It was there that the actually horror started, and it’s clear that every single account of what happened is true.

It was there that Coalstein met Leah. As she name implies, she was set at the camps not for being a Jew, but because she was a coal burner, in Germany. That being the greatest affront to humanity any living being could commit, which was even worse than being a Jewish rat; that being sleeping with a fucking nigger. That was the first woman he had ever seen in a long time. That was the first woman many of the man had seen in a longer time, disregarding the homos.

Her life had been much worse, especially since Leah wasn’t her real name, but they had to snick her into the camps somehow. Everyone had their documents falsified after all, everyone who was sent to the camps in any case.

With everything said, he felt somewhat attached to her, like every man in this peculiar crib. He was shaken by her stature, until she opened her mouth and he found out what she was sent there for. He almost felt bad about what happened to her, especially since some dumb clerk realized that there’s been a mistake regarding her capture, so they released her one day after. Just like everyone else, he wondered, why? Why was it that some people could commit the vilest crimes and still get away with it? Certainly many of the wealthy members of their tribes whom later went on ahead to control the media, banks, movie industry and everything else connected to the network of population mass control, emigration, monetary ‘calibration’ as well as anything that was connected to this system of wide-spread nepotism did get away with molesting and raping children, all the time, without exception, while managing to simply sweep everything underneath the rug as if it never happened, while also making a profit out of it, but then again so had many of the poor ones attempted, with little and not as much success as their wealthier counterparts. And then there’s someone like Leah who hadn’t had to work, was most likely not even touched by anyone with even the slightest amount of self respect which came in like a flower for no more than a day, until some lousy beurocraut realized that they made a mistake and not only put a woman in an all-man, no-women camp but also a German woman that had no kike-blood in her whatsoever. To top it all, she was also offered stay in the human-experiment guest room where they put all the political assailants whom were placed in that booth for their own protection.

And how did Coalstein stumble onto her then? Well there were a few nicely-made, well-crafted, beauteously wrought foldable chairs that were put near the guest room. She was sitting in one of the chairs while everyone else was standing. As they were given plain instruction that by no means would they be allowed to sit at all, unless they wanted to be executed, immediately and cold-blooded like a bunch of dogs, like the ones in the dog-dens that had to be put down constantly because of the rabies epidemic. That nasty rabies epidemic killed most of the dogs, it sure did. As a matter of fact, the rabies killed most if not every dog in the dog-den, more dogs having been put down than prisoners. It was clear that a lot more dogs died off by disease rather than starvation since they were constantly being fed and whistled to. Also they were trained and they were good dogs, German Shipyards, it went without saying. It's the reason why the allies dropped bombs on them, once again, one could understand where this confusion came from.

Leah was escorted quickly after, out of the premise, where a helicopter was brought to her. No one saw it, but they figured that it was most likely some other torture device, where they killed the last Jewish woman that ever lived. They killed in the worst possible manner, they must've sliced her into those most disgusting ways possible, butchered like an animal, worse than that. In the bloodiest way possible; like a pig, like a dog, like blood-libel; twisted creatures that they were, they were made to made suffer, and suffer after, to be made for and they did, soon after. Eighteen of those Leahs died, and that eighteen was owed, since there was the interest, which he had learned from an angel, that was if it truly happened that way and it wasn't a dream, in which case thousands of Leahs died that day. While they were in and they were out.

Human experiments began.

First it was something called the therapy, they put eighteen people on the ground, like planks, then they flattened them like pancakes with floating wheels that were lowered from the ceiling, worked by magnetic wall devices. They managed to prolong their suffering by.

'My grandmother is a Holocaust survivor. She fought the Axe'is with the last of her force. She lived on the Isle of Zion, when they invaded her small village of Palestine, in which the dark skinned Jews lived, she was made by them to dig trenches, it was there where they buried the dead. The first ones; the children they killed.

When they invaded the island, she said. I thought I was done fort, kilt before I stands. They were walking of pegs, like pirates they did, came out of nowhere for our stolen Jewish treasure they did, with Luger-flintlocks and rape-dogs with ass-tubes in them where they inserted little cylindrical tube-shaped Jew-children, which were inserted into the dogs as aphrodisiacs. We were raped for hours afterwards. I remember being wet as soon as it happened, long before it happened I was undressed and had already surrendered. I'm afraid of pain, I am afraid of being hurt, I didn't know how to react, having lived in a secluded community with ugly inbred people. Now, I know I'm not a looker, I never fancied myself one, but then again, I wasn't looked at for my face, or the size of my nose, but the size of my breasts, which is what arose the vilest thoughts in the mind men, which I was aware off. So I have forced to put on a show for them, and I danced, I put a little dance for them just so I could hope they would go easy on me. And I was afraid that would happen, since I didn't actually want that at all. It was so confusing, I must say.

Their ship had a black flag with their skull and crossbones on it and I knew, that they were the SS. How did I know there was such a thing as the SS? I just knew it, I'm an intelligent after all, like all women. It was my intuition, it was. It's all documented, it is.'

It was a cozy room, yeah, it was nice. Like a clean platform nice. And there were exactly seventeen people close to me whom were all silent. I made a friend out of Shlomo Viezunstein.

He was my friend for a long enough while, and I think I can speak for all there, we were being tortured, yes.

Wait, there was something else.

The Chief-Guard of Camp-Security Karl Younger, he was a tall man, with a dark suit that was extremely great looking. A dark helmet that looked like a pseudo-cranium, with words etched in High-german all across its rims, he was clean shaved, had blue eyes, wore a few hidden insignias, and was there at all times, watching over us. He had prepared a speech for us, which delayed our suffering for a few hours at the very least. We were just done eating, ten minutes ago, and were slightly inebriated as from the cheap wine that but flowed through our veins, but that only strengthened our memories, which can be proved by various studies that shall not be references here by any means. Yet they exist, just everything else that happened here.

‘I see that you woke up early this day, that’s great, I think we’re actually getting somewhere.

I need not warn you about what’s about to happen since I know that you’re not actually going to listen to anything I say, that’s something I noticed about you people.

You’re not really great at keeping track of things that go over a long enough period of time, so I will keep the important points brief and hopefully, as we furthermore progress into the secondary parts of my checklist, hopefully your subconscious mind might somehow go there, as so pick up on the subtle hints I planted in my speech, and we’ll see what happens I guess. I’ve came up with a great plan and I think many of you will like it.

It’s a ten year plan, and, settle down now, settle down, that is not to say you’re all going to be staying with us over the next ten years, some of you will be free to go, will have your work time here repaid for as well as the overtime some of you Poles had done in be properly repaid, but until then I hope that many of you will end up accompanying me to the end of my plan, without any resentment or any hard feelings as there are.

So as I was saying, I was thinking of expanding the camp as to create a few standing factories in order to stretch over the manufacturing line over the next few years, seeing how this Camp is already turning out to be so successful as it is, I see no reason why we could simply not just go ahead and increase our productivity, especially since there’s an endless supply of workers being sent in.

And make sure you all take your notes, and write down whatever there is because I might end up taking questions at the end of our meeting.

After all, there’s a lot going on in undertaking such an ambitious project as this and I cannot make it alone; since I was aiming to be done with at the very least two small-sized factories we could build on, in the next five years or so, at the very least, that’s to say, It’s going to be hard, I’m not being delusional here, this is going to be mightily complicated since I don’t want to draw the already existing labor from one point to another and fall behind, but you know, I can only hope we could achieve this much in this short a period of time before we expand. Seeing how the camp will exponentially expand, that means that in the next five or so years, by the time we will have gotten through the fuselage and have already entered the next phase, we will have received by then at the very least eight times or even as far as twenty times the population we currently are in hold of, perhaps even more than that, so things will go on much faster than before, that's my point.

In all honesty, the ten years mark is something that's supposed to be more, as to say, hinging in terms of being realistic about what I'm working with. Seeing how you don't make that great of workers, with your skinny weak arms and poor-man genetics, I don't expect my project to be done any time soon, so that's why I'm aiming for some overtime instead.'

The German Count Otto Von Deutschland was also present in the room. He wore a suit that had a person-like wrap embed on it, as if it had been cut in half and sutured on top of it, but without the sockets. Little buttons on the empty black eyes. That was Anne Frank. She was skinned alive, and touched by her father who wrote some weird book about her entitled 'The Decibellum: An entropy.'

'I heard she touched herself, well I touch myself.'

Everyone in the room knew who Anne was. She was one of the Goddesses, of the Holocaust and the Jews killed her, again. There will be no coming back this time around, oh her eyes just opened, I mean her buttons. One of them popped right off and bounced across the room from one side to another.

'You're all going to have to pay for the suit, you know that, right?'

And they scowled at the man nonetheless.

Anne Frank had been with them ever since the very beginning, as she was born in their small village, prior to the war.

What did she put up her cunt? Her father's entire fucking arm, a banana, an openly rotating large peripheral shaped torpedo wing which entered her from every side, I entered her as well, I did.

Life hasn't been easy for her, she was in an attic, where her parents lived with twenty other men of various other obscure nationalities and ethnic groups since they were 'piss-poor' and couldn't afford lending some of their hidden-underneath the floor gold her parents were hoarding. It was a nasty Jew-hovel, a nasty slum they all lived in, day by day Anne but begged to be taken by one of the Germans, especially since she 'lived' closest to one of the windows and the people outside were constantly stopping to stare at the freak show. Sometimes the freak show became a weird point and pick just like the Red district it did, whereas the father would sometimes faint selling her daughter to one of the boldest street passer, at the least ones that weren't too bold as to start throwing boulder at them which meant that someone had to pay for the window, then as they were lured it, ones of the darker guests would simply knob him to the head, as the others would pickpocket the good man. It was a nice racket for a while, but the Germans were eventually tipped at what was going on and before they knew It, the three of them were on the streets again, while the tenants were put to jail.

'I don't like doing this but seeing how you control the economy, we cannot prosecute you for fraud, homicide, theft, or any other kind of premeditated crime you may've been part off.'

‘Then I walk like a free person and I promise you officer that it will not be repeated ever again, I swear it, on my honor as the Judge I am.’ –Life in Germany, pre-war.

Anne-Father was the first to talk:

‘Do not worry, Anne, I shall do my best to have you taken from the streets and to be properly taken care of and groomed.’

‘What do you mean by groomed?’

‘Silence, child, I need to make money in order to afford to make off the losses since a wealthier Jew took all of my hidden assets since he’s the one in control of the police force, him having been my best friend and partner in crime whom I shared all my secrets with only to find myself backstabbed by him, while I’m offered no other choice to earn a living since I cannot work a respectably hard-working job, so I have to force you into prostitution for the time being.’

‘Father, what happened to my sister?’

‘Oh right you had a sister, Margot. I forgot about her. I suppose she’s dead.’

‘How could you say such a horrible thing father?’

‘If she wasn’t there with us when we left, those people we lived in must’ve taken her. In which case, I’m sorry but Margot.’

‘Here I am, father, I’ve come.’

‘You brought money, I suppose?’

‘No father, I was busy trying to escape this place, I’ve been living on the streets for eighteen months since you abandoned me, and it’s been a harsh living and I had to live with the Gypsies for a while, selling copper and other metal scraps I started picking off the junkyards.

And now I’m dressed like them, therefore I’m one of them father and I’m already married or had been married with ten of them but they were put down by a German Raid.’

‘The Germans, ah; they tried killing you.’

‘No father, they seemed to be capable of differentiating me from one of them, at the very least for the time they had entered I was already much more well dressed than they were, having been capable of profiting off them; I bought myself finer silks, some jewels, a few golden rings, a finer mattress, had a few German workers repaint my room and then.’

‘I’m sorry Margot, slow down. My mind stopped after hearing finer silks, and jewels. What happened to those?’

‘They were confiscated, father.’

‘Why are you here then?’

‘Oh father, but please, can you not be grateful that I survived?’

‘I see your face, daughter, and that is a face that cannot make me money by any means. Therefore I’m forced by the law of Tallmud to disown you.

You are not my daughter and I hope you die as you’re being cast to Shell, our dark nigger-skinned version of hell unless you make me some money in which case I shall have you join our family again.’

‘I managed to snuck some coins inside my, pocket.’

And that how they could afford renting a small four by four, for the time being; at the very least, that’s what they could do, since neither of them could work, except Margot, but she didn’t count as a member of the family, Anne’s Father took to writing since it was the only thing he was half-decent at; not by any real means, but he did what he could to earn a living.

Living in Berlin was hard, let alone for a young Jew with a dream, who was also sexually attracted to his daughter, the good looking one that at times looked like a Turk. SO he spent the little money he had to buy her, a second-hand Ottoman she could lean against, spending he entire day on it while her father pretended to be a sketch artist. Instead, he was merely writing the first draft of Anne Frank’s Dairy, milk.

When will they pop? It was peculiar, to say the least. It was the duality of their race. Margot had a nasty-looking butter-face while her breasts were decently shaped, Anne being as flat as a plank while this nymph was rather well shaped overall. As any man might consider this, he was confused. It was truly a peculiar, unexplainable thing, whom to have first? Why was life so unfair? He’s spent a lot of hours imagining both of them like a puzzle or a toy, where you could switch their body parts around in whichever order you wanted to. Anne’s head on top of Margot’s chest, on top his wife’ belly button, he really like that, but concluding with Anne’s lower side, which he cherished the moist.

The most, he cherished her the most. He had to snap out of it, before he was caught off day-dreaming again. But at the same time he just couldn’t stop wasting so many pages of the journal, playing with shapes, with her shapes. Did she even reach puberty? He didn’t know when girls hit puberty. It could be twenty, in which case there was still a chance her breasts will start puffing themselves again.

Life was hard inside, in such a poor place. His belle jiffy was a lazy Jewess who never cleaned the place, unlike German women who were great looking, hard working and knew their place in society while at the same time they weren’t pushovers and knew when to fight and when to draw back as they were both traditional and partially modern, despite the paradox they were set in. Anne-mother was lazy nonetheless, but she had a nice ass, and a big breasts, which were the only thing that mattered to a woman, as they are generally incapable of doing anything else by their own, case and point. For example:

One day Anne Father and Margot found themselves having a conversation in the kitchen. Of course there weren’t any walls there at all, nor was there a curtain as they cheapened out with the apartments, having considered that it would be better to save as much as they could in order to prolong their suffering as much as he could, since, if there was something even worse than working, it was spending money which they never had, although his teeth were all filled and he did own an expensive watch, and he did carry a suitcase with a fine-well suit that appeared to have been brought from some company like Armani he carried on with him at all times, which he cherished and protected more so than he would guard his own life or that of his family in any case.

But he decided, seeing how things were becoming awkward between his daughter and wife, whom were having their usual arguments about the most insignificantly-useless thing a female of any kind, original, metal-congenital distribution could come up with, he decided to entertain something like five minutes of talk with his daughter, seeing how there was no one else around and she'd been pacing around him like a retarded little child following a cherry-flavored sugar-coated blazoned lollipop tied around a cat's behind.

'Is there something you want to tell me perhaps?'

'Father, I finally came up with a great plan to finally rescue us from poverty while placing us up back amongst the likes of aristocracy once and for all.'

Anne-Father but looked at her with coy suspicion. She's never been a sharp child and there was a hammer around the house.

His eyes were bulging and his wicked Rat smile almost cut both side of his cheeks; if only Anne was more like her but less like her so I could touch her. I would lick her really good, nasty little Opera-singer. He could never afford attending one of Wagner's Operas since he was too cheap, although he would've most likely hated it since the Ring of the Nibelungs was after all high-art and his nasty Jewish pretentiousness prevented him from fully appreciating the subtleties of the play, which were at the very least required to be acknowledged and recognized in order for it to be fully appreciated.

He indulged into entertaining her buffoonery as well as her idiotic ideas.

'I'm listening.'

'Well then, seeing how I was clever enough to marry father, you must understand that, it at the very least means that I am entitled to some kind of inheritance, aren't I?'

'From a bunch of Gypsies you were 'married to'? And that's supposed to somehow amount to what now?'

I don't understand where you're going with that Margot, you said they were raided and put down. Margot, polygamy is illegal in Deutschland.'

'Indeed it is, father, but we were never married to begin with, it was a ruse.'

'Margo, I don't understand. I don't know what you mean, then, what. Margot, we cannot afford a Jewish lawyer to get our assets back, let alone our old attic we lived in, may I remind you illegally as we haven't owned the rest of the house, by whichever loophole might've ordained at the very least a few weeks in. Although, that could be somehow prolonged indefinitely, we can't afford one for your nonsense.'

'But I, there's something, I had those jewels and those.'

'Which were confiscated, Margot, gone just like our house and your money, and our people who died now, who were killed on the streets and dragged across the alleys and shot at the back of their heads.'

'What?'

They stopped talking.

The darkness that came after lay in the gray-ashen coffin that was Dresden. In what appeared to be the open crater of a partially blown-off tank, of which hull lay open to the side of the impact stood a long-lost hero by the name of Adolf Hitler, the last champion of humanity during an age of chaos and damnation. He stood there, but thinking, reflecting on the war, on the unaccountable losses and of the casualties that resulted out of facing the entire world, which had unfairly risen against his country and against his brave people. He stood there with his gun directly at his temple, and finally he pulled the trigger without a second thought, yet. Although he had closed his eyes, they were now wide open. Standing as if frozenly in place; as the bullet but grazed his side, and bounced off against the side of his face, he realized that someone, no, something pushed the tip off his temple. As he turned he realized that it was his right arm which had ripped itself off his body, and as it floated in the air, he came to the realization that it was not yet his time to die.

The Flying left arm of Adolf Hitler spoke as it continued levitating in the air:

‘It is not yet your time to die now, Adolf, you must live on and continue your journey for your people, you must realize by now that the fate of the world rests on your shoulders.’

‘But what could I do now that my country, my people lay in ruin, the allies had won, the world is in their hands, and they shall bring destruction upon all mankind instead.’

‘Instead of being saved by you, I know that. At the same time you must not forget why I threw off the gun that could’ve put an end to your life, Adolf.’

You must consider the ultimate solution.’

‘You cannot mean that? You can’t possibly mean that, you know very well more than I do, what the consequences of the final solution are!’

As it happened, the ingenuity of Adolf Hitler never ended, as his genius came up with the ultimate plan of Jewish extermination, which was the only ethnic group that was killed during the Holocaust. He had converted the entirety of the continent with its entire landmass into a giant extermination camp with secretly hidden torture devices and weapons that can only search and kill Jews as well as people with Jewish sounding names. But wait, that also meant.

‘German lives could be at stake, you need to realize that. Since those Jewish rats stole our names, that means every pure ethnic German life is at stake and it could be destroyed as well during the wake of the Final Solution.’

‘The faith of this world rests on your choice, Adolf. One must sacrifice something equivalent to his heart in order to destroy that of which he loathes most.’

Say now, Adolf, are you willing to trade the lives, the history, the culture and everything else that makes your people your people in order to destroy that, that you hate the most?’

‘That choice alone cannot be made by any man!’

‘And for that reason it needs to be done by someone beyond human. It needs to be done by you, Adolf. You have undertaken a grand journey that rests on your shoulders, you must have come to the realization that eventually you would have to take it.’

‘But I haven’t considered the consequences, I’ve blinded by my hatred that I’ve come jeopardize that which I love the most, my people.’

‘And for those very own people you must make this hard choice, Adolf.’

For you’ve yet to realize the true consequences there are to your action and what they mean for the future of the mankind if they’re allowed to live from this point on.’

The final solution is a double edged blade. It brings hope yet it brings destruction with it.

‘What will it be then, Adolf? Will you live in shame from this point on? Forever lost and in search of what could’ve been? Or are you going to take claim of everything and, bring ruin to your enemies at any cost?’

But that was a choice that’s yet to be made. For, despite him bearing the trigger that would bring destruction to all, he was in the end indecisive, as the sacrifice came to such a cost that would never be recovered by any means.

Therefore he was drawn to a still; as a CM to a draw.

‘I’ve killed daughter, several times.’

Said Frank-Father, who stood upon his daughter’s bloody corpse, just as he rested with his tiled back against the wall; he looked at her with a mightily arousal that had taken place. He considered as much but never dared approach her now. She’s been standing there for hours, unmoving as if she’s but hooked entrails, a pig inside a freezer. Nice.

Nicely done, her father things, she’s standing there, she’s awakened by something as if a little bullfrog riding mice, with a foul mouth thrice, she wakes.

‘What happened?’

‘Daughter, your mother and I are getting a divorce, from reality.’

And that is how she woke up inside the Camp.

A few torture chambers were placed around the main stretch of the Experimental Room. A few human beings were present there but they weren’t the ones being experimented upon, no.

There was some Mongoloid Tartar taken from the Island of Crime.

Tartars are born on the evil Isle of Crime, where they rape the natives of Russia nonstop, it’s why it’s called the Isle of Crime, as there are no laws on it; so are no Jews inside of it, since there’s nothing to exploit, other than the superstitious folk that lives in Crime and poverty. Once, a few hundreds of years ago, the land was but of a different name, as it was known as the Empire of Khazar-Hazard. It had gotten its name from the other peoples who appeared out of nowhere and whose bodies looked like Hazmat suits, whose mouths were widely open and malefic looking. Who appeared out of nowhere, way before Kievan Rus, and ate the Jews who desperately attempted exploiting the people of the time. These Hazard people were at the very least two feet over them and they rode giant horses that trampled just about everything, be it mules, forests, planes, people, especially people, and they even ate their women, entirely, within a gulp and they spat them out since they were unwashed and had unkempt nasty raven-dark hair and they smelled in the worst possible manner, like dead fish and dead bats. Seeing how these nasty beings were much more superior than the Asiatic folk, the Jewish people, the Turkic people and the other Nomads that made the Empire, they simply trashed them out, dissolving it in its entirety, while the Hazard Empire took over, there being no trace of it left whatsoever, other than the fame Isle of Crime.

It was an awful place to live in, worse than most African countries, and the Near Eastern ones, worst than living in Russia or in Eastern Europe. Were there even humans inside that country? No.

There were only Tartars, which were born in such a way:

The Hazards were a peculiar people had held supreme power over the lands and over the world. They had a unique ability which allowed them to piss out what they ate. Their liquefied strands were but mixed together only to give birth to primeval humanoids, which were a hodgepodge of the many races they had eaten during their time spend amongst the Khazars.

It is important to note that the Khazars survived for a long enough period of time for the inception of the Tartars to occur, therefore they were but given a chance to somehow make amends with their past mistakes. But seeing how many of them were members of the tribe, they succumbed to their evil, tried exploiting the Mongoloids, got kicked out, mixed with the other people, then they formed a mongrellic race that would later exploit and destroy the countries they invaded and were put in, 's economies.

Not even the Russians want to deal with the Island of Crime for obvious reasons. But speaking of it is useless, and morose.

For there is something in the very ground of it which had been fed over a long enough period of blood by a combination of Tartar slaughter and Semite blood libel, the blood of which but kept them living, even to this day. There, hundreds, thousands of the Hazards lay living, in a land that's rotten. Dormant yet eternal, the blood not but keeping them alive-alive but rather partially awake as to record the passing of the time which in turn allowed them to grow in power and in might. Their dreams were no mere lousy things, as they were but creating, shaping and redistributing matter such as the likes of man has never seen before. They brought a mere gangrene destruction with them, as they followed through with their inventions.

During nights of woeful sleep where they would but reshape the stars, out there in the sky one could see the satiations of broken cars, buildings and things that rose from time to time, brought by them into the air and then defiled. They were but dreamed off as well, and seen as if they were projections and messed with as they were made to appear everywhere, on anything even the likes of a child would look at, despite his wonder, what were they? The Hazards no longer rose, they were like poison but solid and everything they touched but foamed and fell, and choked to death, life could not survive alongside them.

The Tartars indeed had learned from a young age that they themselves were not immune, merely sturdy enough to completely adhere to this never ending poison which threatened to devour them, almost completely to a point where they would've died otherwise. That they would be completely devoured and left to rot with the rest of the dead-worms and scarabs that adorned the ground like jeweled relics that were not touched by man. They purposefully cut the soles of their feet as to quench the thirst that was required by the dead-heap that lay beneath them. From as far away as they could reach, they had adopted the rituals of blood libel as their own, only to go as far as they could and claim what was rightfully theirs, and keep it as their own. As for the land, without the constant influx of sacrifice, there would be no way for it to endure.

‘The sacrificial blades are to be brought at the hour of Eastern Solstice.’

It came to be brought much sooner in the wilds.

A land lay there, emptied as if awaited for something to be risen. A mild soundless wind had traveled forth from the South, from the East, From the North and from the West. It brought much unrest to the people who had gathered around the sacrificial stones, who were but already over-wrought by their Shamanistic practices, which governed over their souls. Many wore tribalistic markings around their faces as well as little cuts they had made themselves. Some were wearing mightily concocted things of their own making, like little stringed beads of throne-mast, from the chipped fall through of a fallen plane which had arrived. Neither of the pilots survived the crash, yet they had already but got rid of the bodies, having brought their helmets and their apparel as offerings for their chieftain whom but spoke to the land itself.

His eyes were but bent backwardly, set as to look out of their way, to be fully extended as to convey the message come to him, flown through by the Hazards themselves before the times of war flew through.

‘I am listening, masters, lords, makers of our kind, we, your servants have gathered forth.’

And as if a great crate shaped out of light appeared above them; flashing with a jade-like pattern from which the likes of a strange creature broke through the very edges of the crate. It spoke to them in the most peculiar fashion. It but wrought them to ask, to make and lay and put aside whatever they held an listen as they had.

‘My creations, my pitiful things I have aided towards making of blood and entrails of many men I’ve eaten while I had been alive. I’ve summoned you within reason for the call and promise that you may obey. That you may leave the Isles of Crime this very night and make your way to the Farther lands that you may stumble upon the likes of man, that you may claim as many lives as you can in our names, for we reek of stench, this land of wretch may not be able to house you no longer. Within a generation forth you shall die.

But alas, there is hope that you may bring forth your descendants, from as far as farther lands, where lay. Many of them shall be brought forth to stay, and to the future of your days, where there might be, only a handful of you shall survive as far to see it happen.’

‘And what of our tribes and what of whom had settled to blind us for such kindness as you’re offering us?’

‘You shall settle down with what you’re given and nothing more, you shall bring forth no predecessor as those might be called.

But you may still turn to those whom fights, might swallow through as to a sight as you’ve come to press against. Leave this place and don’t return until you’ve brought forth what we asked you for.’

And since that moment they but rode, as far as they could go, without stopping, as for the war; it barely started.

‘I fucked Judea in the ass.’

‘That’s right, brother, that’s what I’ve been saying.’

‘I know, I did her good, haven’t I?

Let me tell you something, her brother just sold her to me.’

‘That’s insane, he did?’

‘Of course he did, sold her right up, extremely cheap. If I had it my way, I bet I would’ve ended up with his mother as well.’

‘That’s sick.’

‘You don’t know the half of it.’

‘What else?’

‘I brought her hope, then I made her get on her knees and I.’

‘General!’

Every man in the Infantry got up. Especially Donnahue who was present there for the time being, a rifleman who wore twenty carbines strapped to his back, eight revolvers and a rocket launcher; while some of the men were armed with flame throwers, missile sling shots, acid sprays, gas-bombs with pressure resolvers attached to them, as in they had like twenty one shot capable off revolvers attached to every side of the bomb that spread both mustard gas and shot the bullets in every possible direction the bomb was thrown in. One of them had a boomerang blade with exploding bullets made out of fists he carried on with him as well as strange rocket-shield that exploded upon being touched. But they survived for long enough to hear the General begin talking.

‘Get up men, straight your back, I will have order even if this is the last thing I have to do, do you hear?

Johnny Parkstentch, Oddwax Charlantan, George Praire, and Alpha-Ox, you are to be dispatched immediately to aid the Germans as to drop bombs on their camps.’

‘How is that going to aid them, sir?’

‘You will not question my authority and the sigil of the United States, you will die for whoever I tell you to, because I am the Government.

And if there's an institution that's even stronger than human beings, niggers or Semites, it's the Government, boys.

I think we can all agree that killing people, hey; fair game is fair game, if you understand what I'm saying. We must kill as.

We must rinse Dresden to the ground.'

'Why, sir?'

'Because there are Semites inside the very ground, they grow from ashes, they grow inside their own dead people. Follow me and you will understand.'

They all brought to a surgery room. There was an ugly looking Semite man on the table.

The doctor waited for him to act, they both nodded to one another, so that he might proceed.

As soon as the surgery began, the men were immediately repelled by what they saw. It was horrible. But in every dark creature there were eight or ten at the very least, ten little maggot-kikes hiding inside of him, squirming around, wriggling as to grab whatever body part they could still sell off to the black market. They were nastily pale, deformed, disgusting, repulsive as such, they held no pulse, they were all chewing on foreskin, since they were all but taken from the insides of a split-open Rabbi. It made sense why for every dead Semite, forty of them emerged, and those things being incinerated meant that a hundred more of them died at the very least.

'You see now, the Germans are unaware of it yet. But their land is infested with these little sub-human parasites. First they ate their economy, weakening their force, and now they're sucking dry their ranches and now they're destroying their agriculture, which in turn ends up destroying their hopes that they might be able to save their economy somehow.'

It was known by every man. The inflation turned German bread into German tanks since they had the same price.

So every German boy, as clever as they are, which may be a reason why Adolf decided to enlist them in the army; instead of buying bread, they bought tanks since they were the same price.

And they destroyed everything. They were running down cars and people, and shooting down buildings and they were but unstoppable. They went on a rampage.

'Ini mini miney mo, crack a woman I should do. Split her open in between;' Couldn't finish it, her head was been, and flew right, like a Champagne bottle, through the window, then within. One of the Jewesses passing through was but gritted in, her head but split by many shards, her glassy-beads were but gone.

What a strange thing it was. One day she was walking down the streets, cheerio and happy as for a beautiful day it was. Then a tank appeared out of nowhere and walked over her, no trampling. Good boy.

Seeing how the kids prove themselves too much to handle, the country is left with no other choice to fix the economy other than to invade another country, so Deutschland then invades Poland. There sure are a lot of Ethnic Polish people with Jewish names living there, or so says the raccoons.

And every raccoon is taken care of; of everything that happened.

The economy is trash, the rats are maggots and all of them but take what they can out of it. The Raccoons are but left in charge of fixing everything.

Enough of it; dark things that they were, as wretched as they but appeared everywhere they could see.

It was the first sign of death, one of the many dark points where actual heaps were put in, where graves were struck outside, where the very living appeared to be molded out of the ground and put to waste. It was the death of dreams, of fantasies, and of every living thing on a battlefield where Poland met the Deutsch, where field of rancor but spread in both direction, and valiant men but forced to retreat in whichever possible direction they could end up riding through.

The skies were reddened, green, yellowed as the mustard gas, it spread throughout the ground, whereas Polish-like Cossacks but came soon after.

Twenty paratroopers bombing the jut off the corners of the world; children yet to be employed, the many markings of the ancient Polish groves but fallen through; little more than a few million rockets were but blasted through the land, as the Deutsch was but desperate to claim what wasn't theirs. It was the death of both kinds which but made the very blood of the paratroopers stop in place before retreat. From the many lands below the heaps, and from wherever other place one could see, the dead men rising but to pick a gun, from the darkest recesses, beyond the ground and into the crypt some fell; before their time was done, many other men had followed, not to allow others to come as well. As there were medics just about each corner of the first line they made.

Twenty eight formations pacing back and forth, readying themselves as more men joined. Then came the first Blitzkriegs, giant floating pulsating watchtowers with their known-for sigils, little Totemkephths, giant metal skulls opened and blasted the land in front of them, charging power atoms that linked together and completely obliterated everything in front of them as they created super-rays of destruction that manifested giant moon-shapes of energy that dipped into the very ground, creating giant moon-crates all across the land. The Blitzkriegs then put themselves on top of one another, crisscrossing their beams and their rays into strange rotating wheels of energy that had eyes and mouths on them which darkened as for what the energy looked like, creating reality rips inside of them which bore magnetic pulls which drew in the brave Polish men who were instantly vaporized by the complete show of power and domination the superior technology displayed. Electrical spikes, spears, javelins, knives and power-blow-torch satchels were thrown and launched soon after from the wheels of destruction, completely destroying everything in sight as they were but actioned from the distanced and homed heat signatures like homing missiles, leaving glowing Polish man-shaped cask death-masks floating in the air after they were destroyed, which exist to this very day there as a reminder of their bravery as they fought for their nation. Entire fields were filled with the death-masks.

Power grills appeared in the sky as they were burning through clouds and through the very oxygen atoms that were kept around, imploding into peculiar sights from beyond the world as the very fabric of reality was being broken into pieces by the Blitzkriegs, which appeared to have formed a dark power shield around them with many human shapes that floated inside of it as their souls, and the souls of those who died in agony as they were being killed by these great machines of destruction were but screaming and begging to be released.

But Poland pulled out its secret weapons, their Seven TP which was a code word for how long it took for it to disappear from sight and reappear wherever the drivers willed them to.

All of the sudden the entire battlefield was filled with Seven TP's which warped out of nowhere, and before the Germans could hide away their shock and excitements they were but blasted over like thunder-busters that shot out of nowhere, curving the ground as the shots began ricocheting everywhere they could land, bouncing around the people and their weaker tanks, then immediately disappeared as they teleported out of the way before the moon-shaped atoms could be brought to full force, then they appeared behind the Blitzkriegs and unloaded however much they could, trying to blast them down and destroy them completely but their power-shields were too much to take, and they were then blowing trades as the giant death watchtowers were but unleashing as many rays of energy as they could. Trading and lacerating the very land as they were but bringing millions of beams out of their power shields, spraying and praying before the TP's disappeared again.

And then the light tanks were floating there in the air, having made a peculiar maneuver with which they were but flipped around like a plane could, facing the very ground as well as the top of the death-towers, when they began their onslaught again.

The fields no longer had living men troops which both began fleeing in both directions as the destruction was too much to take on either side. When all of the sudden the Tartars emerged, like a bunch of cutthroats, out of nowhere they appeared to be riding a giant Hazard head which shot long red-blackened in the middle hose-shaped beams that contorted and rotated like worms but were plastic and elastic and rubbery despite the fact that they were made out of pure energy which wrapped around the Blitzkriegs, and attempted to wrap around some of the lowest hanging TP's which immediately disappeared out of sight.

And out of nowhere the allies started dropping bombs but they appeared too soon, while they dropped hundreds and thousands of bombs at once, all of them but missing all of the floating tanks which popped in and out of existence, and the giant helmet which was too sturdy, while being completely useless against the power-shield surroundings the Krieg; then they accidentally dropped a concentration camp which smashed against it as well and there was another Holocaust that happened over, then they stopped and everyone went their own way.

That was the end of the first battle over Poland. So far there's only been a draw.

But followed after was a draw in blood, as not in libel; much worse.

Ten days passed, and it looked it a stand-still, all across the continent. Nothing happened.

It was nineteen forty five, in Belgium, but in the rest of the world, only in Belgium could such a thing happen. It was clear enough what had happened on the streets, this was a result of the Judaic-disease being allowed to spread, uncontrollably so. It was horrible, nasty, contorted, deformed. They made mockery of architecture by putting bubbles on top of Gothic Chapels, then painted it green, and yellow and scrawled on top of it like a child, and then they spat on, with period blood and called it women's rights. They made men wear dresses, and fucked their kids, the Jews did. And called it art. Comedy macabre in some way, as in they killed them after, the kids did. The kids rose up and killed the Jews. Good riddance they yelled and shouted soon after. With rocks and fire they burned them and bled the Semites, and put them in garages. And for their acts of bravery, ever since, kids are allowed to purchase guns in Belgium, so that they may never be killed or done by no crooked hooked nosed evil man ever again.

Everything that happened so far during the war happened over the course of a single day.

Second day, in one of the conversation camps; fewer and fewer days until the great coming of the conversion camps, when they're to be freed from all pain and all that is impure.

'Misha, do you know why I called you here, boy?'

'I don't know, why?'

'What do you think about this?'

Has but pointed at the pool. It was where the baptism happened. Their rite of passage into the next world, so their spirits would stop being evil. For god was lightning and thunder struck.

'Boy, do you want why this happened?'

'No, why?'

'I.'

'Do you want to know why this all happened?'

'Go on.'

'It started one hundred fifty five years ago, six.'

'What was that?'

'Just, nothing, I just have to remember the number six.'

'I will remember the number six then, what does it mean?'

'Nothing, it means nothing, I simply like the number, now stop interrupting me before I stab you.'

It all started a few hundreds of years ago, two hundred at the very least, where a man by the name of Karl Marx was born to a family of butchers that goes without saying what they killed. There weren't animals where they lived. Enough with sophistries; he was simple man of book, who grew up in a peculiar family of high-beaked humanoids that were but trying to study the secrets of the arcane, drawn from the book of evil, that was the Tallmud.

This book of vileness was ancient, dating to the times of Babylon, where their ancestors, a group of weirdly swarthy people with even higher beaks had contorted their even more ancient beliefs as to fit their own wrong-doings as to earn themselves easier lives at the cost of other people's livelihoods, unknown to them that this peculiar set of beliefs would actually guide their 'evolution' in the worst possible manner there is. By adhering to such peculiar set of beliefs, they had created an evil code that contorted their minds and bodies, creating a sociopathic people whose bloated minds seem to devour everything in their paths while at the same time twisting in the most peculiarly unfathomable ways there are. For a man saw beauty in a stone, one of these evil creatures saw to exploit the man instead of joining him in the admiration of the stone.

It was beautiful stone, not because it was a stone. But because what the man saw in that stone; as the man saw himself in that stone, which in turn made him sculpt and create beauty ever-lasting, at least for a short period of time in any case. As nothing lasts other than the illusion of eternity and what comes after it.

These evil beings found a way to modify themselves, in the same manner a surgeon would cut a piece of cancer, they but managed to create it, to spread it and have it even further grow; not entirely the same thing, in principle.

Regardless of it, they had seen themselves as gods that were beyond the likes of common men whom they saw fit to abuse, whip, to sell to other nations, to constantly betray, backstab, opening the gates for the Moors in Spain, having their Radhanites sell white women to evil folk that would rape them, to have killed children over various centuries, to have brought the Bubonic plague upon the likes man amongst a never ending list that stands as a testimony to their mischievous nature. All of this being a cause of their embed sick mind which was both a cause of their evil book which affected their genetics, as well as the other way around, being predisposed to their peculiarly deformed ways.

One of their descendants was a fat man dressed in black, with an unkempt face and beard by the name of Karl Marx, who recognized a problem in the world, that being, it wasn't exploitable enough by his people, as said his Rule of Conducts, the Tallmud; yet he was incapable of coming up with something on his own, until one day, where he was met by a strange figure.

Theirs was a strange people as well, yet in a different manner, a strange people indeed that came out of nowhere, who simply popped into existence, dressed in animal fur, and weird Gothic armor of their own design, they would later be known as the Germanics. As strange as they were, they were also strong in might, as they defeated the various nations and kept their land from being taken over, over the Rhine where they had ruled since forever, the beginning of time, even before the Homosapiens came to life, they were there.

And even before there was such a thing as recognizable technology, they were there, making it. Such was their way, that they had sacked the Anglo Saxons, the Romans, the English people before they were English, even before them, during such times when they were Vikings, they sacked everyone, every single day, the Russians, the Greeks, every single nation of this world has been sacked by the Germanic people at the very least once. And when their economy died one day in the future, they did the only thing they knew best, they sacked another nation of their valuables, but they did that with pride and without shame, and that excuses it, by all acceptable means.

They built great architectural wonders as well, as they were but the inventors of high art, literature, and although they fell behind in other fields, they still managed to keep up the traction until they became a great nation.

Engels was such a man that came out of a great line of German kids; and as one lures a kid by the promise of something sweet, so did Marx get a hold on little Engels, whom would come to help him in his time of need.

For their union created one of the Ten Black Books of Death, the first one being the Communist Manifesto, which was simply put the modernization of the Tallmud.

‘Which in turn brings us to this day and what caused the war to begin with.’

It was the impact of the first Black Book of Death, of which initial great insertion reddened the plains of the Russian Empire as to drown it in blood.

‘It was carried over by unnatural dreams.

One dark stormy night, a great evil specter conjurer by the name of Lenin divined the book and its contents in his mind. And in his womb stood a greater evil by the name of Lenin.’

‘Stalin.’

‘I see that you’re aware of your people’s history and the reason you’ve been brought there Misha.’

The Isle of Zion was given birth by a simple network of many pipes that was widely spread and hidden in every sewer there was across the continent as well as it bordered the Asiatic lands as well. In order for it to be given birth, a great blood sacrifice had to be made.

‘Millions of people had to be killed over countless generations, you see?’

For that very Island you were born in couldn’t have existed otherwise, without the intervention of your greatest assets you could’ve stumbled upon.’

‘Which is?’

‘Why, isn’t it obvious? The people, the non-kikes who did the heavy lifting for you, their only crime being, as gullible as they were, trusting you in the first place; for that reason, for that very peculiar reason you are standing here today.

Because of a legacy tainted with blood.

Because beneath the island you’re standing on there’s but a clotted growth of coagulated blood and pipes that’s been wrought out of innumerable deaths that have been committed by your people across centuries of control, manipulation and exploitations, that is why you’re here. Because that evil Island still stands in there, while every other place is made to decay. Isn’t that clear enough for you?’

As the Conjurer but wrought a deadly revolution that brought the deaths of millions of people. As the countless attempts to emancipate the people ended up, nearly so in the destruction of the benefactors, time and time again, without exception.

‘And that which is connected with the tip of the blood Ice-berg, is but still here, below the ground, still rotting us to this day, as well to the future ones.

The pipes still clog the continent, they still require blood, and that is something we cannot give any longer, you understand where I'm going, right? It's nothing personal, but there's a blood debt you're not willing to acknowledge and that is something that cannot be forgiven, by any man.

One eye for one eye, one tooth for one tooth, as the Babylonians used to say, nothing more, nothing less, no interest. As much as a man deserves.'

Misha never remembered what the man told him, but he most definitely threatened to kill his family, from what he understood. He also remembered the number twelve, the man had told him.

It was settled, he would escape the camps one way or another and live on the streets for a while and make his way to the promised land, the United States of America where his people lived and did the nastiest things they could come up with, like give women rights and allowing his people in the Congress, both of which were things that no sane person would adhere to, but then again, it was something he had no say into.

'There was a lot of work going on, from what I remember.

They asked me undress as to not get my clothes all muddy and wretched.'

'How were you captured sir?'

'I? Well I was a worker in the Soviet Union's great Railway. I did my job as best as I could and I never asked questions.'

'At what moment did you realize that there was no way out and you were about to get captures? Describe the scene to me.'

'I think it happened, out of nowhere. I woke up one day in my bed, inside one of the wagons, as we were asked to sleep at our workplace, you know, to make everything right when was needed. And I simply just got up to find myself surrounded by eighty men, all dressed in military attire. They looked rather vaguely annoyed, like the people are, you know what they look like?'

'I've had the pleasure of being acquainted with a few of them at the very least.

But tell me, is there a reason why a railway worker finds himself surrounded by so many of these men from the opposite side?'

'I'll admit that I was just as confused at first, but it all started coming back in after being placed into one of their trains.'

'One of their trains?'

'They carried one from their home.'

'Home?'

'They lived in a barrack that was set on rails, in the middle of which there was a small depression on top of which they put the train in.'

‘It was one of their steam engine ones, right?’

‘One of the dark ones, indeed it was. But it was strange, they didn’t talk at all, and for some reason their mouths were sutured in place.’

‘What do you mean in place?’

‘They were falling over as if they were constantly melting, and they would take constant breaks from breathing, as I could see an end to their breaths.

They kept pulling on those black threads in order to put them back in place. And they were pale, like dead soldiers, who were listening to me sleep. I remember when I first saw them.

I lied, I think I did. I think, I hope it doesn’t bother you that.’

‘It’s all right if you’re having trouble going through it, I’m listening.’

‘They appeared in my dreams first, I thought, until I’ve come to the realization that they were there with me, throughout the night, and they haven’t even moved or touched upon a thread while I saw queer eyed and slit open.’

‘Why were they there?’

‘I don’t understand why, their train was rotten and fell apart, I think they made it along the way. Everything in that barrack seemed to be falling apart with them holding on the falling debris and on every other piece that came along and almost fell through.

And they were silent, at all times. Standing still, without breathing, without blinking; always there, trying to have their way with.’

‘What?’

‘I think there was a figure they were chasing, I don’t know what gave me this impression, or why she was there, running in the distance. But they were pulled towards that dark outline, which was running in the snow.

We were drawn along as if we were in a couch, a long time ago, but I have no recollection of what drew me to that point or why it happened to begin with or.’

‘Why you woke up with your missing joint.’

Ivan simply drew back his leg-curtains, there were horrible scratch marks jutting about the place.

Yet the bodies of those captors themselves began falling apart with everything else.

‘You were released along the way, from what I come to understand.’

‘And I followed the figure soon after.’

It was a hard walk.

There was a sniper hidden in the cold.

Ivan turned around and looked at his captors' barracks. It bore a few empty hollows inside of it, long shots that went as they came without leaving a trace of even having come there. Of even having been shot in the first place. This was a mine field, but the mines weren't buried in the soil.

Well beyond him and into one of the fronts.

There stood a single man by the name of Schopenhauer White, in a tiny café that stood by some middle-streets, where he stood in, drinking out of a cup of coffee.

It was the Weimar Republic, and it was a mess, he remembered what it had been even before the war started. He was an old man after all, too wearied out to take it, to see the youth changed in such a manner.

It happened during one of the nights.

There was a group of youth that broke through some window and began stealing from a thrift shop, then they went ahead and stole a few orphans as well, taking them as a requirement for the party they were supposedly invited to. That lousy-nasty thing was horrible to foresee. Languid in some piteous manner; cars had their tires taken and replaced with weird discs the women drew weird lipstick faces. At first White thought the message was right, since he had seen the words written on it 'Fuck niggers' until he finally drew near and realized there was an 'I' before it. He rushed to it, but he couldn't tear it out, because his sight was almost drawn away. A few feet from where he stood there was an open dumpster with a body in it. A woman's body lay rotting in with, and within her open hand there was a partially unrolled lipstick that all of the sudden fell out of her hand, then bounced against the ground a few times, then it rolled towards him. He picked it up for a moment before he stopped and turned around. There were a few officers who had been waiting for him who immediately turned from him to the car-tires, then back at him, pulling out their batons before proceeding to beat him relentlessly, leaving him bloodied next to the car he had vandalized; but all of the sudden, all four of the officers stopped, quickly having turned towards the general direction where the body was. As soon as they noticed it, they but pulled him up and shook him off his feet.

'I must apologize sir, I have not realized. We thought you were part of the contagion.'

'What contagion is there?'

'You did not know yet? They didn't tell you? Shh, we're being watched.'

A long legged as it its head reached one of the high-lamps in height creature that was dressed in a woman's dress with a largely deformed elongated face like that disc or weird cotton trampoline shaped disc with a pseudo-female face peeked out of the corner. It had cut-outs through which one could see a pair of humanoid eyes. Its hands were lichen, wrapped around a child, or some ballerina-dressed dwarf it held within its gasp.

'That contagion, it's something you must if you're a new comer. This Republic is damned, is damned.'

'You must leave while there's still time to return, before you catch the virus.'

The trenches were already dug, there were flies around, and weird colors that occupied every building that stood in place.

Beneath the tall creature stood a few, even shorter than the dwarves, Semites. Which were much shorter, like garden gnomes, all dark, but their noses were the size of his feet, and their eyes bulged as if they had gotten rabies from somewhere. They knew what the officers would do to them.

‘You must be sanitized immediately before the change takes place, remember, it only takes a few hours for it to happen and if it does.’

‘We have children, you understand?’

‘Of course.’

He was taken by the Officers and put in a pseudo-laboratory room they built inside their van. Every few minutes or so they looked over their shoulders, in order to make sure they weren’t being followed, there was still hope that this infection could somehow still be prevented before it fully spread. Various measures for precaution had already been taken, but that was not enough. Surgical apparatuses as well as mechanically altered hands taken from some of the bodies were put to great use. White looked around the room; he noticed the hand written notes, expressing people’s desire to further aid the project even in their death. This level of devotion was somewhat frightening yet understandable. They were working non-stop. He was given eighteen shots at the very least, out of a weird mixing plate that had a few fluid-filled vials of different colors that were put together in different combinations before he was administered each shot. There was another peculiar set of devices which were used for blood drawing, sealing, then tube-replacement that just as soon was stored in one of the secret compartments inside the van. His eyes were scanned by a reddish blue light which appeared to form a weird light representation in front of him which began slowly constructing a few models of his ancestors as they once stood in his place. After the machine was done scanning, they were inserted in a database on a screen which immediately recognized his name, displaying not only a photo of him but a life-like representation as if it were some simulation. A second actual living descendant was created and put in front of him as if he was actually there. This reconstruction attempted to begin talking but it reconsidered. It spoke in a perfect accent and merely wrapped his hand around the man’s shoulder before he nodded. A note of pride was changed between the two men before the figure disappeared. He shed no tear and they were already entered into one of the complex scientific-contagion zones where the other side of the Republic already proceeded to isolate the elderly, the unaffected youth, the people and some of the foreigners during what appeared to be one of the longest night the world had to suffer.

Everyone was either severely frightened or rather quaky and uneasy.

Meanwhile outside was worse, the part of the Republic which was infested appeared to be a complete organic thing of its own, having spread over the cars, among the ‘citizens’, the buildings themselves, the patches of sky which was in their proximity, having grown peculiar growths around the edges which forced the entire area to slightly emulated a flight, as it rose from where it stood, ever so slightly as a few meters off the ground, not in flight only a step’ wise.

It wasn’t safe approaching them, since they had already gathered inside the building, in small rooms, where the tallest ones already spread across the corners like growths, their heads in place of the ceiling-lamps, their legs growths across the floors, their arms extended like swings, in which they were but wrapped round the orphans; they stuffed them with something, forced them to take shots, while the little dark things but leaped at them, having only reached this far for the soles of their toes before the orphans were being lifted from them. Up and away, down and away, not even close before the rabbits had their way.

‘They snuck the niggers in the Republic, and the monkeys destroyed.’

Far from the front there was this.

Their side and that which was ours; two giant formidable stretches that met like forces that opposed one another desperately as one attempted to prevent the spread of the other, while the other desperately attempted to get inside of it. Yet there was problem, since people were put into the contagion-prevention center, there was no way for the disease to spread since it needed the people in the first place in order to corrupt. It was supposed to be a stalemate, until they deployed the niggers. As they were sent and only receded to their natural behavior as they began destroying and stealing what they could from as many abandoned houses as there were. These niggers were their frontier-men, in an army of freak shows who would not lift a finger to help.

Assuredly so, Weimar’s poisoned what Weimar could, and since there were no fresh subject and since the niggers took what they could and ran away; expectedly so, as they left their children behind; the people of the Republic began poisoning one another, in the worst possible manner.

It was then that the first official butcherment of a man happened. Although it is widely known that eunuch existed long before it happened, especially the nigger slaves who would be castrated and made to lay in pits of burning sand for hours, being only given water every now and then, violently so with knives, a practice of the Turks, Arabs, Berbers, Africans and whichever other tribe enslaved them, this was the first time they called a eunuch a woman. Not officially as such practices of calling one that could be traced back to ancient Egypt and well beyond, yet this was the modernization of the practice. And this had only been the beginning of the end. They butchered people and called it science; yet as opposed to having useful practices to these procedures, these didn’t.

‘What is this made for?’

‘I don’t know, we obtained nothing of value from this procedure.’

‘Then why are we doing it?’

‘Money!’

And for that reason, the world is corrupt.

The contagion kept spreading, wriggling its malformed arms all around the place, everywhere where it could spread, doing the nastiest of practices, the most volatile acts of destruction that could poison the air, and in the filth that began evaporation on top of their side of their Republic, through the gaseous vapors that were released in the air, one could see the tendrils of a great dark creature with a peculiar humanoid nose rearing its ugly head in.

And then the doctors took screwdrivers and performed live-abortions; they ate and raped children and they were all Jews, all of them without exception. But this is not to be included in any of the testimonies.

As the evil people came out of nowhere and began killing everyone in the Republic, having grown bored of sitting, they took what they could, their lugers which every man in the country had and stormed in as fast as possible. Since only 'men' owned lugers, that also meant that everyone in Weimar was unarmed; especially since the niggers ran away, since they're known to carry firearms on them, even the poor ones and especially the invalids.

It was a bloodbath that ran across the streets.

They simply charged in as fearless as a Blitzkrieg, as strong as one could be, marching as they trampled everything in their path, having no other option but to employ the help of the scientists whom, seeing how they were being rushed and not given any option but to work on the clock, they made some pseudo fire-throwers they put to their employ, being forced to burn as much as they could in order to destroy the evidence of such degeneracy as there ever was. Spinal-corded spring-legged Semites desperately clung on the large dressed abominations that were but set aflame, being chased on the streets, away from any living thing as to fend the young from seeing their acts of desperation. Only a handful of them were rescued in time as most of them had already been severely scarred and corrupted, shaped beyond belief, as the doctors but had but already started their malignant processes and doings on the orphans, nothing was sanctified for them, nothing beyond their filthy hands.

Everyone stopped, they looked around the sky. There could be some allies out there, readying themselves as to drop bombs on top of them, too soon, too soon. That could be the reason behind the niggers fleeing out of sight, you never know with those people.

Meanwhile, people weren't as fortune as they were, in Berlin.

The unemployment had taken a toll on people's minds. They didn't have a work place because some people undercut them in order to increase profits and hire more of their own people, in turn, having it turned it all to themselves.

A German lost the first world war; just like that.

And they before they knew it, they were being invaded with Poland whom had been neutral for the very first part of the war, seeing how the neighboring nations didn't play fair, they but switched their entire focus to manufacturing billions of Seven TP's, just because they were incredibly useful. They took over Germany in one day, but they ended up all being teleported in the camps from inside their TP's, because the Germans actually infested their country which moles who stole their secrets and who made a serum that was injected into Polish people that turned them into tanks. The Poles were not held in the camps for more than seven seconds. Having decided that they cannot be killed, they simply left the Germans to their own doing, while also the serum was lost before they could test it on their own people; as this was the first time they performed human experiments, they were deemed as a failure.

The kikes weren't getting a day off by any means, for what they've done.

At Holomodor.

There was once a peaceful land known as Holomodor. It was a peculiar land filled with a lot of great people who seemed to mind their own business as they bothered no one. Seeing how some perfidious creatures existed, much more different than the Albions, they but woke up one day and approached the Holomodorians, the people who lived in Holomodor. By approach, that is meant, they slaughtered them beyond belief, during the night when they were all sleeping, they turned brother against brother and while they were busy in-fighting, they slaughtered their young like cattle in order to feed the tubes.

Why are Jews so evil? One may ask himself.

One day in the future, there was a great ship filled with canons and harpoons and machine guns and subatomic missiles and long-shot artillery hangars with planes inside of them, head-finders that would melt any high-heat producing living being amongst other advanced weaponry. That ship was named USS Liberty. One day while it was at sea, a bunch of kikes came out of nowhere and began attacking them. It was a one died battled. A lot of American troops died, just like that, and being so confused because those kikes were supposed to be their allies, they just didn't fight back, although they could've completely slaughtered, disemboweled, and completely annihilated them just like the snap of one's fingers. It was horrible. And that, was soon after swept under the rug. It is obvious that kikes are mental invalids, but then again, so are niggers.

These things need not be described, as one can only experience them once.

What remains of the USS Liberty now lays inside a shipyard at the bottom of the ocean, where the bodies of its soldiers rest in, their number being much higher than the victims of the.

There was nice change in the camps, they were being allowed to breathe some fresh air for once.

'Hess, I think you're being promoted. Yes, sir, you are being promoted and allowed to go on a boat to the States, since the war is over, we surrendered.'

The bombing just happened all over Dresden, right after Germany surrendered. It was a Holocaust.

'As you may have figured out by now, the Yanks stole our heavy water and our German scientists and they perfected our nuclear weapons which in turn were used against us. They also destroyed most of our death camps, and killed most of our inmates we desperately tried keeping alive.'

Except Misha, who remembered everything he saw happen during his stay in the infirmary.

'You're being transferred to a different branch now, where you will serve with the Yanks, seeing how everyone seems to fear you, son, since you're a giant German. It is incontestable, that I've never seen something as frightful as this thing that stands in front of me. For all the terror I've seen happen during the war and on the front, I've never seem something like it.

I do not know what they fed you. I do not know whether there are others like you but if there are, God have mercy on our souls, because I dread to think what might happen to either of us if we lived in a world filled with giant Germans.'

And with that came the trials and the lynching.

Upon the end of the war, a few state figures were present in front of the captured high ranking generals as well as the other high-ranking figures like the officers and the soldiers as well as everyone else. This was the court.

The judges were as following, Lenin the conjurer, with his own, barely attached figure Stalin who stood by him, connected by a still oozing umbilical cord. A Rabbi standing next to them, a few Semite Congressmen and Coalstein who was called to attend the court not as a part of the jury but as one of the judges. A fair trial. A fair trial indeed.

All the Germans, including those that were not involved at all were also called to attend the trial since they were also conspirators, all of them, even the foreigners, even the people who housed or tried hiding the kikes were also conspirators, the children as well. The buildings they shot down with their tanks were not actually houses but modern Jew-buildings, filled with tribesmen. And every single one of them, including those who didn't, killed at least one Jew; the numbers started piling up. There were so many documents, which would never be shown to anyone else, but it happened nonetheless and they existed, just like Vatican library in which they apparently stored some documents but the whole Papacy was under their control as well.

'Coalstein, seeing how you're one of the judges, will you also attend the jury as well as the witness booth?'

Everyone in the Jury was a Semite also.

This happened after the end of the first world war and before the Holocaust happened.

'I will begin, if I may, esteemed members of the jury by telling you my story and how it all happened.'

He began retelling his story to minute detail, something that would be repeated word for word even eighty years prior and after the event as if he's written it down first then memorized it on its entirety.

'I was born in Germany, like any other German. I worked hard to earn a living and I helped my fellow; but out of nowhere, the devil came out of nowhere and he killed me.

His name was Adolf Hitler. He was an evil man, who did evil things and blamed it all on us. We never did anything wrong, we never hurt anyone, at all. Wherever we went, we tried helping the societies we lived in.'

One of jury members got up, pulled out a gun a shot him in the head. It was one of their own, but why would they do that to themselves?

The trial was cut short, and they were given a short break to readdress everything that happened. They would meet again in a week, until then, every single Deutsch man was put under house arrest, which destroyed their economy again.

The world was cyclic in some way, the field was a disaster, and Citadels rose from the bowels of the earth. A second world, a third one, a fifth and eleven more wars happened, all of the same time with the Bolshevik Revolution and the Communism spread and every other conflict known to many which happened across the continent. It's no wonder that many of the documents got burnt, destroyed, annihilated, and completely torn to shreds. It was a chaos of destruction, of death.

Another flu came soon after from Spain, it spread across the land. Flights of mustard gas dropped soon after, being followed by Onionroofs which were demolition artillery-dropped bombs the Russians made against the forces of the West. The entirety of the continent was put under complete lockdown as it was forced to enter a period of death and decay, of decadence and of complete self destruction, the result of which was blood, the blood on which the Island was made, somewhere between Crime and Holomodor.

‘You see know, the Government was afraid that something like this might happen again. So that's why the project was being given birth to.

That's why the soldiers were created in the first place, to begin with.

They feared someone like the Conjurer who might cast a dark spell upon the world, just like in did in the past, as to summon the darkest, reddest figures there are beyond the world, gods such as the likes of which have never been seen before.’

But there was one thing beyond the likes of the Government, which was the life of Lenin, the diviner. He was born under the shades of a dark moon underneath the shades of a Carp that flew in the in sky during his birth, as he came out, with a little fetus-structure embed in a pocket inside his mouth. He had eaten his twin brother during their birth, and for that reason, he grew up to be much taller and much stronger than his dark brother, Stalin. Whom appeared inside a kangaroo-like belly pocket that stood in there, forever, at least until his eventual release. Ever since he was born, his was a tormented living, inside the dark-insanitary woods of Glorchorksimov, in a tiny village where he lived a peaceful life, undisturbed. One day in particular, during one his dinners, he was drawn out of his house. For he had seen the future at this point, at various points of his life, despite it not even having begun yet; he was met by someone who waited for him outside his house, in a heart of corruption and destruction which was both beyond the world and in it at the same time. As his ability to divine reality shifted the very place out existence and back in; he had eyes in which eyes and a skull inside his skull as was his every organ inside his every organ, and some of them were inside the Organ he kept inside the house, having been born in a wealthy family, whereas his mother was a Semite with big luscious lips and a great behind he didn't look at, for that would be mightily decrepit and something a man ought to not observe about his mother. His divinations created a head that looked like his own.

The Leninhead existed beyond reality and forced a siphon of power to enter his mind as he would record things that happened outside the realms of existence as to increase in knowledge, therefore in power, which in turn corrupted his already tainted soul.

‘Who are you?’

‘I am the great Ilias Leninhead, and I was born of your essence, master.’

And in that moment, he was stricken in the head with power, such as the likes of man was not meant to handle by himself.

Yet they were been made aware, of his presence, of such thing that could not be easily divined as to bring forgetfulness total to the likes of his mind.

There lay before him, a malicious entity by the name of Modyl, whom appeared during one of his lucid dreams, in the middle of the day. It wriggled around into existence as if it were some chitinous cocoon of various organic matters put together yet set to lay meltingly upon one another as they were but slowly moved out of their way, caught in a state of constant disintegration as they fell from the horned body of their god. It appeared to possess only one great limb that stretched to the right, or to his left, which looked like a giant jerking thing, like a fully fleshed humanoid leg which never rose nor moved about, a great almost shoulder-fat protrusion coming out from the point of its knee joint which was directly sprouted out of the body mass which in itself gave the impression that it was but a mere skin, a dark thing wore by something that would wriggle inside and crawl out only when hunger drew it so to move. Large hairs that looked like cords dropped from inside and melted on the surface of its armor, and little more than invisibly, partially formed little flies but came after, then went to be, then disappeared as soon as he could see.

It flashed into existence and brought with it but a strange thing, a flashing core, a little thing of no planet of its own.

‘You’re disturbing my doings, my wretched forebodings and everything I’ve set and done and whom would I have the pleasure as to have myself but set in mind?’

Lenin made a scissor-cutting motion with his right hand, cutting a good chunk of Stalin’s left side of the face. He wore it like a mask for a while. It looked like a falling star that seemed to glow at times, especially when he least expected it. There was so much power into it that he felt it as he moved along.

But what is a diviner?

It is a man who can look through the eyes of god, granting himself something near nigh-omniscience and night omnipresence, but only on the sides of the planet where there is a night to begin with, and these seemed rather limited to the world between the world that is to say that in which he’s currently residing into, for he was caught in some celestial dance, as one may come to believe.

He ventured into the bowels of darkness and made it through the war-trenches during a time of supreme stop where close to nothing happened by no means; a standstill between the worlds, but only during the night when everyone slept and most people were in their beds, except the people who were awake during late hours, in which case.

Blood managed to flow every now and then as it appeared just about the place, he’s seen one part of the world broken and embed on a thing which had been rummaged in for centuries and stoles of flocks that stood ajar, frozenly in air.

Some distant other-place:

‘Thou art a creature of Malicious intent, are thou not?’

‘Indeed I am, for I am made to be brought into view, to be cut through and devoured.’

‘I was created in a matter of days, was I not? In that case, would you care to explain why I’m still here?’

You have told me before that I was to have my limited existence shortened even more so than the time for my inception to occur; yet eighteen days passed and I am still standing. What is the reason for it?’

‘I see it fit for you to understand this much, I’m only trying to make you grit in place.’

They were a few more figures on this spot. They were incapable of pushing head and drawing out. They were incapable of making out what went on. Still speaking, she was still speaking, accusing the man in front of them of them. She didn’t understand anything, how could she do it.

‘You’re akin to a mother to me, but you don’t understand anything about the balance required to fashion like out of nothing, out of nothing at all.

It requires proper understanding of things that are not there. I’m only asking you to understand as much, my pursuit could end up into nothing, I could end up like many scientists akin to I, wasting my life only to achieve nothing, nothing at all. I’m only, I don’t know.

It’s something beyond me.’

‘You’re a making a man, aren’t you? That’s hardly something that doesn’t exist.’

‘Then you understand where I failed and why I’m, why I’m.’

‘Oriental mumbo-jumbo.’

‘What was that Claire?’

‘It’s the bed, it’s, you moved it away from the wall, it’s not facing the door any longer. What’s gotten into you?’

‘I created life, and that’s the only thing you’ve noticed?’

‘What else is there for me to notice? You don’t speak to me any longer, you’re simply playing with your toy-soldiers, then you complain all day and shout at me regardless of how hard I’m trying to make senses out of things, out of this.

It’s simply not working and you don’t seem to get it.’

‘I already told you I know what my expectations are.’

‘And that’s the thing, you haven’t done it at all, the fact that you’re doing it, despite knowing that it won’t yield you anything, it’s. It’s driven you away from me. I’m alone most of the time, even when I’m around you, It’s been months since I’ve been touched and I’ve been as faithful as any God given person can be, but I can’t.

I can’t understand what this thing you’re going through is and I will never be capable of understanding, or making you out. You’re just too stubborn, I can’t think of anything else.’

‘And what will you have me do then? Prince around the house pretending we’re a family? As if it’s supposed to mean something to either of us?’

‘I’m asking you to make a sacrifice for the greater good, for our greater good.’

‘That’s not what you’re asking me, that’s not what you’re asking me at all. You’re selfish and self-absorbed.’

Furthermore, you’re asking me to indulge in your madness, in this empty pursuit of what? Of nothing, nothing that is there; I don’t understand what you want, I can’t see it, you won’t tell me, you won’t touch me, you won’t even look at me because you’re engrossed in your work.’

‘Then who’s stopping you then?’

Because I’m certainly not, I don’t want you here, I don’t want you there, I don’t want you anywhere around my workshop or my house, or around anyone.’

‘There’s no one left you imbecile, I’m the only one here, I’m the only one you haven’t fully driven away, and you’re doing yourself no favor in driving me away from you.’

‘I’m doing myself a favor nonetheless in taking this stance. It must be you that I’m drawing an influence from, I need you to leave now; poison, that’s what you are, a toxin for my brain, I see no reflection in this room, I see no one else but you and that must be the reason for which I am creating man and man again. I cannot help myself, it’s hereditary, it’s venomous, I’m being injected with this delirious vision that’s been dictated on your terms.’

‘You don’t that mean that.’

‘But I do, Claire and I cannot know it unless I try. And I shall do it and I shall fail if I have to but I shall do it on my own terms, no matter what I have to sacrifice.’

They refused to reconcile this time around. This was it.

‘I’m not going to return if I leave now and I can’t leave things unfinished. If you have something to say now, this is the right time, this is the last time. For both of us and for you, I don’t think you can make it, whatever it is you’re aiming for.’

I think you’re going to die here, in this place, in your house, in your workshop, alone, not even surrounded by living things, or what those are.’

Cleat didn’t mutter a word. It was as expected.

‘Fare well then, I hope this experiment of yours proves to be worthy of your scientific pursuit and that you find solace in this grave of your own making.’

Because this is no martyrdom I see; but a grave of memories for all my time spent alongside you.’

It was a pale thing, that which pushed out of him, breathing, a stump made out of many stumps that ate his creations as soon as he was locked in alone.

He lived in a rotten carcass of a building after all. Still trying to find something out of a place that never existed, could only deform, defile and distort what he knew this far.

‘Distill a form.’

‘How could I in any case, are we not going to end up in the same manner again?’

Playing with your nasty things, I’m but reusing?’

It didn’t answer, at all.

Couldn’t be properly seen, the machine kept jerking here and there every time it got a surge or jolt of electricity, a bolt or an arch. Peculiar thing; upper part a man that was sleeping on the side, facing him, with its right arm but the mechanical shaft that poured out the electron-barnacle shaped cradles, the man’s head a weird shell with ropes hooks to the machine’s shoulder and itself, being placed upon a peculiar toeless foot-panel with many gizmos attached to it, connected to a larger body of generators that adorned his magnum-chandelier, a vague thing that looked like a giant iron clipper that was fused together with the ceiling, from the insides of which tiny melting creatures fell out of at times. They were in his mind mostly, that’s why he didn’t say much or did as they may, wouldn’t move as to bother. Or rather, the chandelier was a giant rib-cage protruding clipper, with two stress batons that seemed to bear some of the machinery that moved across the room at times. It was blasted, morose, he knew he couldn’t wait there any longer without bursting for another second. She left, she finally left, and it’s been only a couple hours already. He started at his machines.

Having put the man-creature down, the humanoid being but put inside one of the stagnant brim-black rider-devices. There was something lodged in the device, it was a card shape, ten of hearts. It almost felt like, he was almost disturbed by it for some reason, why was it there? It didn’t make any sense at all, yet it was. He could hear it beating as if it were three actual hearts in a hidden compartment he had no access in. He wanted to get a ladder but he forgot. Seven of them were present but they were barely beating.

‘Claire could you?’

She was not there, she left some hours ago. It was a hard, living without his most important assistant, since that meant he’d have to do everything on his own from this point on. He took a break.

There was difficulty doing things by himself, trying to function.

One day, he decided he remembered something. It was plain to see that men of knowledge could think themselves thinking of distant past, therefore recalling things to minute detail, regardless of the circumstance and mental illness as well as maniacal conundrum and whatever else they were in. Memory had dark wings and it jumped into hoops.

The castle of vileness was but one great piece in which lived, he bowed to the machines one day, seeing how he was left to die, starving.

And then one day, through which, it was divined.

That great Leninhead had come to answer such dark prayer as one might seem to be set on, as to bow to such countenance as for one to find himself thinking and reflecting upon the dark crown of his aegis-like aura that was but protruding through the squirming belligerent portal, he found solace in-between. Of such darkness as he'd seen before little was but made of such little things that were but to appear in his head and mind and at his hands as it but entered through the world not in one piece but through a deformed basin of filth through which it was gritted ahead. In darkness laying-never ending, pushed as if pouting, at a loss of words.

'Enough with your charades, you're slowing down, your sight is dim, it's as clear as daylight that you're beginning to stray off your path. And in turn you may commit the worst affront to humanity there is, the worst crime a human could ever make is creating something without a soul.'

This world looks down on criminals, liars, rapists, pedophiles, murderers, and whoever they see it fit during their time, morality has not meaning any more, but the world seems to have forgotten the worst crime of all, it seems to banish and skew that which endures. The greatest of sins a man can commit that being giving birth to a piece of soulless work; that which you've yet to come upon!

It's all too mechanic, heartless, cold and nothing can change it. The work of a man is but the reflection of his soul, in which case.'

'I tried, but it doesn't feel right.'

'It's not supposed to feel right, you don't understand because you're still confused, aren't you?

This is what happens when one stares for too long at something soulless, as he eventually becomes that twisted reflection, that carcass he's been staring at for so, so long. No mistake or learning could possibly fix that as it is not taught to someone, it simply is or isn't.'

'Then which one is it?'

'No one can answer that for you, I'm afraid.'

You're riding a dead beast after all; there's no rebirth, there's no world after in a world where one cannot conjure emotion. It's empty, hollow on the inside, falling apart just as it is. That's the basis of the pillars, of a foundation, of the framework of anything.

Without it, without those there's no reason to keep it standing, no structural integrity, nothing to fight for, no passion, no life; in such a world lying, stabbing, murdering, destroying, all is meaningless, mundane. There's just nothing there to keep the engines working. A victimless crime, a hopeless thing, a heartlessness that can't be put behind, again I must tell you this, you don't understand.

The worst of crimes stand out only because there's something greater and beyond them making it worth to keep them in line. And that's something beyond crime that seems to get blurred with time.

Unless you fully understand what that means, there's nothing here, there won't be anything in the future, nothing at all; empty fields, and nameless beings; meaningless shapes that are simply there for no reason.

But that is pointless, is it not?'

Asked Mouse, finally being met by Red, after such a long journey, they simply sat down and nothing else.

‘Why does it feel so bad not having a soul?’

‘I don’t know.

‘Why can others have it but not I?’

‘I do not know.

‘I can’t help it but feel jealous of them, I can’t help it but want what they have, what comes to them naturally, yet there’s nothing in there, no matter how hard I search, I can’t find it.’

‘I know.

‘What then?’

They were both silent for a while.

But what if there’s beauty in killing minorities?

There was the distant malign voice that yelled out of the sudden:

‘Can’t you see that the man without soul has no soul to begin with as to make something beyond him might not grant him the soul he desires in the same way a homo would adopt a child instead of making one of his own?’

‘I see but, what then?’

‘I shall divide the very atoms of my body and shall become evil.’

Lesion Sorbent said.

He was strong and others were weak.

Inside the town; he disturbed peace as soon as the first occasion came to drive him to do so.

What came forth, what drew after was the dampening armor that seemed to block, for every moment that passed on, every single passing ring and every sting and every pellet that had been shot against him.

‘You’re going to have to put more effort than that.’

‘Think you’re clever, ain’t you?’

‘I am good man, but say, where are we now?’

‘In the broken serpent; have you not looked at it yet?’

He considered as much.

It's been broken by the side, where they managed to find a way through. Twenty, or at the very least eighty growths followed through, unnaturally so, pushing, wriggling as if they had been forced to starve or at the very least appear when one expected it the least.

Lessermen and Trenchchewers pushed through. They appeared to be the ones in charge of fixing the serpents, of doing the fixes, the repairs. Seeing how they were much bolder, stronger, more immaterial, there was no wonder they acted the way they had.

Little things flying out of their fingers nails, not exactly, but they gave the same impression paper planes had, clipped together with bone cartilage they strung on strings, in order to create the same illusion they had.

'Munch together plains?'

'I see you're a painted man.'

Do spiders grow more anxious if you throw things in their web?

I've thrown a few finger nails inside it, to no avail.

Untrustworthy races needs to be killed, it is the failure to comply to the great rottenly wrought machines that brings destruction to all that which is made by the living beings of this world.

There is a remedy for every brokenly decayed, its face contorted, darkened hardened-masked as well.

'There is nothing worse than what's.'

And there were flying dragon-shaped large retractor organs that started flying around bloated at their bellies, where they opened only to revealed they houses billions of little men-shaped pearls that were waiting in curled positions, to be dropped and made to destroy everything around them in the most unnatural fashioned. Their wings were other people who were contorted into weird tango-like dance motions in which they stood. Little pops in the air followed, many go through.

Dolts were made to follow standing.

'I have a screwdriver.'

'What are you going to do with that screwdriver?'

'I am going to take it, then I will slowly drive it through your skull like a drill, going through your jaw right around the searing area where your slippery dumb-gums are in, then I will slit your throat from inside you, rapidly-vapidly progressing through your chest until I will have opened you so thoroughly that you will have become a largely bifurcated dumb-dead animal with little pegs shoved inside your bloody remains that will have been completely splattered throughout the room amongst your peers that are present in the room we are in, where you will stand here for a few hours until your nearest of kin, that being your family arrived. After them come forth, I will step in during their time of being unaware, after having stepped on top of your boisterous remains, stomping in as wide an area as possible, when I will grab your parents by the back of their heads, kicking their ankles off the floor, trying to prevent their necks from being snapped just as I am slowly placing them in the right position. After they're placed so wonderfully flat, I will continue what I did to you.'

'How are you going to do it if you are holding both of my parents by the back of their necks if you are holding the screwdriver in one hand?'

'I guess I dropped my screwdriver before I even began, or may I already dispatched of them as to not be suspicious about what I'm going to do. But perhaps I already thought of this prior hand and I already made a trap, like a mine but filled with screwdrivers that pop around the place and bounce against every possible surface as for the detriment to my plan, I don't think the walls will constitute a problem, since they are made to fall, after I put something in them. I will have hidden, prior to this slaughter, that is now, various objects in them.'

'Are they bombs then? Is this room going to explode? Did you plan kill yourself for the entirety of this time? What are you going to do to me?'

'I didn't plant bombs but instead I placed special devices made out of spring-like corkscrew belts that are wrapped around a bunch of nails that are put together inside a thin magnetic ball that's filled with magnetic-pop disabling gas, that, once it's triggered, as in triggered by the pressure caused by the friction and the various motions in which it will have been rubbed against and for, it will pop, disabling the magnetic field in its adjacent area, while the nails will be thrown around.'

'Around what?'

'I suppose the bricks will block most of the force but a few nails will come out, maybe one or two nails a pop.'

'That doesn't sound like a lot of nails.'

'Yet we are in a room filled with many of them, which could go at about any time, just be careful, you never know when they might.'

I lied, I lied about the nails, you want to know why?'

'My interest is currently peaked, please allow me to indulge in that knowledge.'

'They are not nails but screws, therefore the screwdriver.' Bolts and such.

I years for those empty spots where they create; where they filled their own want as to satiate whatever needs they're asking for. Dreadful people move in place, there was a chance, all of the sudden, it made sense, some sense, as for whichever reason there would be no place to ask. Little dark things they hid inside of, always making a case out of what entered their brat's holds.

'Open the lock, now.'

'You're in no measure to give me any order.'

'I am what I am and I will take whatever measure there is to take away what I wish, not listen to me and listen to me good, because I'm not going to repeat myself, you still here?'

They were hardened.

The Cores

The core was fumigating and in its foaming broth there came creation, from that popping egg, from one of the billions of infinitely stacked together peculiar oblongs which in some unnatural way seemed rather forcefully caught and made to merge into the nearest plaster, object or something even eerily similar to it. One could but taste it where it stood, and always draw to the beast it shook, where its ugly head but wreathed in and out, where they appeared to be rather set in place. For the time being; eleven million fragments, put together through and through, from the cluster of which the birth was adjourned. Little more than a few hundred mouths followed just as soon, as they were fully into view they began breathing, slowly advancing into view. There was a wide opening in the magma chamber which surrounded the core, the one that mattered, the only one yet the many of them were there, under high command. It was something essentially beyond them, the things that floated in the air, always there beyond any possible reasoning, always but breathing as if through masks as if they were actually there unseen. Lactiferous by nature, bloated in-between, attached to one another, that is to say they were all dreadfully so, they manifested as if a lump of mouth but cherished itself as thoroughly as to float around and make it as far as it stood, in front of a dreadful spot, a place for it to succumb in, where it stood and wasted, there was naught.

‘I am manifested, the master of time, the lord of a limited time.’

It spoke, and there they baked its antlers, and the many unnatural, no nuance in its body, for he was but a simple man.

Yet he was given something no man had in the world, a watch that was not where, it ticked in his mind. Limited existence, in hearers savor; the blade that split his head in half, the watch that tufted his little coat, as he was set in time, right next to the entrance.

‘You are to enter and you are to attend.’

The door opened just as he turned, no longer in that burning hole he had been given birth, now he lay upfront and heeded, the elements but followed, his chest wreathed.

‘I am the lord of this house, allow me to introduce myself, Georef Farceworth, and I invite you to the In-Ictus Secundus.’

Which was also known as the gut machine, in which he lived with his dark companion, the sphere-ball, the eye, the servant who held it, a wretched abomination without toes but whom bore a curtain-like back protrusion-a device that pushed him out and again, wreathed in the botched job that was the corpse he walked in. As it just so happened for the servant to be a corpse without organs, him stopping at the rib-cage where he was entered a second corpse which was but full-bodies, put together as in stitched, like an unnatural thing, bolted with many iron stings and little more than a few nails.

‘Mine, all yellow stocks and stockings are but put on the floors, spread just about the place, do you reckon there’s something to it? Something I may stumble on if I were to say?’

If I were you, I would keep my distance, they are drenched in yellow liquidlife, liquefied from the boys we have taken from the plains of Mylthurning, they are but plain of head and lack feelings, ripe to be taken by any means and to be disemboweled in the most conspicuous manner.'

'Why would you commit such a vile act upon a child?'

Dersang Deranged but looked at the man as well as his servant, whom both looked ever so queer as, that's to say, they were but set, on a watch, stumbling about. Were it for either one of them to matter, or what came after, they would've stopped.

Now I've come to understand what I've left behind; but a feeling of emptiness I dread to know once I look again at what I used to make, what I used to create, the primitiveness that is what I, myself made once shower me with no affection any longer. I no longer year for that what is old and wasted, I long to think of clips of shows I've never seen, yet will not watch. I draw what I can from what I'm reading, but I forget it in as short a while. I sometimes look at the images of my father, of my grandmother, of every other family member, friend I used to have and every person I've ever come into contact with and I realize that I feel nothing about them either, it's of a much different kind than sociopathy, closer to selfishness than anything else. Being aware that they don't matter as much as seeing something new, different, pursuing something doesn't around much of a different feeling either. Regardless of it, science answers all and there's no doubt that they most likely come from the same area of the brain. That doesn't change a thing, disabling everything else, abandoning them, seeing things clear as a first in a long period of time, it's something no one should have to think about.

There's no grief for familial deaths, no reminiscence of there being any kind of feeling, just silence, simple unchanged and unbarred silence even when met by their tombs, their gravestones or being in their proximity is somewhat static in terms of memory, everything's controlled even to the minute detail and reaction. It's not something that's useful, or on the contrary, were to be a lack thereof would it mourned for. This thing but alienates others by whatever means there are.

And most importantly it doesn't work on its own either. Like a broken machine, it's made wonder. If I were to kill my dog, will I remember guilt or shame? Will I be punished? Should I? I sometimes, when on the same field I, many a times killed a lot of frogs, simply pull the leash, pretending she is a nigger. I stop just in time to kick her a few times, then I stop; it is something I do not feel proud of, but I only do it when she does something to annoy me, as in barking loudly and disturbingly in the morning despite me not even have approached her prior to her being startled. Indeed, I do feel that I sometimes let anger get the better of me, especially when I kick, punch, push and trample the dog. Why must I do this? I do not know. Yet at the same time I'm always reminded that I have to pick up small rocks and chuck them at cast in the most fallacious, malicious and inexcusable manner. There are many things I would do to my dog. Her name is Lolita, which is rather a coincidence since she's been named prior to my exposure to the novel. Yet I feel like, there's something I could never take my mind off.

I need to punish and beat her, because she is at the end of the day a female. And all women kind of need to suffer in some way or another by whatever possible mean. Not because I hate them but because I can and I will employ the means to cause as much pain and make as many of them suffer as often as possible if it is in my power and for my own satisfaction, unless they offer themselves to me. That is to say that I've come onto the realization that I do long to be loved by one, to be caressed, to be touched, to be loved.

Although those are things that could never be stored in my mind for long and are merely, rather fleeing moments that will but perish by the wings of wind.

Reason dictates thus. I could never stop looking down on them for more than a few reasons, that being not tied to an incapability to relate to them on a basic level but rather, it's tied to my incapability to see a future for them, even though man himself is incapable of long-term planning, it's rather clear. Their rigs are not things that will last forever, in whichever society that ever existed, for as long as it had, going as far as Sumerians, or whichever other cradle of civilization might be drawn upon, there's always been period of time when women were offered but equal or quasi equal place to that of man. Which in turn ends up as expected, being torn down and taken apart, just as many people expect it to happen, only to be regained once again, just like political leanings, everything seems to be cyclical. Everything draws their influence from the past, therefore it's obvious that man cannot go beyond it, it cannot escape its nature.

Good riddance, I say. They don't need rights, they need to breed and make children and not cheat on men. But not with other races than that of their own; otherwise they're not human.

Focus now.

'There's some kind of scenery no one wants to consider as such.

It's a Utopia, made in the only possible manner there is; beyond reasoning, beyond the usage of slavery, abuse and similar concepts alone. It's simply a place for the elite, a few of them, much fewer, drawing at the cost of as many lives as possible they ought not to be concerned with.'

But theirs isn't a joy that's eternal either, as there's no creature that's ever to be satisfied by whatever means one could physically employ upon itself, physical disablement forced on women and dogs.

I have a tendency of threatening people, especially women. Men don't show tendencies of carrying on with their threats, for them, it's supposed that it's not a real threat by any means, but a way of communicating with a female. They seem to take it largely weighted and in a serious manner.

A night of evil is all there is.

What is there for man to do if not to employ the means of punishment upon a broad?

Then again, those are things that yield and say nothing, nothing at all.

There needs to be something to the language. In ways of which something can be shaped or used, made to be, as it to conjure itself uncannily, or rather. Something beyond it; something relating the way in which it's used to, beyond expression, being fashioning and crafting objects. A vacuum of some kind, like a simulation, something that could affect itself in the empty and keep working despite the way it is. Like a dark room filled with gray gradients, something that could be filled in the same way a computer program would, but at the same time; it needs to latch itself to the visual component of the brain, the visual aspect. But how would one know how those things exist in the first place?

Why am I such a fucking loser?

I shouldn't have skipped class and grinded meaningless monsters for hours, come to think of it, my worldview is rather stapled inside this room, which I never seem to leave that often. With the disablement of the only means I could communicate to other people, I'm trapped, I am trapped and I cannot get out. My 'viciousness' is unaltered. Said the boy.

'I've never carried a real conversation with a woman or a minority, that includes my mother as well. I might never will.

Sometimes people snap their fingers in my face inside the subway, asking me whether or not I'm insane because of my facial expression. Yet I simply ignore them. One day I wish I could get some tire iron and bash his skull open and piss in a jar-something rather unrelated.

There was one time my sister came in to aid my mother with something, during the holidays. As usual, when she comes in, I never leave my room. I don't like interacting with her, I don't want to see her, talk to her or have anything to do with her. She was there for at least half a day and I had nowhere else to go.

So I simply took a vase and I pissed in it, then, I walked over to the window then discharged its contents over some place. Luckily there was a rain that followed and there was no trace left of what I've done.

I also did it four times. That is to say, it could've been avoided, it was definitely something that could be avoided.'

The pee was red and the wretched lumps in it grew on top her window, crying in a bottle's bowl.

By now, by all means one might've already figured out that I may be a horrible person who said and who's done a lot of terrible things. I'm am childish, a prude, infantile and I am too lazy to do my own work and rewrite anything. And I will end up harming more people along the way because I cannot help it.

'What is wrong with my memory and why can't I help myself? It is a great question; regardless of it, there are more important things that one needs to somehow pursue, as for the lack of knowledge and obtaining it by whatever means there are. Is there no low I would not take? I do not know.

Why can't I stop obsession over women I've interacted with over a year ago? Or those I've barely but laid eyes only once?

I do not trust women, and I condemn that kind of behavior that involves such a horrible, worthless fiend, I would employ such means of punishment on them such as the world has but yet to feel, let alone see.

If all art is indeed propaganda, what am I propagating? I do not know, I do not know at all.'

'They were walking there.'

It's been, at the very least a few hours since the dreaded finds had split themselves open, walking on the dark bridges where they had killed but the last destroyed refugees of beggars and other creatures worthy of exterminations such as cripples and the deformed.

Vile thing inside the room, upon which bred upon such swoon it walked. Dreadfully as well as cast, upon the trenches of a cast; which looked benign as none to see, breathing rather eerily; it came out of nowhere and would but spare to go, it would attain a searing glow. If one were to look at it for more than an hour. Wretched needle-mark, it was there, upon the great amass, where it stood at last, upon a back valley it had been finely shaped, as hundreds of other marks alone would remain and dream forward, the substance seeping through, like a sea of atoms, nuclear but dipped in sinew.

The inferiority of its lower exposed bowels only contorted as it approached, they were no clippers, no pincers and nothing more of a serpentine elongation than to bore a giant hole through which the squirming liquidities that were trapped inside its pouches began threading along, as if someone but started making as many holes in them as possible, they spread, all around the head of the tunnel where heat was but made. And they sang 'go, go, approach the row'.

It had, in as much of an antiquated fashion, the dreadful satisfaction of its solidly obese shape, that had threaded forth and entered them as soon as it could be allowed. It appeared out nowhere, singing, yet to join them in their call, as if a more disabled giant lay there, one made of many shapes and pursing lamps of meat which cast beneath them but perils. Of many broken through hedges that fell, through the ceiling entered them, a few, much much-more longer men, with spears that wore butterflies, whom looked upon the men in flights of dyes, colored as the room just were, they spoke to them, at which, be weary of their speech, one said, they will make of us what cast out there. Out with us, from paradise, out from where we stand and where we run.

'I am Jordan Hallow, allow me to introduce myself and tell you of where I lay, in the strange conundrum I've felt myself but dragging away and dragging through as I've worked in my family' compendium for at the very least twenty years on and off. I seem to have startled you, haven't I? That is precisely what I was aiming for, irrevocable youngsters with pain in their eyes.

I see that many of you have already acquainted yourself with I, for I have met either one of you or none at all during the journey that has been taken around the world, though I would rather be resilient enough to have myself be taken out of place, out of the scenery as much as you should know.'

The man there, as resilient as he was, appeared to be rather onset on trying to win them over again, especially since, if he had recalled, there was a perfidious young boy, of the age of eleven forth. He was accompanied by his two sisters who were there at account of which, they looked over him. Rostoban Ann, that is to say, the two girls were standing behind him, but trying to thoroughly hide themselves from the queer eye the man seemed to bear on them. He had seen them, unless candidly mistaken, in a rather awfully crowded stop.

'I recall now, you must move your preppy little box of candles off the middle of the road. I say, you must leave as soon as by the time I'm done counting to the count of ten and no more. Or I will have you taken to the high-office and given a fine, a worthless thing you are.

Knowing as much you will probably have yourself mistaken for a little dumb thing akin to asking for trouble, you little troubadour-winged dresser, in what world have you found yourself in this time to lay yourself lankly stretched amongst the joint-be-shed across the ground-floor?'

'Dear man but can't you see that I'm in a rather upset that you would ask me this, but if you would be so kindly as to make a plain offer to a lord-god given man, were you to invite me to, what I have no doubt to be your fancifully humble abode, I would much cherish our conversation much further than to stall. Will you invite me to come?’

‘I shall, if it means clearing this blasphemous thing there is in front of this dully plain field you’re standing before, you must come with me at once as we shall begin reeducating you at once. Unless I am wrong in which case I will have you slapped and beaten and put into a hobble; in which case I feel no sympathy for plans and tricks and belittlement that as we all know require no dreams and no wits about it.’

He concurred and took the young man off his scolded scuffs.

He was taken for a plain man of head and watched, but was not dragged along beyond his own intention to follow, for whichever reason might be said and settled through, he was no beggar yet he dressed like one who knew of them or heard there was a lousy-minded aristocrat with a mind for searching through, a tuft, and looked about the man, painstakingly dressing him as much as could a man just do it, as to refrain himself from everything that happened as well as they arrived, upon the Arabesque-carpet he was met to stand. And wait there for hours until the man would have his fine dine, watched carefully by the servants as not to be stolen from when came about and asked what happened after; wretched about the hour.

‘Will I be allowed to have a potty break?’

‘Good man are you but a child to ask of such a thing? No one’s asking you of anything, no one’s making, let alone forcing or contorting you for reason, you are free to go in plain of day, no one’s forcing you to stay.’

‘Subvocalization helps with memorization; Subvocalization is connected with the voice. Reading out loud makes you more likely to remember things; tape effect. Skimming through a text decreases comprehension because there’s not enough time for the Subvocalization to take effect. Expert writers activate the same part of the brain as the basketball players, but instead of drawing from image part of the brain, they draw from the speech part. Writing too fast means more mistakes because the brain makes connections between the words. I.E. remembering what they’re spelled like. Could be connected to reading fast, chunks of words recognized, only a few key letters being seen in order to be recognized. I.E. perhaps the normal form of the word. They might be remnants of the primate-brain man has; reading and writing being just silent speech. Would need to rip someone’s voice box off his throat and from his insides in order to test this; or at the very least create some false pretense as to claim cigars cause cancer before butchering the patients in order for experiments to proceed. Yet memory could be at play here. Neuroscience shows that the brain doesn’t make the difference between reading about a place and being there; listening to the narration of a book or reading it. Yet the latter has multiple processes involved, therefore the narration is but an incomplete form of reading. But the people whom were tested weren’t asked whether or not they had been exposed to previous imagery of the already existing place, therefore reading might simply just activate a ‘compilation’ of imagery, videos, and other bits that are already present in the brain. Those things haven’t been tested on a feral child, like ‘Genie.’ Would need to be tested on someone who has been under severe isolation before the prior testing, as to obtain unbiased results out of the studies; regardless of it, all languages, if a man who knows multiple languages is used as an example seems to tell that the languages all come from one region of the brain; those being specific sounds, yet another mechanism is involved into, that means. They may be in the same region of the brain, yet they're grouped together as in clusters. Memory keeps check of the clusters. Could be that words are diamonds in the rough, whereas their sedentary geological state is the full form of the word, but that doesn't make much sense unless someone's reading too fast and tries making out the words out the pile. Since reading out loud only helps memorization when it comes to unique words, one hasn't tested whether or not this could be a useful tool, reading sentences silently but reading the specific words out loud. It could have a detrimental effect on the comprehension itself, that alone hasn't been tested; as it would but disturb the reading flow amongst everything else. I wonder what Quint is up to.

Main point: Individual studies are useless unless they're crisscrossed and accounted for; correlation will always never, under any circumstance mean, lead or equal causation, unless there's enough evidence coming from multiple sides and as many interlocked objects, studies, and notes as for there to be something solid to grasp on. As in, intercrossed experiments need to be made, re-tested and re-account for everything previously learned. The problem there being further funding being required since it doesn't just happen ever so often for someone to invest in such further experimentation. And it's doubtful that I am the first person to have considered it, merely it's an acquiescence or reverberation of someone who has either yet to draw light on the problem, which applies on every field of expertise, or has yet to be heard.

Although, that may not be the main point; rather than, if they're the same region, of speech, if one were to somewhat adapt his speech pattern to his prose, would that somehow aid him in the way he talks? Or would he end up sounding pretentious? It's hard to tell but it's something worth pursuing since there seems to be related mechanism at work.

There seem to be three methods of speech, those being the Subvocalization- silent reading, out loud, and the medium kind of speech that is to say, talking with your mouth close which seems to be a combination of the two, with minimal tongue-movement that appears to be an iteration of the Subvocalization or a much louder version of it that seems to create the illusion of being much closer to the ear, cause by throat noises and tongue, in the same way ventriloquists talk. It is yet to be known whether or not this can be a useful thing in studying and it could by some means trigger the tape recorder effect and might be put to better employ for memorization than speaking out loud since it is slightly faster and more convenient. While covering the ears, most importantly, covering the ears with both hands while either reading out loud or reading with your mouth close as to create an echo chamber, as this is but yielding a much greater effect, since the sound is somewhat amplified. Talking that way appears to make the sound come out of the nose, yet the sound is much closer to the ears if they're covered.'

Lo' there was as much to be, little darkling in to be. Rabid in their wake, awaking, dreading what they could in their wake; as much as they could, always going into one direction or another. Stumbling on dark feet what appeared to be the fiends inside the house, their bloated guts but open now and brought back together in their wake. A few minutes passed as they went along and pouted.

Distraught a man shouted.

'I've been sent here by the Core.' Cherish the moment, thought Elliot Kinden, who had appeared to have a face protruding out his chest, like piece of armor chattering as if it could no longer be kept under such distress there was. Dread came upon the hour. The creatures inside the room reconciled.

‘Elliot, you’re the first humanoid to arrive inside the house, although your shirt has become a face, I see no reason why you wouldn’t fit the bill by any means.

I require something out of you, seeing how you’re but a humanoid, I have to ask you something I never considered asking a man. You need to rip off that face off your chest and bleed to death inside the premise of my house, so thoroughly that you’ll have to be run dry by the hour.’

‘And for what reason might that be if you don’t mind me asking?’

‘I need to figure out whether or not you can be bled.

There’s something about the way.’ Collar-Co sadly couldn’t see a way to put other than that.

‘It’s just something that has to happen, I can’t explain it, and you most likely wouldn’t understand the need for you to bleed. It’s rather, hardly something that ever would matter for any other man, but I ask this of you.

Consider as follows. If you don’t do it, I might have to snick up inside your room and do it myself or at the very least ask my servant who’s under my employ to do it, in which case I assure you that he won’t work as gently and quietly as I would if I were in his shoes.’

There was pain and suffering in the pint marches, where the odorous malign seemed to dread moving from below of. A little more than eighteen hundred thousand deformed alleles-bifurcated animals trudged as they came along, imbued with no more than a hundred deformed grown upon features that appeared to spread in the thin air as they moved, slowly moved, trying to moved their ugly rears into view. Large truncheon worth, all bearing what appeared to be a most inconspicuous amount of put-through livid-cannons that shot holes into the manor.

‘I suppose that calls for a short break, does it not? Stewart, lead them to the guest chambers before they break in, we’re under siege now.’

With which they took the moment to reconsider what was going on. The large beast returned. Wailing about the hour in its putrescent form, open ribbed, but with the insides of an upturned ship that had the hollow inside, legless but moving along as if the sails were its spectral robe, that only carried along. Darkly in the matter fact kind of way, it pushed, chained around the ribs, with many a lynching, it dragged, what appeared to be a perilously close to an unfathomable number of nigger-skinned corpses that were brought along.

They were of little matter now, since they squirmed, but inside their heads what was to be, it could be heard, a sonorous chant, that would be heard by anyone who was born of dirt as it sang and drew along, it waged.

‘More than a little nigger, and a nigger comes to strangers.

They come in little droves, little blacks, they come and steal.

Look alive, they come to take and take away.

There’s nothing standing in their way, for that’s the life a niggers has.

He steals what he doesn't have.

If you sees him on the streets but take him.

By the collar, in the making, hang him by the tree you must.

And lynch that nigger, down him cast.

Into most hellish escape, where his brothers might behave,

With little devils like their kind, they are,

And more than a few of them should be lynched, as far.

As niggers seem to think, it's clear that they can't be seen.

Not as human, human kind.

It needs to lynch disease of most benign.

Cut the cancer before it spreads, cut the nigger, now he's dead.'

With which they aroused a mightily distraught suspicion, they were open-mouthed, bloated to spare, most of them were made to bleed, profusely asking to be spared. But the beast would not, as much as it could be brought inside, it rested momentarily in awe, in the corner of the house it bore itself through the last time, which was left in such decrepitude, as to be torn to pieces, and rods of maceration pulling out of him as if he had been storing them along. While in there, his servants but continued the assault. Being less distraught than anything, he no longer stooped nor wasted, instead, as obvious as it could be, condescending to such rotten skin-tension, it came. And approached for the lack of remains, it made inside the upper rooms a fire. It came out of a bottle he carried, having had removed the lid, the creature looked inside of it and felt it, a gloom-filled smoke that broached the skin, leaving a limp-thing to it that felt around, within the hour. Like a fleeting leg it leapt, and jumped around the room, no fire spread, as it was fire-proof, tempered with by hands that left marks, ritualistic symbols all around them, cave-men paintings with little more than empty thoughts seemingly remarking the most nastily forlorn things a man could come up with. Part of the house was taken just as soon, it would be delivered from where it stood to the most capricious part of the world. Where the claps and pincers, elongations would but spread it around, making sure the machinations would munch.

In the world there was quiet, but all distraught in a matter of a few glances, a few fleeting moments that could not be controlled and made for.

Water was dangerous from the looks of it.

Even watching it from the distance yielded as many results. It popped like bubble wraps being squeezed out, right after the after-shower water ran out through the drainage. What remained began leaving small egg bottoms, depressed into the bath tub. Hot iron coals in skin, the wheel of torture being spun. It was wrong, too wrong, the apartment seemed too plain to see, pictures off colors and off the placate machines. They were there as well, floating in the air, struck frozenly by ripped-off fists which bled forever in the moisture of the floor. The wooden cartilage turned into what seemed to be a red-filled oozing two by two, having shrunken until the dark edges of what seemed to be beyond the walls got drawn in. Like an open market of organ trafficking sold by large insects whom had them put on top of linen sheets they chained themselves to as to pull them out when the trade was needed, chains being wrapped around their insect cartilages as well as through the edges of the sheets. From the looks of it, the flying machines were rather stuck there only the pounding that had been frozen there, but only one arm at a time, with one exception, in which case, who was the one who's done the cutting? It was strange yet unexplainable unless there were multiple people involved. This corner of the house was vaguely sealed from the rest of the general prelate. It seemed too convenient that there was no living there to attest to what happened here. What was even strange was the weird pattern in the glass man that was there but wasn't. Two windows, one open, one closed. He was in-between, in the air-projected but only seen when one somehow placed himself right at an angle where they intersected one another. Blotches and trances, it made sense, the glass man was in the glass eye which was inside of him, which was but a reflection in the sky. When three kinds of distinct glasses overlapped on top of one another, an existing glass, the glass inside a glass eye, and the empty after image left by a glass window that isn't there any longer, a Glassman reflection may be projected in the sky. A seagull flew just by; incapable of seeing the Glassman, it simply flew into it then fell on the ground and died, completely being blown out into a canary-like weird pyramidical at eight tops, as it from the hill-like mold it had become after being splashed on the ground, eight sharp shapes came out of it.

A predatory thing it was, the pyramids opened and revealed stalk-like bulbs that wrapped around one another like strange thorn bushes. The form leaving enough to be seen, to be made out of, the hill region of blood white feathers and cartilage, the pyramids which were the multiple beaks the creature bore, the thorn bush region that was significantly higher than the rest of them, being placed on a slight raise of a few centimeters above the beaks where the stalks were straight-like line-pipes, whereas the top region looked chaotic, and squirming-black as if it was a swarm of flies that creates a small illusion of black bands being constantly turned in place. A little extension came out of it, vaguely flying around uncontrollably so.

Marymoor went around one of the arms, made a fountain of his put together open hands and filled it with an ounce or two worth of blood. As he made his way past it, back the window, he saw the small speck of a limb suddenly disappear from sight, and right as he began losing some of the blood that was already pouring through the open gaps left between his fingers.

Clot devoured completely by flies.

'There are defects in what I am; it is undoubtable that I am wrong, my hands are tinted with glass. They are made of glass.'

He looked around, realizing that he was already put through one of the empty sill through which he was already put through, again, as he turned, rightly so. It looked like he was still there, with his hands in the open-window sill. But that corner was everywhere around him, regardless of where he turned. Marymoor was a standing cylinder, or that's what he saw around him. Another window, another window, another window, another window, another window and all of them open. His arms no longer attached to his torso but endlessly frozen in the air, with him always putting himself back together as if he were a toy; while the ground was but made to look like overlapping sheets forming a flower, every single one of them stacked like falling over dominoes, in a queerly set motion that wouldn't stop. It all looked normal once his movement lost the momentum, as he merely stopped to rethink his position.

‘Wretched thing, are you not?’

‘I am, but who is the one asking?’

‘That would be I, for I am the one who’s been spying on your for some while now, I couldn’t help myself, and I think we both know what the reason for it is.’

‘What did you see?’

‘Made your way through and seemed likely, as one could tell that you would do something to the paneling in question.’

‘How much did you see?’

‘Only as far as you pulled them out, all four of the hidens; to which I can only tell you as much, you need go out of your way and make it so they don’t hear us, not here while we’re in their hearing range. At the very least, I think it would be something close to, indeed, ten, eight, nine, fifteen, they’re pacing around from the sounds of it.’

And all four were there, bloated and grown, thrown around the mark, paranoid growths on top their backs, rooks and kings on concave checkerboards, wrapped and pushed through, with little pincer-a-like matches that were but cylindrically pushed out and inward and then extending. Control of blood and bloated little things that followed out of light and could barely be seen, forming strange caddish necks wrapped around their cartilage bends, always dreading to come out more than needed, always pushing out, and heeded, they seemed to walk in panes, entering and scourge themselves inside as well, where they hide the standing men, none of which were yet devoured, none could be pinned down or stricken after the strange shower that followed through. Freshly bloated, one man survive, now awakened he simply leaped out of the hovel and but entered one of the strange master, as he had in mind. To yet control and enter him as soon as cold limbs touched the floor. It fit in like an armor, as these air parasites were wrapped around him yet under his control by every mean. Seeping in and out, as if would do. Large bowels put through, like little pins that struck magnet mines, and gold nuggets in the sky, with the exception of it being one of the closest walls one could lay eyes on. Seeping through they feared; wouldn’t approach before it happened or moved along, and before long their negrous filth could be seen, flayed and stuck to the walls as they decorated the halls of a hunter whose adorned halls but pushed through. And little courage made of pain, and more than enough of them just cut like little monkeys at a little taxidermist flamboyant garden, where he’s hanged most of the queer fellows by the throats of their pets and made all melt under heath.

‘Hearsay, hearsay, I think there’s a bottle there and there I may go, I think we should but wonder which one.’

‘But what and what has come onto you now? What has come and where to lay and where might I make the initial cut then?’

‘You must cut off my pocket, for that’s where I hid the liver-dimes. I hid inside them but a few little worming delights you may come to like.

Cells are but a tool you must use and see.’

‘What happens past the curtains? I hear noises.’

‘You need not bother.’

He was already being changed, as the parasitical embracing armor was but a call to the hidden human’s most primitive brain as he had become, and he were to be, of wretched needs but uncannily, he was also there, a few feet away from where he stood, like a oozing projection but he shook himself off standing, wretched himself in place.

All the time in the world and not a single moment passed through, as to remind himself, he’s seen and he’s been and he’s done something to get where he is, like a little man-to-do.

‘I think I’ve been spared from you, now I can walk purely wherever I wish.

You may enjoy this past body of mine, for I walk on a celestial path that may never put me in the wrong, in tool other men might not put to use I wish not disturb about.

A soldier I am no more, I’ve paid my due and I go ahead and dine with Mor.’

Therefore and just as much, there was no question as to see the blameful face that had possessed the man as he carried on then was lost along the way, no longer to spare and the other things that were there. SO many of them so prettily disgusting as they came. Large and blue, blue and blue, and ultramarine, they were popping all around and they were eerily but pigmented that way and looked so bizarre as they appeared out of nowhere and but pigmented everything in flashy things like the pseudo glow wings that were attached to them, although they moved as if someone was holding little basketballs or baseballs that had metal iron-strings attached to them that could be moved everywhere where it was needed, then it could only work this way. One could see through them but they weren’t completely transparent, as they would appear in his brain, a man would only hear the beating of the glowing wings that were only superficial and didn’t work at all. And they horns that were formed piece by piece then receded in and the horns looked like fully extended fingers that came out of an ivory hand that was there and it had an ivory eye as well that blinked with ivory fragments of ivory shrapnel that appeared in the air and in the ground and moved about the hour, then appeared in the parasitically entranced body as he was put under their command. Its eyes were then blue and as it happened, the blue patches that were floating in the air like puddles left by falling drop of paint were not only weirdly peculiar, but they were but entered through by the strange Parasitical Parasol Jo who was the initial culprit-the man with the body that was harm of evil and put through the most derangedly obfuscate little pecker that came out of his chest, forming an even more peculiar transformed mutation with many reeling back in-and-out heads that appeared to leap around the room, as they but extended out of mechanical throats that were attached to the strange rounded belts inside of them, drawing what they could from around the room, as the lights jeeringly flashed in and out, right before the first time it had entered the first floating puddle of blue. To see it as it was, he was but in another dimension but not entirely, one that had the entirety of the ground above him, yet he was not entered, he was but a patch of solid tridimensional blue while he was also in the manor at the same time, only pushing in and out when he couldn’t control himself any longer, seeing the most peculiar flashes of pink and red and yellow glares and flares that entered his heart and filled him with such joy and elation such, as it was likely no vile man had ever seen, dreading to enter a front of quiet and desperation as he saw flowers and plants gloom in the most peculiar manner. Forced as if to go through trenches of dark, he saw little apricot-buns that were glaciated with the cold decay of a world that was left underneath a giant pile of unnatural, hard to look at mold and rat-dust, from a time in which it had been uncanny yet to waste. Dark hearts following through, wallowing as they suddenly gloomed and got a cheerily cherry red apple glint and tint to them which followed through the sudden urge to look around. And all was well. Leprous mouth and open teeth, where he waited in for hours.

He had his cartilage come distraught around his lower side of his body as well as his other side, bore a little jar in his right hand, twenty five dynamite sticks in it.

‘Come on Frank, we’re expected.’

‘I don’t know, I think I’m going to stay in this place for a while now. I can’t explain it, but the idea of. It just struck me but the idea of being a criminal somehow appeals to me.

Not the petty stuff but you know. Trying to brainwash people into committing mass genocide, armed robbery, botching women’s throats split open and pissing down their drain shaft, and I think the right idea just occurred to me right now.’

Dalton, Dalton, he kept calling it.

‘I think I’m going to shove this jar up a dumb broad’s cunt then blow myself up with her. Yeah, sounds about right.’

Think logically now, they can’t notice you now. Don’t be nervous, they’ll be able to smell it from a distance. His seed was his bullet, women are all robbers, whether or not it is the government, the people or the men they’re using to get ahead in life. He had two guns with longer shafts, with bullets that curved at the top as soon as they went out, like a smoke trail of evaporating lead.

They were aimed-reclined.

Killers are yet to kill as long as they’re dry. They are killers for as long as their first victims are dry. Killers can only kill for as long as their first victim’s body is still warm, for as long as they survive, that is how they die.

Neither of them made it through.

Piss-stains on the walls followed just as soon before they could stand on their arms as well.

It was far beyond their power to move, as long as they could listen to what was going on, nor would they, nor should.

‘I see that we share a reminder, of the man who wrought this world between his eyes, it’s an eerie thing isn’t it? In some way, no, no, I don’t think that will do.

They’re gutless?’

‘Not in terms of their body composition. ‘

‘Tall, I see the land, we are approaching.’

Both of the supporting hardened basins appeared to hold it up. From the looks of it, at the very least a few hundred floating platforms were barely touched, put around the rims of a satellite-belt like holding cell that was revealed to them as soon as they approached.

Boarthram and Simmerm touched it, right beyond the rims of their fingers, before they could make a fully-fledged contact with what seemed to be the end of the life-forms they were reeled back in, as if they were but drawn in and out whenever the force that kept them locked inside willed it. They were incapable of coming to their sense-arousal, everything was static to them, almost lividly dilapidated by some manner. They were still incapable of putting themselves past it. As it drew around and finally spoke. It was alarming, but it drew near, like a tiny blocked in place, little nurse with no face and no way of properly being, a property of the stars, she opened her mouth, though she looked humanoid her speaking orifice wasn't. Widely opened and contorted like a rising tiny circles that pushed about the other half, the farther end of her mouth being just put through so much of a less agitated mark. Slits appeared just about it. From which came the beam-like pushes, little pockets unpacked just as soon as they were left about to seethe through.

If there was something, if there was anything that would take the mind away, it was the strange ship-like growth in her back, drawing out energy and little specks of light from many of the adjacent platforms surrounding it. Living wretches like her were not to be surrounded or approached for long. They were become the space around them, the air, seeping in and out. As they saw her become, stretched upon the ship, as she was bore through it; no longer looking humanoid if only vaguely could it be called, no longer could arms or legs be seen but elongations which flew around the room as they appeared to be everywhere, just about and right beyond it. Where they couldn't see whether or not the ends of its limbs disintegrated or somehow were become it; I have a balcony filled with spiders and they're as big as the creature that stood inside of them. They are unnaturally shaped unlike this creature, giving it at the very least the unfathomable appearance of a large deformed cracked scope in the middle, as if the organic matter was fighting for control while being constantly subjugated by what seemed to be an unnatural amount of dark energy that seemed into it. Yet sparkling teal-green, whitish could be seen as they popped, as it drew about in its chest then out. Heaving around the place, seething for what seemed to be a bothersome broad-stroke around its unnaturally set face. Dread had taken hold of her eyes, if it was a her or that unnatural state she took was only meant to serve as the men's most distasteful embodiment of evil, in which case, suffice to say, it yielded as likely as there would be results.

Terrible tongue she was speaking in of ill and more malformed-in buckets kind of way she appeared to have been fully if not nigh-entirely submerged inside that terrible thing she was become, having finally split in the middle like a reversely blooming flower that pulled everything in and out. A bulk of strange objects in the purple tinted almost fall through if seen below the feet kind of way, if they had actually walked on the sight of the horizon vertically speaking. There were twenty largely concave-point at the middle inwardly gnarly hand-like things with long stretched elongations that stopped fifty feet in front of them before they began growing tubularly upwards, having finally receded into one of the flying pocks that waited for it, where the growths began pumping in and out, no longer being capable of slowing down, as the main-mass was completely encompassed with wild forms that could not be distinguished from the most unnatural of destroying touches, many marks and many foot-hand put-through pushes finally disabling themselves as the many body-casts death-masks without their heads began appearing from every possible direction, being pointedly thrown at them, before they stepped back. A dark ship filled with utmost unnatural malformations had brought what seemed to be a single speck of mold-like grown in petals- most deceitful of creations, base-like plant forms with angular wrapped-in skin-beds wrapped around them, with the pillows having grown at the top, dark plates that were but partially if not entirely inwardly depressed as they hid hundreds of viscidious melts, as wild attempts to push away from the bowels out of which they stood, in part-stranded, on the side-erect. As the ship opened, the strange energy drawing creatures but reeled back in some of her limbs only to have itself planted, furthermore into one of the ships that appeared, eight more having already made their way through, completely evacuating the sky of the unnaturally flying-distraught creatures. Many of the platforms themselves had already puffed themselves up as to look like wild balloons as their vigor was yet to be known, having already poised one another for as quick as an escape as they could but put themselves through and soon after, their they were already touched, or had touched what seemed to be a good chunk of the sky, dilapidated as it were, they moved like air-tunnels leaving their mark behind, every second spent in the air, or the strange imitations that could be felt just as murky in the air had but wreathed in and out, jerking as hard as it could as every puffy-feeling surrounding it filled the sky with a guzzling scent, a strange color change having changed it to a strange almost insides-of-a-man kind of red, although puzzlingly, it could be seen around the time they both looked in the distance that there were plenty of stored in men whom had been taken before them, who had been clearly mastered and put to waste before they could even come to their senses and realized that they were slowly being conquered themselves. And it was a feeling unlike any other, one might even describe it as being divine by some manner. As their bowels turned, as their feet were toeless and no longer could they be placed with whatever else there laid around. No longer could they fathom standing, or sitting or being in the same spot, as they wallowed through, almost in such a salient manner, as they would've been most likely disemboweled if they even flinched at the approaching images. They whom were like- them were brought in, though they were not men, humanoid and no creation, whom looked like hollow-key spots from the distance until they approached. Until the hairs that made the man-casts seemed to be completely worn out as they were but soon revealed for what they were. Many of these elongated tunnel-like things, which crawled like centipedes, or ear-crawlers were but thin inside, but they were sponges. From the hollowness which was came, the humanoids-shapes that were put one in front of the other in front of the other attached as If they had been standing in line inside the tunnel drew along on a peculiar deformation-like access, from which their long work through pincer-tweezers' like limbs started puckering and manipulating the men in whichever ways they desired, being incapable of drawing breath.

Boarthram was the first to pull away, thinking himself capable of withstanding what went through their heads. He was worn out by a coughing fit that had by now completely accumulated inside his throat, be it as it were, it was something he could not get away from by any means, having already accumulated a great set of put-through, large tubes barely being seen before they woke up on the side of the Core. It stood there, lodged on the side of the room, dripping as if were open, a growth of cages surrounding it, as if they had encased themselves in an utmost severe layer of protection.

It was the failing of a moon from the looks of it, or the side of a swollen star. Rather on-set on trying to leap about from where it stood, like a little dark eyelet in a brothel; without the means of singing, it bore. A dark little star was it no more, for it whispered itself away. Disappearing before its time could even draw it along the way. As much as they could breathe in what was going there, it made no difference whatsoever.

They could feel it even there, though there was no sign to show. Simmerm showed signs of pollution, his mouth was openly concave, a giant tubularly faced parasite bulb-boil came out of his mouth instead, from the insides of which a mounted turret like gun with many shoo-ta-barrel tube-like speaker appeared to come out of with many small mechanical black hands with faces on the many joints where the segments actioned the device appeared to come out of. As every face was but followed around by flying little face-like look-a-likes that were shaped like fairies but were the focal point of the mad signings he listened to. He was the man dressed in a black robe with a sacrificial blade in his arm who figured that.

‘In order to make the Core appear, we must sacrifice something near the zone it disappeared in.’

‘What gave you that impression?’

‘I know it to be true, there can be no other way to get through it, I have to open this womb and slip inside of it before I get a chance to fully breathe in the air and the musk.

I must take the coils off this waiting room, this great waiting room and become, unlike the previous attendees, the means of carrying the sacrificial urge. And you shall help me, Boarthram, or I shall beseech upon others that you may be locked into a tiny box. Then cut by all means I shall. Like a butler cutting a slice of butter through a magician’s box, desperately trying to saw it in half only to give up half-way through once realizing there’s no butter in.’

‘What do you expect to get out of this?’

‘I do not know but I can feel something in the core, something beating, desperate to fight, something that’s caged in, fought and wrought against by dead giants, I can see them, even though you may not believe me, I can feel their presence oozing inside my very chest, moving along and wreathing in, out, then stopping.

I can near a time where I may be able to touch them. Ever so near that my heart beckons a return to a much more primordial state where I am but a cave dweller, a thing that cannot be blasphemed any longer, tormented as I am, a servant that’s to be put down before his time has come yet.’

‘What do you see in it?’

‘I see nothing and I can feel nothing.

But at the same time I do, you must believe me Boar, it’s in my mind, it’s always been in there, always forcing my head to decay, always bringing the darkest of thoughts. Clawing at my throat as it desires to pull me down and wreath me into the barracks of evil and of despair, to shove inside of me the most unnatural of gulls, that were to be and enter as well.’

It was a steal, but so were the rooms. All of them taken from another world, it seemed. All of them broken, and misguided within the mark of the hour where they swam inside the first of the insidious lulls of meatiness-plastic they entered through. Slowly making their way through what seemed to be largely plasticized little moist-antlers, put down, all of the herds were munched upon by tall, incredibly tall creatures, red ogre like things, tall and hunched with a few ugly looking eyes strapped randomly across their faces and foreheads, red-burnt tawny, large teeth protruding, multiple chewing jaws and multiple sets of teeth all thudding along as they began munching on the bones they picked from inside the now emerging muck. They were but drooling over, chewing their own lips during the process, on their broken teeth, as such. It was a strange room, the tapestry was but a purple coffin shape but stamped multiple times, sometimes opening, releasing little cat-eaten like mummified dwarf bodies, soon to be ingested as they were lowered from such a depth, a few more than a few hundred meters in the air, where a strange flatly-bloated incessant creature with an umbilical-cord like eater shaped like a corkscrew with a sharp sting but penetrated the little creature and ate it from within, like a madly wrought arachnid watched, whom bore his head by chains, lowering it slowly before he could have time to latch upon anything else. In its mouth there was as much as eighteen volts, this was the light machine apparently, which was extracting power from the dwarfs that swam in the pools of dirt.

‘I think we are being visited.’

Simmer said, and as he looked around he saw, he noticed that the door was still open as well. Somehow incapable of making it past the door no more, there was nothing falling on the other side. But this was no room after the far edges that pushed forth, but appeared to lead to some peculiar stony-murk land, stretching for miles, no world and no sky but a mightily defiled out-stretch of space, where the stars stood there oozing in and out before their time was come to leap away. In its elliptical gaze there wasn’t much, for every short hour was about the last one he could feel, en trance as he were, he was no longer mourned and walked thoroughly on peg-walls.

‘Listen to me Boar, we’re being followed.’

As soon as they turned they saw the lower ends of the giants, being thoroughly shocked at the blasphemous reddened-like bearings they had to themselves, the strange almost contorted spear-shafts they seemed to walk upon, hundreds of them, all made of cartilage and of skin, painful to look at and to listen to the thousands of incessant poundings they gave in.

‘So what? I don’t think I can move anymore.’

‘Why, what happened?’

‘I can’t see that well anymore.’

He took a second more to gather his strength.

Neither of them understood just what was happening or the conundrum they were in. They were in a slump if one at all.

He slowed down too much.

‘I can’t see anything past this point. I feel as if it’s become an obsession at this point in time. How could you understand it?’

Over the past few months I’ve been having this recurring dream I can never escape out of, no matter how hard I try, it’s inevitable. I know I am trapped but I still can’t get it out of my head.

I don't know why. I'm always making my way towards the States, riding the tram, a dynamite belt around my chest, twenty, fifty or a few hundred of them. A bag filled with nitroglycerine filled jars, and an old vintage revolver in my right hand pointing at it.

At the very least, you know.' He smiled just thinking about it. 'The dynamites all have my name embed on them, as if I'm not intending on simply blowing myself and the Rockefeller building off, nor sir. Instead, I want to put on a show, I kind of want my fifteen short lived minutes of fame. I want to be a rockstar, you know? It's the finality of that event that sells it in, my incapability of escaping the racial impulses I inherited from my ancestors finally taking over me during a prolonged violent outburst. I keep thinking on how I'm just going to end up badly, end up hurting, killing and destroying a lot of lives because I see the same traits in those people that I see in myself. I've come to realize that I was wrong, after all, man is capable of change; I am not. At the end of the day these will always end up being empty words; my actions will speak louder than anything else, that is to say. I cannot change the past, I cannot change the present, I cannot change the future either.

I am always going to be a member of the evil race, boy. It's just how a nigger may always try shedding its shade off but will always be the sole inheritor of the soul of a nigger, or lack thereof.

It is a dilemma I cannot figure the solution of and that's the reason I don't think you'll ever be capable of understanding why I chose to slow down and stop. It is the fact that I know my place in this world; it is being aware that it doesn't matter whether or not I'm an unintelligent, moronic, uneducated person, in other words being self aware, but being aware of the possibility that I could conceive something that could result in harming a lot of people and whether or not I ought to continue with that kind of conduct. There are a lot of things that are unforgivable in this world now that I come to think of it. And creating something of malicious intent is but one of them; I don't know. I'm not capable of fixing anything from the looks of it. At times I simply feel as if I'm a petty criminal and nothing more; thankfully I'm too insipid and useless to be capable of doing anything serious, it is the only solace I find refuge in. Knowing I won't end up killing millions, knowing that I won't create chaos, knowing that I won't start wars, ideologies, and being a no one and a fuck up, being poor is the only thing that gave me half a mind and the only thing that's made me ever so slightly honest.'

'Are you done yet? I feel like you're, I feel like you're making a scene for the sake of it.'

'Then I am going to change, for the worst, I will do my best to catch up and I am never going to stop until I will have killed millions of people.'

'Well good for you, at the very least it will be a better change of pace than complaining, won't it?'

'Then let us leave this house and let us make way, my dear companion, Hugh, I think with thine help, I shall bring destruction upon this world. I shall bring only darkness in the heart of man, and it will never stop of wreathe away!

I shall cast all into darkness at all cost!'

He considered as much, as it was the only logical conclusion he could ever reach.

‘There is only one thing left for me to do. I shall become a dark sorcerer of the Nigger Killing Element and spread darkness and despair across the world!

For there is power in lynching and skinning niggers alive, and fucking their kids as well as putting them down.

Why, I wager, if I ever become rich, I will do my well honest to God, as my honestly given responsibility there is, to kill, slaughter and destroy as many lives as I possibly can, I will and I promise. Not only does money and power corrupt, not only am I too weak to actually resist those influences but I will also do it, exactly as my racial characteristics and traits dictate me to do as such, out of spite, on purpose, as malicious as possible, for no reason whatsoever other than being born evil, acting in an extremely beyond and over exaggerated sociopathic manner but also, I may as well just say this, I am going to act as self-destructively, most assuredly antagonistic to a comical level until I will have become or attained the status of evil, having become a living canard that will instill hatred for my own ‘people’ from this point on, in the future and until the end of time when they will have either become extinct, exterminated or simply, ethnically cleansed.’

‘Marvelous.’

‘Indeed it is and you shall help me attained the needed wealth that I may bring destruction over all mankind.’

‘Why am I going to do that then?’

‘Because you’re the only creature in this world capable of empathy, and I’m going to exploit that because that is what I am and because it will make my life slightly more interesting.’

Then there was the entry that was most required since there was no reason to lay anywhere else. Always of a mind to lie and cheat, he opened the lower throat which was placed inside his chest, having already made the necessary cuts as his fingers were as scalpels, always taken from one side to the other, whenever it was needed, he would bite.

‘I think I’ve come to understand what this world is made of.’

‘What about it interests you the most?’

‘I do not know, perhaps it’s that, isn’t it? It must certainly be something I could always point and grasp at, you would do me a kindness, now.’

‘Is there something you need?’

‘Pick that leave off the ground.’

They exited through one of the windows, having broken half of the hall they entered through, only so they could exit out the other side of a much greater, unfathomable end, a beast that had beseeched upon itself to open and draw breath. It was seen, it was open, it was split and it could only do whatever it could in order to spread its anchored-in filth beads, those tiny eye-lids being out, instead of thin-thin elongated wretches, and long-headed put-together barely legible features, which, in all honesty were quite a few to begin with, always trying themselves out. It was a change, all of the sudden, the sun was up and it was worming, like a painting ruined, colors fading, the canvas no longer being filled with paint and oils, no longer would the restorers be portending as to repair every missing piece and crack and what about was there if not, brought to their heads, it was obvious that no man would even know what happened, if only they knew what to cut.

‘The Restorers are still there, I see.’

They were open-jar bodied, and little humans swarms inside of them in the billions like insects caught and long devouring themselves. Such a frail symbol of scum they were, the sum of every single one of them being only added to the deterrence that was decay, all of their limbs falling off and squirming as they were become, along their way, evolved and allowed lives of their own, it was only a chance, but one had to ask. Where they came from and how long until they would reach again and make another cut and all looked so different, too different, new was exciting, and the fat lumped creature that was him, Klicks Knicks, reeked of looking.

He saw all of the limbs become, and watched with just as much jealousy as he could, incapable of turning and mourning what was done and of lesser worth, he asked.

‘Where and how? ‘

‘How about the hour?’

‘What do you see in front of you now? ‘

‘What do you want me to see instead?’

‘Instead of what?’

‘The dark glooming god I see, he made a hole with the horn that was entered through the, through the, you know what it is.’

‘A slight chance that might take from me, that might take out of me whatever I see, there’s something in there, isn’t there?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘I am so excited, I’ve never seen something so strange before, it’s out of this world.’

‘Open your head now.’

He did take his time doing it, as his talons contorted as to look as if he hid, and took, his mouth agape.

‘Something happen, yet I see.’

He made an open wound out of which came disease. And there were all kinds of unnaturally shaped, more than dejected, fantasies to no end.

‘I can still hear it.’

‘What is it that you hear now?’

‘I need to hid in another body, I need yet take what I can and claim what I want.’

With which Klicks but simply slit his eyes in the most unnecessary way, it could only be conveyed as such, he could only draw and lay and become whatever enter his line of sight, a mirror of water, a pool in which he swam, there was no end to what he could become.

‘The wound has finally come to facilitate in my view, whatever else there is, I see no other reason to claim otherwise, and claim it as it might be.’

His hide was made of something better, it could only drag itself and move away. From the front of the rummaged in falchion – like entry, there was a depression that had pushed in, farther into the ground as well, even farther and farther away, there were at the very least, the entries of which, many beasts, would’ve made their home, if there was a slit, it would’ve been found as well as it could be abandoned, yet again, abandoned so.

In the heart of it stood a great thing, that could barely be made and could barely move along its feet.

Thine, for what was worth it, scepter of evil bemused to be listened to during evil hour, when most abhorrent of lays were beckoned to be wrought inside and wrapped around the trees as well as the coming of the evil days was already become, as one might feel there’s little hope and little less with every drawing moment to draw away as he had but pulled it out of a rooted hole, which had been dropped by misty blow coming from hardened steamed, mightily made by swollen fist and left behind to watch. Neither men could but understand whom and what was the meaning of that one that drove through, as far as he could reach until incapable of drawing through, his fist but lacerated, damned; but its remains but pushed around – partially rotten in the most capricious manner.

‘I must say that, with supreme conviction, I’ve come to realize that this filthy foot-hole that’s been driven through and corkscrewed by force is but left by him.’

Who floated above them, although ripped around the ankles and without a reason to be seen, it was mightily clear and even less adjustably so, completely broken and largely demoralized as to what the creature had begun looking at. Its heads tendons were missing and there was a large patch that had been covered just about the place in which it stood. There were other longer hooligan spear-chucker rods that drove through the entirety of its body, that appeared to seep in and out, clearly making a most unnatural river-like bloody sound once finally released from the tap it was set in. Gritty teeth grinded to a conceit, thoroughly until the shrapnel enamel was come to a pudgy yellow; but that those features were rather dragged along its body from a shapeless head, and a cut through throat that looked like a murkily murdered piece of fetal alcohol syndrome – naturalization that gave it an unnatural uncanny look despite their migratory movement, in which case there might’ve been a good enough case for either one of them to stop and prevent themselves from drawing in and out and the others. Since there seemed to be hole-like star entries pushing out of the main river-cut that’s been pushed through, many of the wasp-like flying blotches, of which strange color was but a mighty greenish-red were but completely inserted into it, devouring as they please. At the end of the stump which, without a doubt, was the same entry – exit point where the front side of the robust paw that entered the land, they were seen. Presently eating; both men decided it would be rude to disturb them since there was no reason, absolutely no reason whatsoever to do such a thing as to, well said.

‘I think this rod should help me.’

‘Taken from a trunk, I see, are you certain there’s nothing dangerous about it?’

‘What danger could there be of a broken rod like it?’

‘It’s a stump and we’ve already cross the bank.’

Rightly so; only a few feet waited from that point on. It was an unnecessary thing to watch. They were just like them on the sides, like replicas. It was hard to tell them apart, or as a matter of fact, it was hard to tell the delimitation apart. A cut-like the shape of Hungary allowed for the land to stand out. Attached to the trees were long wedges of skin that connected to the sides of men where various projections of Kurt and Klicks were being made, yet there were no hands or arms, no stumps, only that long flipped slide they looked at. It was enough for them to understand.

Open-through just like a plaintiff door, they came about the ribs of it and entered through just as soon as they could have themselves through, as more followed. A stair-depression led them down, there was no star and no end.

‘We’re being followed, I think. ‘

‘We’ve been followed for some time now, but not by whom you think, or that you came to observe either.

It’s the rod, I’m the one of who’s stalking you. I’m also there, I’m also here.’

Again, Klicks pointed at the rod, as if it bore a big red tapped gloomy ball on top of it.

They were just as soon entered a giant bird they found no reason to delay the inevitable flight. It was empty on the inside, other than the floor-organs that were all piled on and sutured together and the weirdly rotating strange fight-dummy things of black metal whose but spinning hit-a-mole extending tongue pummels were close to touching either one of them.

‘Wait, before we leave, what if. What if I’m not really a kike? I actually do not know. Hmm, I could be in grave danger if I am not, there are vile things I may not be able of getting away with, if I weren’t. It just occurred to me so.

Why, I.

My phenotype is bizarre, yes, that must be it. And the degeneracy I’ve read about, that I’ve been studying, it must be so, I think. There’s no other reason for it.

And you must of the darkness that is in my heart, nonetheless.’

Before he opened his mouth, eight thirds of his body were become the back of the bird, having become a giantly wrought it hole-maker with many puckers and bucket-heads.

Both drew in a few trees and made way towards the flight of skin-trees.

It is clear that it must be so, the plight that is the schizophrenia, the plaguing neuroticism as well as the bastardly set-in control of the opposition flow through my bloody veins. I am plagued by this evil degenerating spirit that consumes me so. Even the block of skin I am trapped further bloats my veins, he thought.

As the many pucker mouths appeared, all of the sudden they were become again, and wreathed in, as well as they could lay themselves wherever they reigned.

Genetic-decay

‘Even since I was a child, I began fantasizing about being a criminal. I can’t pin-point the exact location, but I suppose that will make as little of a difference as there is.’

Like all of his malignant dark race, he infiltrated in skin and plot, wore humans and was quasi-alike to them, but always of a mind to manipulate. Next to him stood another tool to his employ; a different tool for every watcher, he was gray and tall, a race of sapiens that were head-in, put through some jar, all but molded, drawing in and away. Couldn’t make the proper directions, for every head that was appeared around him spoke a different tune. And they were many and always coming into view. Their sight; part of the city-plains, flattened, and only a few huts were put everywhere and most of them were rather savvy-skinned and made of jolts, and little creatures popping, being pucker-blue violet-red. Dressed in a placenta-like eely-stuff that was brought instead; but neither of them was safe, nor would their lives be completely protected, alleviated from what was happening between the two of them or the exchange.

Soon, both forcefully bowed and made to leap around be; chained like pecks.

Made together to be clustered as they were become, joined by a test and eaten in part, whereas the most unnatural of cords and plenty of unnatural shapes were worn out, then put in stoves, brought it and worming it to structure. A mine and a mole and plenty of bodies that had been born, and carpets, high-raised roofs and large monsoons of canaries all but adding up; pincers adorning the great jewels of bloated-fingers put in pus, pushed around and beating as the masses were but traced around, and cast. Into the dark of the ravine, there came. Mutinous cable-pains, many added to the grain that was become, the skinless thing started wreathing in and out, before they sapped the meat, from there it winced. Many rivers of flowing specks, and many others came out as well. The land was but a frame of what it used to be, many of the buildings were brought down upon disease, still flapping unnatural winged, cordially put down trenches-dug. In the surroundings mounds, lesser flying desperate to be in sight, and little more than unnaturally deformed procrastinating casts. It just so happened for a birth to occur, seeing how the three strangers were but killed before they could push him out, stranger, yet obscure.

‘Mlesskl Lhur, you are released from sitting in your spot. Thine will is evil, and you are brought back to life. Thine will is pain so you may seek each man there is out there to inflict as much of it as you may.

Thine will is weak, thence you might find a spine. Thine eye-sight of all needs be corrected or you shall become, as they say, without a mind to fully indulge, of what is happening around you and what is become all, little subterfuge.'

Most importantly, it was cold there, and wretched.

'I've come to collect my due, if one doesn't share, you ought to.'

At dawn the party came and gathered around before one of the moons was being wreathed in, they were little plaster-puddles hardened as they came to view, many of the eely-eyed, eerie as they came around opening one at a time, largely mechanic on the inside.

Only a handful of them were wretched.

Lo' and what came after them was brought from farther on and put behind, when blinded by whatever light, for light-bulb pointing from the insides of thee fleshy moons that swooned around.

A man of all, a man of old, him but wretched hasn't told.

'I wonder and I won't miss as many, even lesser, it shouldn't count for any, I see and need be heard at last, before we venture through its thorough insides.'

But, for what was worth and what were fewer, and fewer men were to come around and make a case of what was brought. It was necessary to think and let alone believe this Jopnak Pouch, he had but come at last, and let alone, a watch.

'I must confess, I've been avoiding them and I may not be able to make it any other way, for I know I shall be bored with dames.

It's for that reason that I must be left alone and walk as well. The further away, the better, for I am incapable of committing over the longest of whiles, you must understand that about me, good friend, I may not be capable of wedding your sister by any means at all.

Though that may harden the disease, and make us mean, by all accounts, it's something I may not be capable of making out, or making off by myself. It's unfair towards whichever woe.

I cannot stand for that long and I may never be able to force myself to stay, and look, along the way, what if there was a child? What if there was a lump of my own I would not be capable of raising myself? It's saddens me to think as less, but that's something I simply cannot deal with, raising one, and trying to best others while neglecting him, without caress.

Alas, I think that is as much, there's just no company I can keep around for long a while.'

'But that doesn't mean you may not be able to join us in our journey, doesn't it? This is as much as we have now, for a short enough mind, there's but purity to it and a properly working brain that won't get left behind. I understand, my dear good fellow and I must alert you that I won't feel any kind of disconnect from what's to happen. I fully realize that you might abandon, and I accept your treaty, as fairness is to come.

Just take a step forward now.'

'I can't, I don't know why, it's as if I'm frozen in here, and I can't get my pacing right, if I walk too fast I'll stumble over, if I am too slow it won't matter any longer.

So what is my alternative then?'

'Whatever you do, please do not stay there, since there's a grander world to see, do not seethe for things that weren't meant to be. Come here, please, don't aggrandize.'

'I don't know then, I'd rather be alone in that case, if you don't mind. I think I ought to walk alone for a while if you don't mind it.'

'I won't, but then I bid you fare well, we shall make it through this grand concave and see what lays beyond the unawares.'

With which they left the men and boded as such. As soon as the door opened, alas, but a valley in size, the sides were worn, but desperately boded, wreathed along and despairingly bloated. Many roots were up and down, there was a sky, they were around, no place like it by any means, wherever they had been, there was no certain way to lay within.

Before a long way, before a mile, what they had been brought forward to was but a seeping tile, a pair of them on earth like flocks, and many birds dead that were but reanimated as to seethe and lock, each other off, incapable of prodding on.

From one of them, as such but followed, whatever he had been cast away, and would return, the day after, left alone tomorrow, there would be a cast, something to be worn out, he came at last. Shown up from the larger depths and made to wreathe in and out, as if they were dead. Or had been for a mighty lash, and everything about the ordeal smelled of rancid cast.

It bore itself up and spoke, alarmingly so.

'You've come within reason to ask me for a stay, you though there was something up here, the land is but the way it stays.

There will be no change, no higher-houses raised after I'm but done contorting, there will be nothing else other and none to shatter whatever you are looking yonder and for that I ask of you to wait.

Nothing else might come underway, not if you stay both of your hands, they're worn out, I see.'

'I've been doing some gardening.' Said Drovsky, he tried crying out a single name, something that he could bastardsly spare, but there was no reason to seep in, there was nothing going on for him. It was simply there.

A lump on his heart he was unaware off. Despite the fact that every man who was around seemed to be, as alert as they could possibly see, there was just as much as they could do, it was not to be put on their shoulders, but who saw him last? Where was the man and where did he hide?

Always living in that little spot, always living in the dark.

There were largely decayed and stone-bottled large structures, many stones lumped and barely put together, all dilapidated and repaved. Put down to walk on, with the lichens and the dead remains.

Great of men and graven more; it was those that were there the longest who were known.

Drovsky stopped and turned to fiend, he fired a glance and deeply within.

‘Who’s responsible for carving their names?’

‘That is for neither man to know, nor ask. That is for neither one to realize. You’re but a speck, a derelict that cannot see far ahead, or you would’ve chosen to stay.’

‘Have I left yet?’

‘It’s undergoing either away and that much you should be aware off, it’s something I cannot delay, though the other men will stay.’

‘Why must I be the one who returns yonder?’

‘Because you still feel some responsibility that is far stronger than common sense; it’s just what you are like and nothing might take it away.’

‘Will he listen to me?’

‘Perhaps not, stubbornness and foolishness may play a role in that.’

‘Will I be happy if I were to save him?’

‘Only as miserable as you know you’d be, even before asking me.’

Whom to forget what opened there, in the midst of where they spread and spare, of seconds more, appeared. The fiend with a lanker soul and would to disappear yet on sight.

There is a locked house of mental illness in Beirut. It’s hard to point where it starts and where to begin, but as long as there was something in to do.

A door opened on the side, from the draw-in forward came only a clam-chum, whose name was Smith.

‘We’ve been waiting for you for some time now.’

‘Who’s asking what?’

‘I am.’

As soon as it happened, the bird had already landed on top the roof, toe-in-deep, having already taken the head-piece that had been left on top of it. There was no reason to stare, there were only a few men present escorting him as well as a few more than unneeded, unnecessary witnesses that drew on. They were Informants, by the looks of it.

All speaking of the core, and the core was infested, the core would talk of the most dreadful and most immaterial of all, it couldn't be set in place, the core was rotten, the core was theirs.

'Whom to speak in the name of the core and what is to be fed to it as the time draws on?'

'One of the filthiest of things can be put inside, those that ought not to live, those that have to be defiled and run down at our feet, there is no question about it. As long as their hearts were rotten, there was a slight chance to be.'

And the first of the molded anchors, in his heart, he laid, much more prettily, it could.

A fashioned man which bore his back shook, he appeared out of nowhere, mainly with a cut. Which had been brought to his awareness, there was something one could not see well.

'I see you brought someone else as well.'

Neither of them could understand what happened there or anywhere, else this could be just as set.

Yet the creature couldn't help it. Man-shaped mold, with a tiny core inside his back, growths sprouting out of it, like a cunt-slit across his rack, from there a rail-like push through delivered, and little more of it, could be. Many hands and many reapers, came as long as they could be released. Many of the outlandish growths were insufferably set across the full extension of its host. It couldn't move properly from that point on, let alone make it so it could move whenever it liked.

They were not there for any other reason, nor could there be another; yet the core was left behind the birth, as Mongol's wrath seemed to seep through dirt.

It pushed through crags, and many briar, many other remains that pushed through the mire.

The mirthful creature only stood, at once as it appeared to move, across it shook, no longer swaying for a watch, no longer filled with incertitude and better yet, caught.

It appeared like the Mongolic protrusions, the many illusionary things, the features and the molds and the many other mongrellic growths and allusions seeped out. They crept about, the sphere, the core was suddenly lost. No longer but a womb but egg, no longer caught and no longer filled with seeping dread. It poisoned all, and seemed to drag. And Mongol then again declared, the emperor of all.

'You' of all are to serve now, and you shall do as I say, or else I of all shall enter thine heart and push it inside your filthy marks, and make you as I please.

Contort you with the bitter filth, until you will have become but naught, a race impure as mindless as you are distraught.'

'But who are you, dark creature?'

And yet it could it be seen. As if the man was standing there like a rat-looking weasel, with the fully set protrusion that rested there, without confusion, its arms were connected to the pseudo core, fully if not fully absorbed, set inside and yet devoured, like tiny pucker growths that couldn't be admired, little more than set they were, filthy and distraught and even more so, damned as well. Pumping but meat, filling the features that were seethe, many elongations of other shapes came and followed after, right until the point where the elongations between its legs appeared to come after. They molded and forged, liquefied all but never drew on as to show some pain or sutures, his form was set.

First of all eight heads that came in the front were as dreadful as they pushed on, with the more Orientalid of features that could be set, their unnatural vigor and beady eyes were dead.

‘I seek too infest this world with as many filthy things as I can shove on.’

For the world was pure until the apparition of the dreadfully malign creatures that were made to appear, many of whom were set near the purity of the world. Were made to bring destruction and discord among all pure of men, as the corruption drew on.

The earth was pure, but then it was corrupted, all the dark races were but shoved on as for the will of evil to be enacted.

Thence it happened, for there to come forth.

A myriad of unnatural beings, the Asiatics of his kin, so on:

His servants were but many.

But many of them no longer showed their initial features and epicanthic folds, which seemed to wear, even their mongoloid features appeared to move on instead, in a different direction, wholly spread on either side, longer as their faces were drawn, as far as they could be tried. Yet they carried their arms longer, despite their short statures, many were but long-backs, from whence there sprouted their many legs and cracks. They spilled. But skin and cartilage upon the bile of which, they only carried. All the fat added on, and they were molded, wherever else.

It was how the insects bred. No longer forced to adhere to the rule of a single child, instead, they carried but themselves, all but hundreds upon hundreds upon millions of lookalikes, within a single carrier, that moved on. Viruses were carried, but that was expected.

All but served, without a need to ask or question.

‘They have been trained well, as well as you could see.’

All of the sudden, upon the elongated core there was as much as one could see, a giant unnatural, thing, a consistent giant face of which basin could be seen, and deep sockets, as that of a Semite, yet the Mongoloid eyes were still to be recognized. A breed of some long forgotten, long destined to mental injunction disease, a Eurasian prince of much decay that baffled everyone present, as well as everyone since. Since there were but many mouths that shot, lips and rat ears that fully protruded out completely yet not the upper side alone, a smile that would push fully so, a bottom puffy thing that sunk. Yet the mongoloid eyes could not be denied. If one were to see the growths of hairs, they could notice the sub humanity of a tiny speck, a Negro thrown along the mix, he was but shuffled on, drooled and winked in a most tiny short manner.

‘I’ve seen to it that the entire world is but infested.

My traps of metal but to be set and used, as I protested upon the likes to enter, I see no better reason to shove away.'

'What have you done, dark creature?'

'I've made use of this core to further spread my decay.'

'And whom master do you serve?'

'It's of little consequence that you know.'

He said and little faith in the matter painted a smile most abstract. It was pitiful and disgusting, disturbing even yet to see, the malign thing and how it spoke from there on after, and what else could one be if not petty, if not dark, if not arrogant, therefore on. It dreaded to crawl forward, changing in shape, no longer simply yet filthily erect.

'There is no future in hybridization.'

'And that's only but a thing that needs to happen for him to come to power, hide. It's the will of my master which I carry on through will and time just so everything he wills upon this world be brought on.

It's something that's yet to happen yet it needs be forced by all means, it needs not be contained within, it needs not be feared, as I will it.

As he wills it, that being said so, it will happen nonetheless.'

'There will be consequences and you shall be stopped!'

Therefore Mongol only drew on forward, ill in mind. Why, bloated streets angered all that looked everywhere around, it spread. Like a derelict thing incapable of moving or conversing about what happened, a pretentiously penitent fuck with little to nothing to its face, about the middle of the door.

'Why has the core not spoken of you, so?'

'It has, it has and now it moved and drags us all along.'

It said, but neither man understood either.

As peculiar as it had been, it shook.

With the ritual underway, over the top of the chasm stood a core, inside of which stood Mongol; he seeped in.

'For the good of the world we must kill it, that is the only way we may, yet to live another day.'

'And what exactly is supposed to happen after? As soon as its body is done decomposing in the air?

As soon as its subhumanity is to be put back where it belongs instead?'

'We cannot know for certain, and as a matter of fact we may yet to wait and see what happens after.'

‘Then let us proceed if that’s the case, let us wait no second longer before the time draws on from that point on.’ And then, they brought their hands forward, extending but an arm’s span, many of them bearing longer hatchets and some of them blades as well as draw-bearded hammers, frozen solidly with rocks, to fling against the body they assaulted. Giant Goliaths followed after. Many of them pounding as hard as they neither could, incapable of drawing away, nor could they shock at what had happened. With every disastrous hand, that came as long as they could adapt to what happened there, what was soon placed in turn lay down, like a myriad of dark blows reminding them that what they’ve done shattered the ground with such a loathsome force that it split as soon as the pulmonary tract-towers, the antennae shaped blocks of power, risen to commune with the land, painting the green grass in a decrepit mass, barely put together and flung around as more followed through, bastardly spreading as they could but be incapable of stopping half-way through.

Yet the adjacent lands, though split among them didn’t shatter, didn’t fall, instead it made way for either one of them to enter as soon as they could allow for them to start again.

‘Keep beating on the corpse of Mongol, we must break him by all means. Butcher him entirely, we must until it no longer seeps.’

Within every blow between the soles and the sides of the sack, a part of its malignant body started falling, as it tore itself apart, ever so derangedly more, until finally all blows were struck and stopped, and there on after, what had happened, from the bloated way, in and out it started swinging, like a cradled child, a fetus that would refuse itself the misgiving.

‘I shall not allow myself to be destroyed just yet, not while there’s still something to look after, better yet, now I return and crawl and I shall not leave myself exposed just yet, not before the time was brought on my terms.’

With which as if it were a slithery snake, it started eerily slipping through and into the black pool of the deranged chasm it went.

Past through what seemed to be the completely dead and forgotten side. There was no life, yet the core was still above, caught between each glimpse and side.

As it happened for the sack-tadpole to push through, what seemed to have cut through everything that might’ve been misused and changed, again and again, something drew on after, mixing with each echo of laughter for the voices that died off.

There stood the entry of an Island, standing, ripped apart, the men taken out and hanging on tables, doped, and filled with morphine, they cackled as well, larger things above them entered through the waste of air. Above and beyond as he seeped it, suddenly split, the tadpole weeping as if in pain, jerking on the ground as eerie large pylon-like nails were to enter it from every side and every single thing as well.

Signs of blue coils, and of weather- like wind and fluttering spoils of purple-blue, of spells and of emptiness cradling as if they were called on cue, they followed after.

And Mongol soon brought himself to waste, as useless as it had looked, there was no doubt about him being as weak as he claimed.

‘Why am I punished now?’

‘You failed me, you ingratiated being? Your spoils are done.’

But it was no living voice that spoke to him and no other way to understand.

On one side of the Island, the entries to the broken blocs, and many of the movers but impaled by spoiled cylinders that twisted and mixed around. On another, followed through the break, the corpses of many, all piled away, though many of them repurposed and turned into homes. A lighthouse could be seen amongst many where the living yet came to rose. Yet one another, twisted, all the dead things, brought to life, but undefeated.

‘A chaos caused by the core!’

Yelled a man, having come and stumbled upon the realization that the core, the birth was but twisted and but spoiled, as the men kept puncturing it above, they have come to see. And bid him the time, and be made aware of what was happening around them. There were no chains to hold the Island from falling, no pit to fall on top of, there were some pillars that receded underneath them and partial humanoid flyers that were but long defeated and at their feet, rested the world.

A body that was prolonged, one connected but too rottenly wasted, just like everything else around their mournful songs.

There was something of a molded shape, one that formed a pyramid of a bridge, slightly fallen, broken through and rotten.

Many slaves having been brought from there as well, all bearing the dead-bodies and long-infested, darkly yet demented imbeciles that were defiled; fending off the bile, it rose.

‘Unfortunately, you’ve already been completely killed.’

‘But such a vile thing, how could that be?’

‘Death was permitted in your case.’ Said a bile, a man that was not only morbid, but seemingly defiled from the looks of which, the crag he was in.

Charles, seemed to be up there.

Though his back body was that of Blue, a strange suit, hollow all the way through, opened and revealed as such, as if he were a maiden made of iron, or a torture device, with all the spikes.

‘Things have changed and so is the world here.’

‘So it is not dead, in that case.’

‘It’s only filled with corpses and a few survivors, nothing more and nothing less. There are families and many survivors, as the destruction turned out to be a failure nonetheless.’

Stronger men and greater fighters made it through, though many are even less recognizable that we'd like to know it so, all the way through, we made it.'

But alas, as Mongol started pushing out, lifting itself up as to avoid, the many pins that followed after, soon enough they lost whatever filthy joy was there to begin with.

This world was completely infested by a plague.

'You're not alive, nothing is down where, how dare you claim otherwise?'

But there were no signs of there being anything but a rotten thing that shaped itself like the man, like every single one of them that approached after.

'Poisoned, everything is poisoned here, isn't it?'

But where? What place would be safe from this dark plague that corrupted all? There was no grace and nothing, nothing salvageable, all was distraught and buried on.

The chasm remained in its place, wrapped around the towers and formations that kept men from going out their way towards it.

Where else could there be?

'Rotten cadavers, that is all I see down there; the corruption has already spread, I see, there's no breaking of the core, there's no killing Mongol, now that he's escaped, there's only waiting now, to see whether or not the corruption has spread beyond it.'

And as soon as men stood there, contemplating how to act, they simply started shedding away their number, slowly fading away from the area. It was completely missed.

Farther in the distance, long before a deep refuge, inside eye-grovel stood, above the rims of air, the citadels that shook, all watching over the chasm, all chained to the ground, held from falling down, buried away.

One of the men was stopped while running.

'There is no way to contain all this, you understand?

There's always going to be something seeping in.'

'It is our fate alone, we cannot escape it, no matter where we go.'

How could one even trust him from that point on? Lying bastards, and backstabbers, all of them, all caused by it, no doubt, no less.

It was something, close to a realization, just what and when?

'What then?'

‘I do not know just yet, but I will find out soon enough, I won’t be as sleazy as to forget what my goal is, and I shall stop at nothing to attain it.’

Said the man and right before he could be grabbed by his shoulder, he was just as soon, gone. Lost around the area where he had been initially found, but there wasn’t any trace of either one as soon as the area shook. It started spreading like a hot-iron mark on top the skin, breaking everything down to the nearest crook. They fled. And in that night many men found themselves alone, brooding, ruminating at what happened.

The apparent fall of Mongol seemed to change nothing. Apparent ill could still be seen, like a disease nowhere near being spilled or being cured. There was no bastardly thing that could be wiped away and completely removed, there was no interest in completely nullifying or suppressing it before it had a chance to spread, within the hour, most found themselves standing alone, wasting away. Incapable of even being changed, they seemed to be part-cloth, not fused with them, but just as torn apart as they were, falling apart with everything else, always a button falling, always being made to waste.

As soon as Acheron stopped coughing, he looked ahead. A slit of light came from the front, it was blocked instead by the outline of a great slipping in shadow that just as soon started pushing in. There was no attempt to reconcile with what was going on there. It was only the company. Mittiek leaned against one of the adjacent wall.

‘We tried, haven’t we?’

But there were too many things going on against us, too many factors we’ve yet to account and before we knew it.’

‘You don’t have to rub it in.

I know what this means, there’s death now, complete and utter death, without redemption and without a chance to drift away from it, or survive. How could we be so blind as to ignore the signs?’

‘We were purposefully blinded, that is all, it was something some of us knew yet didn’t have the power, didn’t have the strength of many. Now.’

‘I do not want to think about it.’

‘Then rot away, because either way, it’s far too late for regret.’

What could come after? Nothing, the bastardly cursed races destroyed everything, and everything in their path was taken down without shame and with as much virulent madness as they could fill themselves with. No house stood and no sign of there ever being any kind of civilization. It was just one of the growing signs of unrest that echoed the most. There was only one chance to cleanse the darkest of the people in power, one slight chance to kill an insignificant fraction of the world, but that was missed and deeply rotten, fully fledged as to be forgotten and buried inside the ground, with the rest of them, as well as everyone else.

This world could not flourish with everything being taken into account.

For that reason, within the blink of an eye, the core suddenly changed.

A land that was no longer darkened, but gray and flat, and many brought from farther and farther away had finally come to rest.

Lest forgotten, there came an unfathomable little lesser than a humanoid men, with only the lower side resembling but a plethora of strange nets spread across the sky, from their hose-gut push-outs that allowed them unnatural flights.

Gathered around a dancing circle, like a ritualistic thing, they started reeling in one another, swatting the conglomerate of puffs, and wrought about formations that simply came and popped in the eye, likened to shapes unseen, appearing at will they started bloat-inflating.

One top of one remained a rider, of whose hardened chitin stood barely rotten. IT was greed and looked like man, as if he were on a crime scene, embed on top his armor then, the rotten smell, the flies and the strange thing that were his eyes, two faces overwrought, and seemingly, he was conjoined, but thin around the throat, uneaten. Bastardly thing, only one arm he bore, and largely beaten.

But a band around his forehead had he bore, flaccidly down, around his eyes, his ears and more than a few marks were there, going around, entering his temples, then his eyes. Dyed in the symbol-red, a miasma came around them, as if from innards-trenches that came about.

A little shout in the distance had him fly away from the scene, as bastardly as to look at the dark-ashen gray gradients, would feel and echo in the distance bringing, a sun-whitened point, the sky. But what stood before him on the ledge that stopped his bastardly put together flight and, whatever came to mind as well was this.

‘You’re late and you owe me as much as a thorough explanation, at the very least, I’m to be told what it is.’

‘I do not know what you’re referring to.’

‘Course you don’t, yet I can still feel the fact that you are hiding.’

Both were frozen, yet in place. They could see each other standing, now moved away.

The Rider Empatuihbag wreathed himself closer in. He was bastardly looking in no, often to be seen, direction. Only a few formations came here and there, as if they had been around the place and merely waited for someone’s return. First the long roped flying bags, filled with hot air, coming out of them, one starting from his gut, entering the side of the old man’s face as well as it could be brought around. And around the rope there stood but a few hundred more, unrecognizable features, most of them being completely sickened on each other like rabid filed dogs that couldn’t help themselves, their origin singularly unknown. As soon as he was allowed to move, he saw himself on green and verdure, talking to the man whom wore a coral nature cloak and cowl.

Approached upon him with nothing more but a barely fashioned thing a blade, ready to do what needed if will called it so, to the ribs of the grave.

There were multiple cores attached to his chest as well, seemingly appearing out of nowhere, although one could and mighty as well make the difference between them, since so many of them were fakes. Cracked egg shells that were put together, grown out of him whenever it could be helped. It seemed, ever now and then, that they were simply, releasing a peculiar tandem of smoking peril, which seemed to appear in the air. Although he simply spat and upon his spittle, the sudden release of air suddenly dispersed some of the smoke away which in turn, released the creatures in various stand-upon levels of air upon which they stood on top of, formed for whatever other reason, than to spoil within each other's reach, since they were immediately made as to be incapable of moving from one spot to another, they were simply frozen in there, waiting for him to get closer.

Yet he turned just as soon as he could, being met by seemingly nothing else but the side-long stretch of a boot-orca he entered. At the head of the boot-orca, there rested the great two arm-span from shoulder, openly stretched almost arms pointing in the front yet incomplete limb protrusions, at the base of which they carried along a ray of reptile like skin, with spear-shaped cartilages that were curved at the tips forward then downward like taps with opening spear-tip beaks, the figure bearing a strange skeletal larger than its body cranium of changing skin-shapes that appeared to grow then recede out of nowhere, like growing then bulb-in the box tulips, almost rabbit-like, while, its four arms were completely stretched and created the illusion of a standing cartilage gate, or two semicircles, stretching as far as to reach the ground floor, worming around as the palms had become wriggling cracked discs. At the back of the great creature stood nothing less of a great pair of eight put together body-skin tag bags that were liquefied-attached to the rest of the creature, going as far as to create a pseudo tail coming out of the area between the back of its head and the one that was a few centimeters in its back, many of them being embraced as if they were hugging as if the bags had opposable limbs, despite them not having any. Seen from above the creature looked like a peculiar chariot with a great sculpted, attached thing, or a chariot carrying a giant statue's head, with meaty ivorylike tusks in the front, large rubbery eely things on both sides, and a gut-like big growth made out of meaty inflated fat rose petals put together to the main form, or it could be seen like the hilt of a sword, with a skull bearing two adorning tusks against a blade that was far removed – still seen from above, that, while ignoring the various shapes and forms that would gather on top of it and grow just about the place, from every possible side and from every possible corner of the creature. Rather a mammoth-skulled creature with two cartilage scissors pointing at one another, while the lower half of the body was but a conglomeration of a few barely put together legs, many of which were entirely conjoined and incapable of moving from one side to the other, yet served as support, the bodies in the back but looking like a pile of cocoons put together, dragged across the ground. Seen from below, the creature looked like a strange, hard to see, hiding inside a shell insect, with strange elongated insect limbs and in the front, or the bottom, depending on which direction it was lined towards, scarab-blades, with a bunch of multiple put together larvae like abdomens connected to the opposite end. Or a flying thing, whereas the skull is the chest, the long shoulder protruding limbs being the legs, the four extended arms the wings and the further end of the wriggling tags forming the necks and the heads, while a pair of legs protrude out of its chest-mass.

He was looking at a strangely bizarre large color spittle of blue, rogyaiv, a magenta block of chalkboard sized rectangle checkerboard if hued to look green instead of various shades of purple, with some of them bearing smaller in the middle of every square – centered green colored squares that not only oozed but also colored one another with color projections that floated in the air as to form illusionary pseudo constellations in which sleeping holographic figures appeared to float, almost nakedly if it weren't for the tattered robes they were wearing while being rotated as if they were actually being slowly roasted in order to get eaten by the likes of it, there being a slight obtuse intrusion coming out of some of their chests, in these almost cage-like almost pyramids without the tips. Especially from their chests and the lower sides of their bodies from which unnaturally deformed dark headed wreathing almost cylindrical bone-carriers, organ-carriers and machine-molded part of the body like eaters took the main mold of. They seemed vaguely entranced by the very fact that they were not human by any means, nor even entirely humanoids as it was largely confirmed by the animals inside the room of which heads removed themselves from their bodies, revealed not open ends but stumps instead, fur-covered stumps that made it seem like they were more so, toys rather than live-animals despite their sudden reanimated nature, furthermore adhering to the strange levitation which started breaking the heads apart until they were completely twisted and turned into the projections, having been fully if not nigh absorbed. From the looks of it, the transformation was highly unnatural. Since every single strand of hair appeared to be completely broken apart before being carried over, split and cut, as to become almost a spear-like shaft of needles that took the opportunity to launch themselves while attaching to one of the main bodies they took control over, then, what appeared to be left out of the unwrapped in half beaked parrot, as it suddenly split in two, revealed an intricate inside system of strange almost almond colored devices with many curled fingers around a ball motion like inwardly facing cartilage hooks that shoot against their very own ends. In some twist of fate they also bore molecular level almost epidermis folds that formed pink globular form-like nuclei-things that appeared to be constantly be forced out of their invisible tape-worm like pockets, pushing out as they would form large killing almost tendril attachments to the air molecules in which they would breed as to turn them into small wombs as they gave birth to ugly looking inbred beaked fly-like nails that would insert themselves into the room's framework as to reinforce the walls and the structure, since the main cartilage of the building was very much alive, bearing strange mechanisms of death, which every now and then grew in side as to home thousands of killed bloated small-tiny African-nigger heads pus-black people bred inside of, before they died. Niggers are an inferior race, that was an accepted fact.

The framework of the boot-orca being made out of cartilage overly grown and evolved whale bones.

It was strange, the way in which the glow-orange tall humanoid arms forming frame of an asterisk in the middle with every limb curving in a strange box in the back with little heads facing towards the wall like thruster appeared to be creating the pus-gas. Little more than a few hardened lumps here and there forming in the air, then falling down, in the middle of the asterisk frame there being a giant almost horn-like structure hornet-hive, which opened, from which the cut-through face of Horn came out, with all her limbs but struck about the insides of the asterisk-cast, in her lap there being the wrapped around body of Lurid whose pestilence could eerily be felt. It started seeping in, but nonetheless.

She opened her mouth and appeared to spit out the insides of a strange tram which had been used to lead her there, piece by piece releasing it from inside her mouth, after she was done chewing it, a little more than a red light completely encompassed the room, having made an almost flat like effect before dissipating, leaving the giant boot lodged inside the orca-boot room. There were veins attached across the room, many of them baggy looking gray, the blood of Mongol, Opium was pouring in the room as well, seemingly infesting them slowly, one by one, whichever one dropping down seemed to return to his place soon after. Little dead mongrel adorning the room now, opening themselves as they would release small barely born-bred flies, allowing them to ruminate inside the air, wallowing in pain every now and then.

Thence he was joined, as soon as Horn stepped forth.

‘Have you been waiting for me now?’

‘For a while, I suppose.’ Said Empatuihbag, whom, in turn was incapable of trusting what or where he was heading towards, since every single wild depiction was there, standing wrapped against the walls, they were skullheads inside the walls, dangerously inclining, he came settled with.

‘I believe there’s nothing going on in this place, what do you thing?’

To which Horn brothled as any other nasty cunt would:

‘Fancy yourself leaving this place?’

‘Not just yet, I suppose, not just yet since there’s still something I have to fix, there’s still something down the way, I think.’

The rider pointed at the floor, there was a point where little more would’ve made no difference than each tile being misaligned, everything being placed as far away from where they were, before they could even be placed, a while, he stood. And questioned, glancing.

‘Where would you like to accompany me to? I suppose it’s as good a time as any other to invite you whenever it might please you, as to bring your farther closer by.’

‘You’ve met him?’

‘Of course I have, Horn, I know whom you are, and what they’ve done to your, as well as that. Leave the cast you’re put inside of, your maiden of iron, your torture being undefiled; you’re free to leave your torment for a while now, at my invitation.’

‘What’s the reason for that then?’

‘There’s no need for any reason, other than the fact that I’ve come to understand, there’s something close to a speck of grit, something seeping in, from just about and every place. The longer you’re staying here, the worse will it become and you can count on it, by whichever way there is.’

‘It’s something that cannot be quantified, so how would you know what’s happening here, what’s going on around?’

‘I can see it and I’m not mad.’

‘And I am?’

‘You’re the head of a maiden, carrying in your long-legged arms, but a little wrapped figure that isn’t breathing, and you most likely think you can bring it back to life.’

The walls of the orca-boot were peculiar now, since their sudden forced servitude that couldn’t have been expected otherwise. As a matter of fact, it seemed mightily clear that there was enough space to consider filling as the mongoloid veins were rather out-spread as to cover the few meter pinched gaps that had lain between one another, having been forced to lay in an almost, every few meters down the line choked like pushed forward position, upon the sudden unwrapping, parchment like of the outer skin that was placed upon the elongated Mongol-vein, which in turn looked like one of those lizards whom are struck in the process of extending their throat-skin in an almost pane-like satellite antennae-like manner, forming pseudo cartilagelike canopies if seen together, these canopies of skin having been wrapped around the main Mongol-arteries, like some strange Mexican burrito of meaty skin, which moved on top of the walls as if it were a hovering – a few millimeters off the wall kind of push through, which in turn, began stretching, connecting, mold-liquefying one another until they almost formed a pseudo-suture between all of them, as if there was a curtain of skin placed between long deformed beaten from behind with a wrench kind of pipe, there barely being any kind of straight on the wall kind of touch with the side of the canopy the tendons were still attached to. Making it seem as if there were huge, wide-angled areas that seemed to be more flexible than the rigidity of the others, these vein-girthed tendons but stretching all the way up to an utmost unnatural looking elongated at the top, formed and pointing at the middle of the ceiling kind of small mount-effigy bearing the look of an almost power-strip filled dark dripping black pooled girth to which all the tendons appeared to be attached to, pumping in there as if it were a machine.

As such, the bootorca, was, by all means hung in the air by what appeared to be a strange elongated set of crane-like arms-shape formations that were not only intersected, intertwined and crisscrossed but also appeared to have formed an utmost chaotic kind of shape that would resemble an almost rapier-like crossed in a battle kind of sharp angles that, many inflated sustain pillars, as well as many other stick-like formations of metal that would combine just about everything in this mega-fallen over almost melted girth of small put together almost cut in perfect cubes floating buildings with their apartments being made to look as if they were actually living organisms, that would come out of the many open window-holes as to become, in an utmost incessant manner, solitarily so, balloonlike inflated objects or chewing bubble gum kind of types, after being chewed a few times as to leave a single downward looking and stretching flat bile pile that's connected to the main inflated form, while, instead of hanging flaccidly so, the ground would be the sky in that case. Or rather, the balloon-like warped forms made out of a green-like almost eye-texture-like thing with many nerves still attached to it, wrapped – around by nets. Warped as in, these strange bloated organic balloons being drawn to a non-existing iris that's placed at the top, where everything seems to be inwardly drawing as if there was a small sand pit at the very top-end, or a small coin-like depression if seen from the distance, and with everything taken into account, the many nerves being attached to, and them being, in this case, completely formed and spread around the empty fillable hollow – the walls, with them being more than the nerves, as they were also the cartilage, and seemingly bore plied in shape skin-sheets upon which they were placed on top of. Inside the floating building square there being, attached to, this seemingly being the reason why many of them are kept behind, as if weight was attached to them, where the skin-sheet tendons draw down to, a large almost square-thermometer of heavy weight, dragging everything down with it. Yet these weird balloons by no means are the cause the flight, or levitation between this peculiar sea of many worn out black bars and strange formations.

At the very edges of both outwardly protruding angles stood two claw-like formations, where the chaotic mess of ironed-in place metals appeared to be molded with the boot-orca thing in which they stood. They stood there for the; off-the drop little skin-hardened pins.

It was full, and stranger headed, flipped around, gun-holstered Barroques gathered around the rider, holding him in place, not a single lance in sight yet all of them wore what seemed to be their guns, around their own temples, aiming as they pointed thoroughly at one another, asking whether or not either one had the slightest, of the shortest of blanks to load again in their canon-batter.

Neither one spoke, thenceforth they took position, large formations being formed around the great figure that stood in front of them. Harder, much harder to see as the rider bore a single sheet of steam-mimicry inside his coat he released by simply tapping on his coat. While this was by no means distracting, he opened an invitation, that, having already gone to his head, out of the large sheeted mongoloid veins, little almost eye-patterned flies appeared every now and then. Not even the mist looked as glossy as it should've, at least not likely, that he intended it to be that way, he simply pulled a single thing, it was no blade but an anchor-shaped little crick. A clicker with a bloated face, spread along and kept in a pucker thing, it pushed out a tongue that fell straight-dead, flaccidly resting on the floor like a single speck of lighter-cartilage, one that started growing on the walls as well.

It was a sickening look, as it drew after, with a single lamp standing after – a skeleton frame which appeared to bear, a single head wreathed out instead, like a pillar that had seeped out, it stopped the Barroques right in front of him, as the light emerged and filled the head of the ceiling, right around. It made as little of a difference as it would. Once, from this light's blue-teal reddish emanation's drawn to an end motion, upon having covered a great deal of area around every few meters around the top of the ceiling, there was no stop to its tender stretch, in how many sides the burning, almost beast like creatures fell, many of whom would not survive, in the following moments, dying on the spot. They sang and made to be. Split open and slits for eye-like holding cells, inside where they held disease.

‘What is the meaning of this?’

‘Should there be a meaning to it?’

‘I do not know, I seriously, I suppose there's been a misunderstanding, hasn't there?’

Both the Rider and the Horn stared at one another, most peculiar fashion, most peculiar legs. Since it was more than obvious for some reason, there was but no possible means to have her, not while she was standing, nor while she was acting that way, awry. A little more than a few seconds, and she would die, or so he thought. But the creature was still standing, it was as if nothing had come to pass. Not a single dead-light inside its eyes either, it felt as if there was no point to ask.

‘Whence and where, if I might ask, where and what are you trying to achieve, where to go and what to see, for what reason as well?’

‘I need not seek no other reason but to bring breath into my husband's lungs. There is no greater purpose in my life no longer, for lesser men, the likes, the stronger have left me whence time had called it so.’

Sound of violent ravings, the sharpening on iron rust on musky lichen covered stone, it flushed all feeling and appeared to make one feel of an utmost virulent thing, there being, desperation as the ill-shaped discs, and swollen as they were, inflated within, once they emerged. Fat-fattened with little red-green puckers and strange faces appeared to mourn.

And mourn they had, not for themselves but for no one else but the lass.

‘Dear lass, dear lass, you must enter thine path and turn around, this is a land of no return, this is a land of malice that not even a single man might live past forth.’

‘Are you blind in that case or are you forgotten?’ Of proper manners which were not to be counted in, to Horn’s remark, another inflated disc stepped right in, or at least one of the faces.

‘You’ve been gone through but appeared to be at a loss, you’ve abandoned your earthly form and now you’re nothing that could be passed.’

‘As any, either.’ Yet another disc, after, this one distinctly set in its appearance, as many mouths formed and lured it; as such: ‘One, you’ve missed, you’ve abandoned your previous form and now you’re anything but at peace. You’re nothing and that’s what you’ve become, a butcherment, disease, and for no reason will your husband mourn.’

‘What is to happen to me in that case if that is, as such as you imply?’

‘Death, of unearthly manner, though not bodily, of mind!’ It spoke, and just as soon, from one of the bastards, outside, one of the blasted bridges, the platforms of many births that came just as soon to life, it appeared to be of no lesser stature, and of no less woe.

Their heads were boated, yet stood tall, a few arsons that were brought, and settled of fashioning their flame-throwers, having started spraying chemicals on top the tendon growths as well as on everything else that was there. It was a mirthful sight, at the very least for those standing around it. For, when they settled, too many cores were made.

From the side and out the world, where the boot was flat and the orca was a thing of its own, floating and swimming in the ocean-air as if the stars were but little spikes pointing at it, a wild voracious Patricide had happened after. On top the boot stood he, the father of this world, now the Orca looked after him, for a great piece of its head was gone, wrapped around the flying bloated mammal, passing, casting only the most unfathomable, hard to look at stares. Yet Horn was still there, as was the Rider, whom had greeted her for a very while.

A tall figure was he, the Rider, the horse conjoined to him, the patterns wilder, brisk and brushes, bristles embed in his being, the wild abstractions and the Yellow head, wider, was the call to action.

‘I can give you a chance to leave.’ He told her, while at the same time keeping distance, for they were in such a place, where the chaotic growth of many metal ledges would elate even the worst of beings, most of them having floated in an inhumane niggardly manner, niggerish as in against life, unfathomably inferior metallic matter being put aside, then around.

‘And if you seek to bring him back, I may.’

Yet he could or refused to speak on her form, out of fear, not to hear or to think of such a thing there was, a mild apprehension that would claim his mind if he said the wrong time, again, he drew closer.

It was a spark of largely deformed yellow flowers that stood in the sky, there was no space around, but a strange almost stage-like pain that formed everything and every single glowing wild stalactite and stalagmite that pointed towards the platform they were drawn to. Inside these strange insidiously formed coffin-like structures, one could hear, which disproved the relatively, barely formed in the subconscious mind of Horn, the noise made by the tapping fingers whom had belonged to the trapped fingers inside of these closely encased coffins.

There was no deal, precisely, but a call of stop to action, since there were things that could most likely backfire against anything and everything that even crossed her mind, it was a puff of head that appeared to be broken every now and then, time ticked, they were but bulbs and flowers. Many of them painted yellowy as roses-white after a shower of paint from above.

‘I am giving you but a chance to continue thine journey, back there, and you may go your own way whenever pleasing.’

‘Why should I take your word for it, that he may be brought back to life as soon as I comply?’

‘Are you not a woman then? Are you not to obey?’

‘I was butchered.’

‘Yet you’re still one in essence and in play. You shall still listen, be submissive and do as I say.’

‘What if I am betrayed?’

‘Then you are to live the rest of your days that way, wonderingly so.’

‘So be it, then, it’s what I choose. My choice shall not be forgotten by no means and know that I shall. I shall seek retaliation.’

‘Yet ill-searched, for I may not be harmed, I whom am above all life, I whom live in such realm;’ To that he pointed, larger oils and wider stretches, all appeared after, that, to come and brought to snare, a sight of paintings everywhere.

It was in this realm he lived, uncanny, the nasty rosary, the growths of plants, the floral embroidery and everything that came to his mind, all and all, brought to him, for life and stall had taken a peak. His eyes were verdure, but not in the body, yet in the sun, the many things but looking and staring at the little dark spidery thing that was attached to her half open mouth.

‘I will obey in that case.’

There was no way down, but it seemed likely, that it would not matter. A hole formed out of nowhere, where she stood, like a small entry, from where a small rickle of barely formed short-hands put her in a barrel-cage, dragging her away as soon as her mouth was shot.

Neither of them could make out what was going on by any chance or means.

A pair of little barely shaped Tenors with their bellies fat, of whom, but looked like nastily caught, there came an open mouth from one’s belly. It took a while for either one to reel back in and out, on the side of the boot, as the land started pushing out of its hiding. A head-shaven to the brow and two listening long-heads appeared from around their spikes, little more than bloated stalagmites standing-open, elevator-like reeling in back and forth.

‘Why, you, of all, are yeast infected, you were, for the longest time, and thine content.’

‘There are echoes left on far, thine land, there’s nothing to see not to be drawn to when they call upon a bird-cage pair to sing and hear, a leper’s song.’

Part of the land started, moving from one part to another as if both were part of a partially decayed landslide never to be taken out of place. She had been there within reason, accompanied by them both, incapable of making out the reason for their presence, or why she still stared at a wrapped around corpse, she wailed, but then again.

‘Would you happen to know of any safe path? To look in any other way when needed, or at the very least tell of the time?’

There can be no other man of trenches coming forth. Within reason they started, just as soon to ask one another questions among the road, seeing how it had become way, beyond it, least of all, too bastardly to wait before, construction done, the workers would be risen again. Many of them or either one, too drenched around their heads, no longer. Not to stand in line, many and lesser of them, were strung along and least of all, and such disaster as would follow.

It felt as if the weather would worsen out, especially since the dead-birds whom had showered in steam made clouds were yet to make a case of it, since many were but pebbles in the most unnatural of weird throngs. In skies of alabaster songs, whereas neither nor a single one would know of the alternative, that it to show. Horn had but strung a few, many of them hanging on her suture segments, many of the birds but new to this kind of pain. Seemingly skull-exposed, neither had felt a fraction of this strange a pain, which was by all means insufferable as to wail in it, and face for long, there was no certain way to avoid it either, for all the time in the world seemed to stop in front of her before she could even try a thing.

‘Don’t swing them off, or else, something might happen.’

‘Think it’s going to last until next Eve?’

‘Their deaths? Bothersome as it is.’ The Long head said, right before being joined by a fourth member of their most salacious cult, and then. They seemed to have formed a great mound, at the very least, eighteen of them were present but neither of them spoke too loudly, not that it would matter for either one. Since there was no precisely strong, or sudden movement, they walked through dark rains formed out of the most unnatural things, bodies of benign. Maliciously forming themselves out of thin air, then prodding, many elongations, many that were harming themselves along the way, although neither of them touched the ground. It was peculiar, how and for how long, it took for them to understand.

They were all watched by greater forced, many of whom but served the Cores, neither one. And lesser things, the eggs cracking, the shells’ echo but slamming against each wall and in that room there was naught greater than the Mongol and the ones that served him before his time was come. For he’s been brooding there, a leprous frog never to be, too aloof in fleshy feeling, but never understanding, as the few of them whom were present around Horn, and would’ve made, within reason, something of their home had asked.

‘When was the last time you’ve spoken to him? To your husband, to your lover, when?’

‘A long time ago from what I remember, and I’ve yet to find someone akin to him, someone who might help me, whether or not, in insolence or whether there might be so called back upon a time of happiness and lamentation before a time when I was brought to walk.’

‘Where are you heading to in that case?’

‘It’s well that I’m content with the fact, that I may not hide by any means that the Rider in his home, which brought me no less into the boot, has instead, betrayed me before I could even get a chance to retort. I see myself as far away, I see my vision let convey only of the darkest futures there might be, as there’s no possible reality where I may see my husband walk again.

That I may see him animated, and least of all, to suffer of no pain as I would’ve had it.’

They feared the dreams, the ones that happened to be there, around them, in the surroundings, or the wild things that popped every now and then in their heads, like little specks of bullets, that came from her as well. It was immaterial, to say the least, even trying to make something up on the road.

Since they could all see it. Materializing in front of their eyes, It was like some kind of malign evolutionary scale made out of put together past species that held a screen, that thing stared spreading on the walls and on just about everything that lay around it. There was no stop and definitely no beginning nor would there be any kind of hope to try at it, since by the looks of it, the screen bore, in its flat square appearance, bare-teeth around its frame and edges, going around like a band actioned chainsaw that appeared to completely cut through the simian fingers the slaves seemed to bear, right before they reformed themselves into a point and another.

It was a dreadful thing Horn could not stray away from, this road seemed like a self fulfilling prophecy, by all means, a trap and a cage within itself, trying to make her look away as these long-legged backwards walking creatures began heaving the screen, tilting it ever so slightly at to be slightly pushed forward at the top, backward at the bottom, forming a perfect almost titillating to look at straight plane. With wild images appearing to be somewhat struck in a still – straight in relation to the curvature of the screen as if, if the screen had been straight, the image would’ve been tilted in the opposite direction of the screen if it was in its tiled position. Like a pendulum of images that appeared to be reactionary to the way they’re pointed, in the strangest manner possible, they seemed to go back and forth in these strange rotations. Baleful creatures dances in the strangest manner, all covered with strange glowing numbers that appeared to contort and make all the shapes or give life to the strangest of things, walls that were curved at the top and formed climbing regions that were but peculiarly grown at the top like strange boil-filled unnatural demonical figures with large elongated heads and shoulders, these shoulders bearing large opening from which snake-like push-through coils but opened only to reveal sun-discs structures with humanoid head-wrought in pincer shapes flowers with spikes around the edges of their bases that bore strange openings with large pin-like string formations that appeared to come out as partially transparent almost invisible flies with glowing flare like stickers attached to their ever growing insides that appeared, if a man saw them, as bubbly optical illusions after staring at the sun too long, yet more curved as if they were sickle cells in comparison to normal blood cells. Despite, what appeared to be the tilted screen’s actual representation, that being, the fact that this was but a strange portal leading to another, different world, the flatness of the ground was but a simile of the world, which was but almost tiled with strange man-like casts that, the further, as they were projected on the ground, they approached the wall on the bottom, which were more like fences which depressed in a concavely rounded edge kind of matter towards the box-like formations that appeared to be concealed by the walls as they, strangely so appeared to merge at the top of the box-like pot base in which the strange elongated towering creature-object was lodged into.

The man structure which was surrounded by, almost a Chinese-wall kind of matter, by a solid livid fence that was barely touched by talons and almost pseudo-human hands at this point in time was almost formed or placed in a, kind of medieval kind of fortress manner which only revealed as much as many wall placed defense towers, as they served no purpose, that being, added to the fact that their towering elongated bodies were more like, if one were to look at it from this angle, kind of jack in the box formed chests, leading to a chaotic non anatomically comprehensible kind of chaos of forms and heaving shapes since the head and the throat and the shoulders made it so these things were almost plant-like than living in form since their heads and the features were too indistinguishable from an overly bloated hive filled with growths-like over-the-top pushing skin-formation kind of melted honey, with pointing beak-like crushed at the top but curved upward like the edge of a folded sheet of paper which had been set on fire by a lighter, the tip of the beak being shaped like the wildly swinging flames. But the simians carrying this strange portal wore not normal things themselves as they only seemed as mesmerized as everyone else, but they appeared to bear large almost unnaturally shaped, crab-like legs that were pointed towards the group that pushed onward towards them and backwards as well as if they were actually machine-like in nature, while these rabid almost two dimensionally represented teeth were but pointing outwardly toward them as well, as if they were but the flaccidly almost boiled at to become more flaccid sharp fins on top the lividly morbid decaying screen, the rot that spread across the decaying figures as well as the road. At times it seemed that even these guards that accompanied Horn were just as decayed and almost completely rotten like everything else, always threatening to fall apart as they drew on from that point on. It was something, unnerving.

How, upon looking on the side, as if there was an empty valley, she was being followed, in actuality she was being followed. By the vile evil orca-boot, with its black infested dark claws impaling the main structure, while its many feet but pushed onward, always making sure to stop as to make it seem the entirety of the valley and the world was curved as to create the illusion that she was walking in circles.

There was no sun either, there was only a core.

And many of the cages were already beginning to appear, by all means the giants were no longer standing-rotten but were beginning their flight towards one another only to open their almost shut-cut stumps in which they held spear but not flaccid like coils, formation as if sharpened out of branches but instead of branches the trunk of cut or fallen over tree-like-oak, from the side it fell, that is to say, these almost spectral looking bones being pointed as if they were Gatling gun barrels or ancient gunpowder siege machines, or stake-launchers, but fleshier as if meant to connect.

The time they spent in each other's company was inherently, in terms of how it truly was, prudish, benign, she could remember as such, having her husband kiss her toes and do what she wanted, he was in love after all and there was definitely no problem in the world nor anything that would get between them.

But she had no toes and memories are poison for her mind, at the very least these kind of memories that appear not only out of nowhere but they can't help themselves but intrude wherever and whatever, at whichever point, she was but incapable of making out what they were doing there, what they were doing at all, the mere problem being but a constellation of images, of visions overlapped. Seeing herself going through a piece of her door, her room and on the road as well as everything else, while the Yellow-headed Rider kept pouncing in his tiny boot, walking in a most deprecating manner, incapable of looking beyond and after, as if it would've matter to a point.

It was the fence, which delineated the road, or at the very least surrounded it, not to come too close, the guards, her referees but spoke, and clouded as their judgment were, they said at last:

‘Careful not to be absorbed in your thoughts too long, you cannot bear the thought. Of lucid dreams and those things that take you to a place you can’t last, you’re wrong to think that you can help it.’

‘I think I can, I need to see why he’s there, still alive in a dream.’

The room they were in, it was there, every few meters, separated by one another, with him struck in frames, moving from one side to the other and then again, no longer capable of saying much. Since his loathsome mouth was but a trench dug inside his jaw, moving in and out, a plump cylinder with strange sounds, and morbid wrongs. It spoke again.

‘You won’t make it, can’t you see it now?’

The simians are laughing at you, even in their mongrellic shrouds, they wish you to fade away, they know you cannot be destroyed, but buried with the corpses so you may not come out of your way and do a thing you may regret.’

‘Horn, what happened to you?’

‘I died, a long time ago, yet you carry my body thinking you may be able to save me somehow. It’s an ill endeavor you cannot hope to possibly pursue. Even with all the strength of the world given to you.

At the end of the day, you’re still a woman, it’s not in your nature to succeed.’

She had not realized it so, but she was constantly being mocked by them in the worst possible manner, by the worst possible means, there was no possible way for a woman to achieve it. This was a task for a grander thing, a stronger foe, a stronger man, for whichever reason one might come to think or follow it so. There’s but a chance in hell, a testament even for the vilest men, to which even the fallen angel, Lucifer would yet attest. Regardless of the grand stature, or the vileness of a creature, for whom reason would detest, the ones to break, creature and to destroy were still men. By all regards, this was no invitation and she didn’t know how to respond beyond reasonless approach.

Come thee’ before here stood a watched, he had ripped the sides of one of the replicated, though without two walls through which she had previously passed through, as with all the guards, a tall grand and lesser broth, chained with steel and made as if wrought in iron, darkly armor.

‘Where have you appeared from?’

Immediately, as if on command, Lurid but started her wrongful stare.

‘What should I do?’

‘Don’t look it for now, avert your eyes before something might happen, unless you want to look at them, and if I may so, it’s not something I would advise you to do.’

And she was being followed nonetheless by a giant spherical like dripping on the floor thing with two almost crawl inside kind of mold-death masks made out of tubes, in which it started swaying itself as to stand in it for far too long.

As strange as this entity was, when it, and during its initial approach, there was little wonder as to understand the reason behind the many put together girths there were attached, and the little cut-off in a Dutch manner nigger-hands that served as trinkets around this well adorned frame that stood aghast to it.

It was this entity which made and loomed, and formed the strange transition between these strange mixed of colors as if they were struck by strange broach that formed and grew on side, the many spread that would defile even the slightest most immobile of forms and shapes, they appeared to hold every single piece of the wall, and there, and then again they walk, carrying them over from one side, to the other, avoiding the towering formation before it could draw onward and the lesser of each other, would they scratch the wings off, it couldn’t be called, it couldn’t be felt at all.

‘Where to and where to yonder?’

But her answer could not come after.

As empty as the world was, there were bastardly set forces, all but looking and glancing at one another in check.

‘Can there be another point to make? I believe I would’ve won if there had been enough time for a retort.’

‘You must not have thought so when you saw the stakes.’

‘But you are wrong, for I have seen him pace for hours, and days, down there, in the echo of gradients, where all the molecules are but split and echoing away.’

There was an open mouth shaped like the top front of a ship, peering out with eye-elongations slipping through he cracks and dents like alligator birds cleaning teeth-like when open, before they began gain, with their ballad of bland corpses falling on top of one another.

‘There’s but a single thing to follow after.’

Neither one of them could understand how it happened, in a matter of eighteen seconds or seventeen or six, something that was between highly observable and something that happened right as soon after, they were staring, if they even had eyes, at a most peculiar hard to cluster form that appeared, was part of the ground, started moving, flopping itself in the elongations, opened a few large tube-like squared holes in the high mass, from which elevator-like piled on top of largely built almost square-like towering structures with pumps spread all across them that were also painted in some greenish looking red that hard strange patterns that would make one thing of velvet with a skull thrown in every now and then and pot-holes filled with reeling back and forth bodies and skeletons that spat skeleton-fire shaped clouds that began molding themselves in pseudo looking fire-shaped people that ran in circles across the ground before they faded out. And before either one of the partially formed creatures could understand what was going on, from the distance appeared a strange walk on his own leg as he only had one attached to his body, but saw it as it were, leaped on top of his teleporting-a-few centimeters in front of him walk-on-top leg, which brought him where he needed to be. He saw a hell made out of unnaturally elongated ivory hairs that acted like long butcher pegs made out of sharpened coiling butcher's blades that would constantly cut him but he would only die in another world. While his body, which was in this strange empty place, in this empty universe which was caused by the strange melting over of the Mongol core appeared to have set many mongrellic bodies, that is to say, impaled inside every single arc-like structure that could be put through them. Niggers were also killed but that wasn't as important since there were specs of light-tar like stars that were lumped together in their own celestial bodies forming, if seen from the distance, actually shaped Medieval European Knight Bastard Swords that opened in the middle to sprout thousands of young piles of cadavers that hadn't passed the young mirthful age of sixteen, many of them but being the complete result of the, despite what one might be lead to believe, that is to blame the nigger immigration in lands they don't belong to, the black death, although in some way, one might say that they are highly unrelated, the corpses that were piled on the ground by these boiling planetoid oblong molded stars creatures but the empty graves on the ground which shot, in the middle of the strange rising foundation of metallic almost darkened complexions that bore the elevator pumping on every side structures, a hold. That is to say, the sword spat hundreds of these piles of corpses which shot almost elongated wretched melting like hands which attached to the main structure as if they had owned allegiance in some manner. Above there stood the strange man. No longer hopping but frozen on a single leg, around him but a strange rotation, as if drawn by some gravitational pulse the stars obeyed him and they looked like they swooned with evil forms and shapes that emerged out of them and began spitting almost centrifugal kind of deformed almost hand-extended humanoid in part blocks of skin that were made to fully extend their arm span at to attempt, in a most desperate kind of way, to suppress since the Suppressors were no longer alive, the pumping elevators which appeared to open at the top with x' like shaped openings which appeared to look like strange pucker mouth-like prolapsed hybrids from which dandelion-put together energy things filled with quantum atoms appeared to be slowly being drawn from inside of them, before being absorbed by these flying masses with their hands extended which desperately attempted to force these dark elevator pumping organs to work on creating instead of amassing the power needed to explode. It seemed like the star-shaped put together clustered sword only acted within the accord of the universe which only averted against this dreadful thing which could not be accounted for.

While this happened, the mouth shapes, the limb shapes and the other things that were having their discussion were actually contemplating a bottle. Somewhere in the air, a giant Crane, whom was no longer on the Isle appeared to open his belly in a rocket shape kind of manner, revealing a cabinet-shaped inside his gut where a lot of strange shaped people appeared to be shaped, in which there stood, for some reason the great Manno Filthde whom was sipping out of a jar-skull that was filled with eye-jelly like flying tendons that were all trapped in a fly-like biologically set trajectory, that was completely set on the upper side of the jar in which the tendons were actually trapped inside of, above the region of the jelly, which had been drunk by Manno's peculiar mouth elongations. As strange of a god as he were, it had no toes and no fingers, no palms but fleshy-eely almost drill-like things coming out of drill-like cartilage shaped extremities that at sometimes appeared to be lodged or a part of him, at others, were simply there. He looked down, the place was a mess.

From what he could discern, in the middle of the, what appeared to be, area, stood a pile of dark-rusted junkyard, kept in place by pile of web-like sprayed melted corpses that grew on top of the strange metal for some reason in order to keep it in place, while the strange beings that were stuck in their gravitational place were but jauntily moving in the worst possible manner.

Thence she suffered for more than a year, akin to a Hermit realizing her husband spent most of his time inside the house, never leaving that place at all. There was guilt in Horn's mind, knowing she was the sole cause of his death, this shame she would bear for an eternity, as the realization had simply kicked in.

Lo', the great man stood in his house, and life was grand and great.

'Death was brought by you to whom but not the man whom was in your embrace? By all means, you are a disgrace to all womanhood and all kinds of living creatures there are in this world.

Therefore you are true to your nature. It spoke to the woman, whom? Her consciousness, but women don't have that.

They're either here or there, or sometimes in the worst possible spot, especially the one that seems to always draw from one side of the ship to the other. Seeing how she merely avoided every possible disturbing contortion of room she entered, how she averted her eyes from what was or had been going on, Horn failed to realize that the growth inside of every little passage of every short chapter, inside every tiny book in her library as well as the coins that were spread in the rooms that appeared were somewhat dolefully destroyed by something, touched in the worst possibly unexplainable way. There were ant lines that not only did they not belong in some places they found themselves in, but it appeared likely that someone had touched something as well, around each edge of the hardly-pillared head-shaped inserted dossier that had been placed or lodged inside the wall. IT was likely that she wouldn't feel it, not after the first moment had left its mark. But this was not the rightful time to forget herself in the world.

Since her eyes had become but two white puddles of an almost unnatural-transparency that appeared to look at the world in the wrong way. Every wall and everything that came to her, every piece of the road as well as the giants that heaved at the rooms appeared, in some way or another to express a deep desire to harm her. By all means, this was something that she could not help but shy away from, since she was being watched, and cared for.

'The Rider won't let you leave.'

'Yellow-head won't allow such a thing to happen, you must forget everything you saw here and go back.'

'To where would I go and to what place, and where might I be followed and be allowed to go? I see no way, to such, and I see no possible un-contorted manner they would not push and heave me at, as to head into dark and damp place. As to face but what little there is, this agony but being a slit of disgrace.'

'Enough with the dramatic woe, there's but a strange that wishes you to know.'

Another one of these strangers emerged, the ones that had not only followed her but appeared to constantly surround whatever plain of sight, or would surround her. No matter where to look or what to say, or where exactly, would they lay.

'You are to enter and to flee, there's a place in the distance, through the portal you may see fit to bring your husband yet toward. It's as little as we can do for you from this point on.

The sickening of such directions, the latter of indentations, it's the only thing we want to spare you of.'

'And if there's danger yonder, that may threaten to kill my spouse, to kill my man and to lay claim to him?'

'He's wearied and no longer breathing, he's taken in a world that's shattered, look behind and look no further if you want to understand, if you want to realize what the alternative is, and to what end will you end up chasing him inside of.'

And again, like frames, the rooms were shattered, opened in the front and in the back, with her husband walking after. Always but in the strangest motions, never standing by the side, no break to be taken and not to wait for, and no longer would she ask, in kindness had she wailed, but went, towards this stranger place, this farther lopsided hold, that would bring but lesser kind and less disgrace.

'I see there's still reason in your eyes, perhaps there's something worth looking into, as for you, my dear, you'd better stay your hands and arms, you'd better show me thine worthy limbs.'

Strange as this sand-orange encrusted yellow-eyed, with little spikes emerging out of them, and a mouth that looked like the insides of a car. His mouth engine working, while she showed him what she bore; well worked arms it seemed, many of the segments worn to a whim at the very least, she couldn't explain what she went through but made it seem like she was acknowledged in the fact.

'Why are they still here?'

But lo' she looked, and saw but corpses, barely hanging, gliding as of flight. They were but part of invisible towers now, merely pacing after dust was gone. And behind them? Only elongations, stretched of empty plane. Which in itself was as straightly cleaned as to look as from a piece, cut from then remained where it was placed. Again, it was a troublesome thing, within reason, she had come but thin, of bread and of her mind.

She asked the sand-licker what he wanted.

'You were brought here to me in order to direct you to the closest thing you may follow to, that is to be, a slight rebirth. You may not have realized it yet, but you're alone with me, behind the plates.'

At which he pointed behind. It was taken from her, but in time she'd realized, the tinted leprous-simians hands, the arms that went around and stretched from but one world to the other. Behind her, the crumbling orca-boot was but fancying itself but longer, slowly placing yet itself on road. Aiming as for the many bars and many black logs to crawl, and placed about and many farther paces going, there was no possible escape, of, least of her, dire knowing.

'They will follow you until you die.'

'Who will?'

'The Yellow-head and the Mongol, both of them are but two sides, and there does not seem to be an end to their determination, there doesn't seem one that would bring them lesser, taken, and partaken into scorn.'

But even the san-licker, Shrub Fessed was worn, his garbs were torn, and he was but not trying to look no further than he let her on. Since neither one of them understood, they had rationed whatever lights they could. Not to stay in place for long.

‘Follow me and crawl upon my raft.’

With a snap, Fessed snapped his jolted fingers. They were both being carefully handled, as if they had been packages, immediately being wrapped and used, no longer to be called, and brought to such fuse as one would bring harm towards.

‘Are we to listen for reason?’

‘There’s none down there, at least none that would satisfy you.’

And tender as it were, they passed, not forwardly but downwardly, to a lesser place that wouldn’t, for the least of it, cast any suspicion.

A friend was waiting for her:

‘I’m going to slaughter your fucking face, dumb fucking cunt!’

He was there, in the middle of the sand-wench, her infantile noisy sounds blocking everything from being heard by anyone in its proximity.

He pulled out a giant claymore with skull in it whom had gut-coils wriggling around, turning it upon himself only to momentarily impale his chest, creating a ceramics look of blood volcanoes sprouting out of him. As he pulled the claymore out, the skulls began being more animated, their eyes reddened with a strange puffy glow, as if they bore red-black dandelions inside blood-clot bubbles with flares stuck in the middle. His eyes became just as red as them.

By the time he drew forth, his chest was bleeding but was kept from falling apart by the suturing gut-coils, the skulls were violently heaving, almost completely stuck in place.

One of the sockets opened, it revealed a small invisible quasi-outlined, only by the fraction of a second kind of coil that carried eye-beads along with it.

A blooming pair of dales were seen, dandling around until a single pair of them was found in the distance always rowing for one of the wild directions. A few of the wild boar, plague-clothed poachers were after it.

‘There’s been signs coming from the west Hemisphere, I think there’s still something coming down our way.’

‘Where have you last seen a light, or a flame sprouting from the ground?’

‘Two days ago, in the same spot the signs had started yet appearing.’

‘Then we’ll keep marching West.’

Two hours seemed, past eight, to have left a sluggish effect on either man. It was the first one the slits sprouting from the air that gave it away. Before it, there had been no reason to wait, or to make a fuss about it.

‘It’s East, it seems likely to make another unnecessary turn.’

Some of the poachers were already caught, or had been caught on the wrong sides of the desert.

Their wild riding lodgers were incapable of threading along from that point on. They were chained into place, and kept from going, prevented by nothing else but a pair of unnaturally decayed arms that held and prevented them from breathing. Wild-living machines they were, they had reached the sight of sand like a bunch of nomads who no longer had anything to them, nor would they have any kind of life to breathe into the ground they drew life out of; having stumbled onto nothing else but the sight of two strange being, the Horn, with her wrapped thing and the little headed-bladed man whom had already taken a prideful stance between her and them.

Having already spread apart, as they prepared themselves for an onslaught, there was no need to do something that would remind oneself. They were opening fire on him, but none of that appeared to phase him in the least.

Like a wild black widow Horn had already began moving along from one point to the other, no longer in control over her bodily movements or the strange action her body was performing.

They were butchered soon after, in a most vicious manner. As the skulls started flying, attaching to their heads, creating spine-shaped lobes that drew their bodies into strange-four kites, as they threw their remaining organs out, nigger-sloppy pushed down and kicked in, as to stomp it.

It was a bastardly deranged sight neither man could draw his eye away from as they were being hunted down at this point, having already dropped their weapons in a desperate attempt to make it before anything too fallacious.

During one man’s run he fell in one of the red-sandy depressions in the ground. It had been by a mere flick of pebbles that his luck was found again.

A few passages were lain beneath him, taken from a cozy basked he had wreathed out of harder stone-like sand-grains his hands had managed to wrap his hands around. It was highly inconsiderate yet he had done what he could to make it as, palpable as his swollen heart had been, admirably decent as possible. Pulling out the entire skeleton arm out of its socket; a waxy like material seemed to have crumbled as he drew on the parchments away from the creature. Seeing how it was missing the necessary skeletal appendages to fully grasp around the frame of the kipped in paper, it simply let go. A slightly uncomfortable sensation followed him as well. Swelling of the fingers, his heart but beating as the wild noises of a runner up cranium appeared to be desperately searching for a pray it may pride itself with.

There was just as much as could be said about it.

Weird symbols Klahf Laffagr failed to recognize immediately. A strange thing he failed to avert his eyes from dragged a piece of the skeleton in the ground, having grown itself in the sight, like a chalkboard with a piece of him swaying in.

It was a ploy conceived by the great crab-elongated legged simians that were bastardly trying to draw his soul through the parchment sheet, as to create a ticket that would then be used to be chased in, as to sell it for nothing, forcing the man to abandon his eternal pursuit for paradise.

For the paradise was pure and uncannily defended, wreathed in place and concavely ended as to be lain like a figure that's even becoming such like sand, tearing each of the men apart as they would be put inside the grains, being worn out by the complete band of lacerations that followed just as soon as they were freed. It was a somewhat inconceivable way.

Day of surgery, the day after:

The surgery hadn't ended, as a matter of fact, it had just begun.

Standing in front of Horn-Lurid whom were aligned as such:

A two dimensional anatomical illustration of a humanoid man whose arms outstretch only reach for what seems to be an unnatural amount of barb-wires that had been fused-molded with the rest of his body hold the head above, like a surgeon's guiding light. In front of them stood the simians, with their put-through heads leering in like canons, their face-side of the skulls, that it to say a bottle cap if it had been filled with some gelatin and hardened started pushing deeper in, only a few centimeters of millimeters at best. Their long legs were connected like musical triangles, pushed in the back a few centimeters, raised, then made like wings, they flew like butterflies across the room.

It was endlessly part of the road, the table and the machines that were put to their employ were nothing else but the nomads.

This very room they were in was one of the lost ones in the hospital, though there was little that could be seen, or observed, by all means, there was a glass dome behind which the Yellow Rider was standing, closely observing what was happening.

Dead-melted men by his side leered in and out as they observed.

No longer eerily dousing on and off, one spoke:

'You must've come to the realization that there's no possible way we could perform a surgery on her, correct?'

It grew a few romboscout shapes that appeared to protrude tri-dimensionally triangular- spherical at the time with boil-like old science fiction shaped spatial rays- the circles which floated like Saturn belts around the point protrusion that appeared to have drawn, although it looked like bands of skin coming from its chin, its forehead and its sides, these thin cartilages were nothing more but some oily sebaceous slightly made deformation of many put together unnatural dark-shapes conjured from the bowels of the great crop-corpse, they were harvested by niggers-like-cotton from the cadaver fields, before being taken here, having already gotten through the process of embodying themselves in this reality, their mood was rather set on hate and pissed. A deadly combination of the two which seeped into their entire beings almost incessantly disturbingly moot-kind of manner – annoyance displayed, aimed towards rule breakers.

A man was called to attend, he wore a strange artifact, a skull of meat, to no end. Payott but grinned in a most malicious manner. His teeth piano keys, one green and one yellow. His suit looked morbidly rusty, with little spread of red and tainted organ-hue, of ancient underturned Churches.

‘I’ve come to attend her breaking.’

There was as much as it could be allowed.

Through the arch he had just entered through there was only one thing and one alone he almost missed. The two jack-in-the-box kind of statues that had set the mood, they spoke to him before he’d groove.

‘Is there a path of return you see fit, underway?’

‘I do not know, why are you asking that?’

‘Look behind you?’

Part of the ground, and little more than could be convey, the cackling core had made as such.

This was the day of the surgery, still inside the house they had just entered. Horn was but split a few moments ago, that was as much as she remembered.

But lo and behold, a few moments, therefore and a few steps beyond. Stood a simple thing, a deserted base of men, whose but chemicals had not only entered the bar, but were merged with it, who could trust them?

The Snake and Pox were but the heads, two of them facing at each end, a leg was but the Satyr – compressed, his hairy face and legs attached and wrapped at the back like boots, a keg of meat for belly, the woman. Carpent and her had been eaten and mixed, in what appeared to be no viscid kind of acid but a pool of Dina and some egg-like beads. Behind it, the two assassins had become, but two bloated blimp-like things coming out of two cartilage tubes, green and orange mixed with some fleshy silk, there stood the body, no arms. But a few flaccid things that reached the ground, like the stuffing of toys, ripped and put behind and lo’.

Inside its belly there stood a frame, like a walking apparatus held by an old man. Frank Dushore was there. But without the lower side of his body, holding his chest cabinet open, ready to jerk the nuclear missile off, triggering it into an instant nuclear meltdown before any of them could even fathom what was going on.

Those two fat lumps in this entity’s back were but thrusters.

And it seemed like the two, Poxsnake had but joined Payott immediately, in order to attend this strange, conversation between the two adjourning forces that were present in the room.

‘I will not give into you, no, I will, you lied to me. You most definitely lied.’

‘Have I now?’ Yellow-head’s voice bounced through one of the intercoms, tying itself to the various echoes whom could be seen floating across the room like slouched yellow pops of dust.

‘If I recall correctly, I’ve called upon your subservience with this and this alone, I’ve but gave you a chance to answer me, that I may finally bestow upon your husband life as it was but yet called.’

‘But not like this.’

‘Of course it would have to be done in such a manner, how else would a race like yours be stored and made? How else could one but, of girth and reign, make sure the world shall be yet populated by a mightier thing?’

And there he comes, yet arrived. My incessant demons, whom shall make sure you’re brought to the proper terms of our agreement. You see now, they are my enforcers.’

The two of them confused inside the room; it was most peculiar how they had not been announced or hadn’t gotten this enfolded, encrusted memo of what was to be.

Or this little room that existed, only in part, though no memory had it been, were it something more benign, more treacherous to be called.

It was less of a surgery room and more of a tournament hall, elongated as such, while the piles up corpses were there to attend. They all had pus-pox and looked as if they had been completely rotten and eaten by diseased. No attendees uninvited. Their heads were long-jars, they were sin.

‘I’ve seen this scene before, somewhere, somehow, but I never thought there was ever a chance to draw as close to her as I am now.’

Another one appeared to be too close, they were appearing in lines whereas, while being on their seats, another one froze, appeared, yet continued, as if seeing all the cells, all the animation cells as once, but molded. Large arms working one another, like Spartan-spears, feeling, peeping through the nasty hole, seeing her for the finest hour, and what to gone man had thought.

‘I always keep my promise, or at the very least I might as well try.’

Payott was joined by the Snake-Pox in the room, as they were both preparing their dead horses, whom they dragged along by chains, now alongside them, as many, but couldn’t fathom looking for any.

‘There are people here who have never seen a dead horse in their entire lives. Why do you think that is?’

‘Perhaps they’ve never had the chance to do it, Payott. You need to understand that it doesn’t happen too often now. You’ve been through the war, haven’t you?’

‘There are definitely.’

He forgot it, he almost did, but somehow, in some hidden document, someone claimed his name was faked. Someone made a huge mistake. Damn it, he knows of the file. He knows the war of Vietcong. He must’ve figured out what I’ve done there. It’s safely deposited, somewhere, archived, in some unaccountable manner, damn it!

It couldn’t get worse than that. At time he considered it but a dream. The document that had been saved, whatever he dreamed off, throughout age and time, it was saved, stored, there, forever in a bubble of smoke, in a puddle of ringed dust-mice that would devour all skin if he even dared raise a finger as to remove or replace it. Then again, he had to try, and least of all attempt to remind him.

‘But you do not understand, my good friend, I’m not in the mood for anything now, I’ve been trying for so long to.’

‘You need not say a word, I know.’

I was merely asking for a thought. I am aware of your wrong-doings, and there’s no need to beat a dead horse over it, I was just wondering how many of them you’ve seen before. And what experience do you think they’re lacking? In what thought, or glance, and racked together, plain of steel.’

‘I’ve cut a horse once, if that’s what you’re implying Snakepox but I don’t know how you got access to all this information, it simply doesn’t make any sense to me at all. It could’ve come from anywhere, anywhere at all.’

‘And you’ll never find out I wager, neither of us will. Look around this place, the colors.’

There were many greens, and reds and whites, all mixed together in the shape of dark roads being lighted by a truck’s headlights, all but molded together, at to fit piece for piece but at the same time trails could be seen as if drawn on top of a leather map, or performed by someone’s bayonet, their carving knives.

It didn’t look well either way, as chaotic as it seemed, there were bubbles-dark-holes every here and there, these worming suns. Some of them but shaped like sons. Little humanoid figures that were wrapped around in the most incessant manner but couldn’t move, yet dragged away. Every piece of color and of shade but moving across, little more could they convey.

‘It doesn’t look well at all, I’d say. I’m rather set on the fact as well. Neither of us might make it.’

Not while the simians were working to stretch and prepare the tournament field, as well, as the top of the room being slowly dragged from them. Taken as if by some dark spell, conjured or wilt out of existence. At the pretence of him, but no king have they called him.

‘Yellow-Head, what do you intend on doing to us?’

‘I must not heed no suffer and wait for no more. I will have you both taken from here and placed back in your homes as you were.’

Double meaning, yet at last, it was as much as they would have to settle with. Yet, a dark glance he cast, or they thought so. At time it was mightily hard to discern. Nothing this creature did made any sense, none whatsoever, none that could possibly make them retort.

Or have a chance to make it thoroughly, closer and closer, to dark a home.

‘Thence we shall begin by a slight incision, and afterwards we shall apply the power-drinking horn funnels inside. Through it, we shall conjure the dark-scepters that shall come to life.

From the malady tombs, death shall cast a dark spell at last. With the blessing of the Rider, then we shall begin.

And once it's done, we shall cast us all but ill. That is how it might but well, go ahead and we shall siphon away whatever piece of essence's left in you.'

'Will it work?' Horn was mightily paranoid, waiting there on top but wrapped and seemingly. Magic was brim with light-fire that floated in the direction of the strange almost ambience that was produced by the strange-music floating cephalod branches.

'I do not know, the Rider is your only hope, put thine faith into him if you will and wager.'

They seemed to be parched for some reason, but stood still. Despite the outlandish outsets, there was but one structure that still held, the glass uprooted held on a standstill of legs the Rider was in, with his guests. Rather entertained and enduring, well.

How could one make the difference between being indisposed and being open on a table? Although he wasn't openly cut, her husband appeared to be open fifteen meters from the original point where he had been projected in, making it seem like there was a parchment unwrapped man above his body, then another projection on a slight reverse, downward facing incline where the surgeons had already gathered in order to commence.

As much had been gathered, the zone below them had been shattered by the mere unaccountable to deal with weight that suppressed just about every livid material that might've been purposefully used for him and his drawing from the ground region. Horn and Lurid's race was but in the process of being made and there was no possible way of prevention any longer.

Hence was the ground and what it looked like, what lurked inside of it was but the snapper-beings that started fixing, and wretched was the hour and location they chose to create their dark Artagun in, since it started seeping relative dark-matter into the moving-shaking constructs of the lower-reaches. They seeped in, dousing off. At times no longer draining the Aquarium that was being made in front of them, every time they swept through world and world uncannily hit back. Making them appear here and there as they would but emerge when time drew on and asked for them to be remade. Wince and crannies, one had yelled:

'There can't be any turn here, not when the dead-floaters, the armadillos of the sea are merging, with the lesser Mesozoic lancers, I see as many of them in there as I've seen man die in battle, in a one sided one, like cattle being butchered they seem to come into existence at the most inopportune times. What would see the reason behind it?'

'A dent in the compression, we're being forced to drop and fall, something heavier above us, at the very least, or so it seems, it's making us appear, and come in time.'

His eyes weren't working properly. As this was not a basin-proper, not a fish-bowl-rectangle. It was hardened, empty-on the inside but filled. Those sea armadillos he saw before, all of them were lumps inside the snapper-beings, many of them having already taken part in union, in case of the fall, they would all have to lay claim upon one another, least they would face what follows after. Lest would they die. Twenty minutes at an hour, when it drew nearer to them, a dark-rained shower.

‘I see there’s still some time to act. We may be limited from the likes of it, but there’s someone here, there, alive.’

‘Who is?’

‘Three of them, in actuality, now they draw forth, you must prepare yourself, and harden your body, as it’s unclear whether or not you would survive their wrath and wrath alone would destroy and crush, trampling everything underneath the soles of their feet as they make their way to the spanner-lob, alas.’

At the very least they brought candles and torches. Much taller than expected, like static- fallen over murky men, whom walked on trails, formed out of their torso faces which spat as well. It’s how they crawled with their nasty feet, which they themselves looked like two lower beings upon which they cradled themselves into. Children-infants-infantile, they sounded madly wrought and blind. Large tubular devices for their cockles, a degenerate machine, it was what pumped in their guts as well, the oily thing inside their packs. They carried them, and many cracks. Could simply be seen as they were bestowed upon this gift of steel and rockery, cradling each part, making the necessary sounds as to guide the echoes about the place they were in and out.

Yet, with all that, their faces looked flat, hardened, refused to fall and not only that but they seemed to be hot-ironed in by dark metallic masks, prodded. As expected, they spoke in weird languages, hopefully translated.

‘There’s enough noise coming from here, you’ve passed your quota.’

‘But I’ve but barely said a thing.’

‘It’s unfortunate for you if that’s the case, isn’t it?’

‘What is the punishment if I go overboard?’

‘We’ll cut your feet and then, we’ll make a trench out of them, we’ll swim in them and become, as they say. Most innocuous in the way of cutting and sharpening, bruising the sides, but not your toes.’

Why, they realized something. Both began sharpening their eyes, cleaning them as thoroughly as possible despite the presence of their hands.

‘Many pardons, but we thought you were a woman. In whichever case, I think there’s need for a new kind of distinguishable punishment, one that would deal with the alternative, wouldn’t you say so, brother?’

‘I think there’s but one way to find out.

Do not cross the line, keep below the limit of the quota.’

‘Wait a minute now, doesn’t this, aren’t I? Haven’t I already passed the quota by talking to you?’

Why is it outlawed?’

‘Too many questions, you’re going to receive a warning.’

‘I think I like that, brother, a warning, he says, that is but perfect.’

And they left, immediately crawling, drawling, by the force of a façade of gelatin. It was how they moved and how they managed to reach first of all the hidden placed that raised like the bowl-basin.

Miaghds Point, not going to let them go, are you? One of the spanners asked itself. It was already coiling around one of the inner-push-troughs that appeared in the air. Yet it was strange, how it came into being. Like a floating asterisk but made out of ants colonies marching together only to make it happen. To make it appear, then, by the time it was whole, there was no reason to stall any longer. Either man would know no better.

‘There’s another here. Halloo!’

It did not answer. It jerked, appeared in the back and was a split with many lines between first and second, organs in between, like a moving, static pair of casts. One moved a few meters, the rubbery thin hoses connecting them jerked eerily, then the second half joined it.

‘Shh, don’t talk. Speech quota.’

It was tempting, too tempting.

‘I remember being punched once, right side of my cheek. It was a taller guy, much taller, at least two feet high. He told me I stepped on his two. Two of his lackeys were there as well. I thought they would start pounding on me together, like a bunch of animals, if I tried something.

But he told me one of the strangest things a man that just punched you could ever tell you.

I have not gained your trust. I don’t understand why he said that but that was the last time I saw him.’

Its static face still bore a small pinch-region around his rosy cheek. His lips had been the only part that even moved to begin with. It was, peculiar, to say the least how not even now had the spanners interfered between the two of them. Moreover this lower region practically shook with pressure coming from on top them, where they were almost ready to begin.

There was a dark echo wallowing across the room.

‘Careful, run away!’

He’s going to rapebehead us!’

Something was still sipping out of the core.

If humanity is to survive, the likes of the nigger race has to be completely wiped out just so future generations might be spared of much darker fate. A world without a future awaiting in the bosom of a dead fucking nigger’s body, where its nigger-head slouching over children seem to rest. Like children during a time of feasting, nonetheless.

Fifteen hundred miles from there, in a small shot-through slug tunnel, a few stairway depressions rested.

They couldn't see a good chunk of her since it was missing all around.

A pine-like opening started peeling off, niggerish on the resin, a dark unnaturally held in place skin started lowering itself onto the ground. It started jerking itself into place.

It crawled into view like a smocking planet pair. Whom made in halves but unaware that they were molded in a pint but drew after on a rail of metal-hardened gel. From the few miles they rested in they drew on as on a wagon. Meeting and greeting the spanners on the other side before they could yield after.

'There's pounding and thrusting happening there. It grows, in and out. It needs to be listened.'

'Who needs?'

'Wretch inside the locked box, it is there, with us.' The snapper spoke.

Yet, the Rider was rather morosely, frozen, struck in place, standing his ground.

'We need to gnaw at it while he's busy.'

Scatter around, it tried telling it, scatter around, but neither one would listen.

'Lest there be a thing happening.'

Would there?

It was hard to pin it down where it happened, or why were the surgeons hosed, why they were all encompassed by it, an paranoid as were they held, and told.

Suffocation appeared to be a common thing there, inside the spanners. It was ingrained into them, down to their bubbly almost spongy wreathing wings. Although neither one, who was present there could deal with the air-nightmares that swung, even from as far as he could be seen, that sick man, with little more than a broad sword held against his arms, he swung it, back and forth, like a worthless organism of iron, headed as such.

As it swung back, the skulls returned, regurgitating in the air whatever was left of the previously hunted around nomads that had been spoiled and rotten along the way. Farther, and farther, the farther he went.

As the blade rattled and rattled again, with every clenched tooth but being pointy like a shard, this blade being split in halves, with eye shape regions and a smile, it started speaking to him.

Alachiel-Xrix:

'There, in the distance, I can sense her.'

Tip of blade, vaguely pointed in its general direction.

'It's a dark structure, is it not? Perhaps, rather unsafe to thread upon or near it, I sense, I can feel them below the earth, swarming as the ground comes apart.'

Two women had been beheaded there, and put on strange pillars, made to be alive now by strange machinery. What a dark, and darker fate. Was the sand beneath them, always crying of what hidden worth.

The system below the sandy hearse was shaken, by the looks of which, there was something deeply ingrained in the lower skeleton frame where they dwelled. Beady-chitinous margins always contorting into one another, dancing and wreathing along. Caught in an endless trance, the warrior Shalt, but was met around the edges of the never-seen hot hands.

First the rods on the ground, then he saw them. At first they spoke as thus, as these head-on pillars, women songs:

‘We were placed there like sheets, spread apart but now lay waiting.’

‘They stripped us of everything, sickly beings that they are, I couldn’t believe what happened and before long I was made to be nakedly exposed in front of them, performing such a dance, as would enable the land to grow.’

‘Why are you telling me all this now? I’ve shown you no interest whatsoever and I feel as if there’s nothing there to pass.’

Shalt had only stepped much closer, going through high-pains to get himself closer to either one.

‘You’ve both got pretty looking faces, for shame, for shame. I would’ve liked to have my way with either one of you, pretty young looking girls, forever, in youth you remain.’

‘But what is the point of youth like this?’

We’re kept alive to be ogled at, don’t look at us as if we’re shook, no, you wouldn’t like seeing what happens after.’

‘Do you think either one of you has the power to harm me as such, and even after?’

‘Neither of us has tried it out of fear, but most people seem to, very much avoid us for some reason. Worry not about it, that I see.’

There was no possible way of escape, none that would do in any way, not to wait too long they started going into circles. Spurring along as they left the blade, in circling motions would they ask:

‘What happened here, what happened there, what happened in a world that’s cast?’

‘Whom are you talking to and what is the reason behind it?’

‘To you, master who is yonder caught, in his own antics, through something that one failed at last. You are lost, and we still hunger.’

To which, again, the two women whom had been debodied spoke:

‘We should not be driven back either, not that it would last this way, but lest of all would you find it so uncannily deformed, we should see to it that we’re not held off, not into place as there’s still someone who’s still listening.’

‘Who is that?’

‘You, you great warrior, of whom blade is but eight times his body, not thin, not slim, no bathe of iron would have it. As a matter of fact, you’re sitting in a place where others brought to theirs and theirs alone.

There’s a sea of dead hanging ancestors of ours whom shared the same fate alone.’

‘Am I to be an instrument for thine finding then? Can I not be left alone for now?’

‘It’s far too late for that, I wage, not that there was ever such a chance.’

Not to be too arrogant or self-assured, they missed the point vaguely and found themselves better off, and cured, of everything that pinned them just.

No knight errantry left him as such. As to distract, from his one true calling.

‘I was placed here on this planet for one thing and one alone, I need to butcher as many people, beings and those who I see fit to do it, when left alone.

I hear no thought of wonder any longer and I may find no rejoinder to what I’ve done. No solace for the ones I’ve slain, no agony, for by the time I’m found, I will have prevailed.’

‘And what happens when they catch up?’

When all those murders you’ve committed draw from one point to another, and you’re found?’

‘It shan’t happen, I shall make sure of it. I am to be guided by the skulls for they are not the skulls of men, instead. Certainly they must belong to such gods of demigods, or such beings as would know better than to look in whichever, either, other way.

I find no pity for your today. No, I do not think so. I seek but such a thing as would damn me, if that were the case. I seek retribution for all that I’ve taken the lives for when it wasn’t asked, not by I, who would’ve done so. But the ones I’ve stumbled onto.

How could you proceed, if that were the case? If either one of you, wenches were in my place?’

To which, no longer chitin beating; somewhere below the girth of the ground, much abstracted figures hiding, most of them alone, after that. It was mightily hard, trying to find them, where they hid. And whence one might find himself but thoroughly wasted, he would see his feet. Deep beneath the broil of sand, deep within a point where many of them were but dragged below and much behind, no one could account for them, no one to feel such a thing as would’ve saved them. Much unearthed, they had their spoils. But these were no earthly goods, but, lo’ the iron would such crumble. No jewel or silver, or gold after. Magnificent in form nonetheless, like piously handled, to, much as one would refrain. Like porcelain or mighty Greek, such as their likes would sculpt, to the bodies of their mightiest gods, of marble feet. Would they craft the men, but not as humanity would’ve said, to be certain. Yet made to hold, their structures as they're made to hold, with their white-perfect hands, and wrapped around, of such madness as would've been had, to such agony and pains they had to go through to create. To such pity, to no end, for lives were wasted for such a thing. All but swallowed by the sands, never to be seen, by none other but the chitinous carapaces that guided it, deeper into the realms of earth, where their nests but held at the point where they fell into the hollowness of dirt. To a point where they might never be seen, of such ledges, at the tips where they were held within, they rested, less as such. Would they see each other after that? The men of heavenly embrace, they were put inside such, graceful thing as to be away from womanly embrace, to have been turned from pain and wonder, but to might and slight perfection as to be encased. To become such as one would never dare look at and wonder, whether or not he had been a man, a human, such fiend. As one to come back after, nay there would be none as such. No one would know of them, not a single thing would have him wretch in place or stance. It was only the waiting, as it seemed. All too healthful, to their sin, which may just go unheard, as that was only between them and their lord. For earthly realm was theirs as well. For however long they lived to tell, or be unheard, as just it happened. They were encased, after all, in eternal marble.

Whom might dare as such to see? When one, avoiding such agonies? As to have his head wrapped around and least of all forget, daringly that it was seen as such, from where they stood, the world was of such marble. As every grain of sand but finely crafted as it were for them, much more than anyone else. Long before would they have known, of such a thing and would to be left alone. No one would speak of it, no one to bear such shades as there were thawed away.

But lo', no one could see the magnificence that lay before their eyes but them and theirs alone were eyes that were taken and brought to such a thing that would've been taken as but agony foretold.

'I think there's still a chance, my lord, for you to take us to a point where we might feast.'

'Why should I care about either one of you from this point on? You all seem to be gluttons when it's all too convenient for either one to act that way. Do not make me convey no such thing as servitude for I shall now and I shall not bring myself to do it, do you understand that?'

'Of course we do, and for that reason, we don't seek to bring you after, we won't seek to mold you yonder in the way we are. Since we are out of touch, with this earth we've known but naught. If such was brought before our eyes, we would've known it to be, but listen, there's no wonder, there's no peace then, not as long as we push the trough.'

They made him listen after all, though Alachiel could not be even more distraught, than what happened after that. He had listened to little more than what was needed, gone unheeded, went for yore.

Past the desert he had passed and there was not a single thing keeping or drawing him back. Instead, it was all too clear who waited for him there.

At the point of a crossroads, there was but a land-rover, a gloomy tale-machine but darker, four wheels, but much so yonder, as one might've guessed. Made out of dead-niggers, sutured, instead, it didn't work. Hence he avoided it and simply passed around. He didn't even want to look at that disgusting thing since it was so wretched as to be lifeless.

'Again of shroud, I see but you still follow me.'

He said to either woman there. One of them was but too thin, her face was already part gelatin. Although the mechanisms attached to the pole, although they kept her going as one would know, there was no such, would they have known what they hid inside. A long emergence that wasn't seen, but couldn't be, connected by invisible wires of electrons, electric power surged between each wire that was unattached. IT's how they powered them over the long spans of distance and how they kept them alive. Despite there being no earthly energy beneath the earth, there was no such thing as one might find it, worthless sun. It spoke to them but its words were lost.

'It's settled then, I shall be guided by the bloodiest of skulls. You are to enable me to do and listen as I am to obey.'

'That is but a magnificent choice, as so one would dare to call on.'

Rejoined another skull-head:

'From here on out then, you shall be called Iliac-Alachiel.'

Twenty meters ahead from the looks of it, at the very least, a skull was not the size of a fist for starters, not as thin as going on ice, it said.

'It's a bad time to remind you, bearer the blade, as for myself, I've been a man once. A strange thing that can't be easily explained either, a soldier, in a flying metal fortress, watching over the land.'

Beneath the rubber, as he could serve himself, as to be reminded, whereas the Blimp was still limping across the side the clouds.

It simply happened for it to lose some air, vaporously spreading here and there.

There was an extraction beneath the earth, the girth of a giant body wreathed in and out, dangling as it was slowly being removed out of its suckered hardened pucker-moist fluid that wrapped around it, there it grew. By the time it had been checked again, the specials soldier, whose head was rooted, spread as it'd be, there was nothing even anatomically recognizable in the grovel it had been left in.

Although in life he was, a bothersome figure, he was left with little more to know about what was going on down there. It was rather clear that the axial belt was somewhat, still, under some hard to account to, or hard of the matter stress it still received from its surroundings.

Carl could only listen to it; Skull man Carl, his memories.

Whatever was left in that compressed inside the blade mechanical unit they implanted in, whatever processor or hard of reading kind of device there was, it got this much harder to distinguish what was real and what wasn't.

It was hard distinguishing friends from foes any longer.

Since the niggerlynching district was full of visitors, it got so much harder, so much heavier for either.

‘I think there’s a chance in their thoracic organs, we need to pull them out for inspection.’ –man on the street; with a knife, granted a nigger by the side of the street so he could open him like a dumb animal, or like the simian-bubbulous.

‘There’s another thread drawing forth from the other side of the street, a few, they’re unidentifiable.’

An image was barely forming on one of the streets, some of them had to die during the initial fire. It was a controlled test, neither of them were identified, neither before nor after. There was no signal, for when it started. Neither was there a reason or an explanation given to the masses, whom paid heed to the even while it was happening. It’s rather hard, remembering all in detail, that’s what documents are for. But even then, things are omitted and left out.

‘I saw them there, inside the heaps. I think I, left some things out myself. Some cuts had to be made.’

It was all justified. Either them or us, always, it’s always been that way.

Even from the looks of it, what had remained of France was mainly, during this occupation of the sorts, irredeemable, unsalvageable.

‘Human experiments only count as human experiments as long as the target is human. Everything else is considered fair game.’ One of the high officers, backed up by the captain did nothing less than confirm their already, on board, suspicions. Of course they all expected bloodshed within the hour, and it came and swooped over every single man around the fields as if they had been thoroughly prepared, prior to this, for the butchery, and when it came. There was no surprise there.

Whatever recess of humanity was even vaguely recognizable there, no longer was there any doubt, entirely, that these things were no longer human.

‘There’s residual energy taken from nowhere else other than these, super-soldiers, the ones that were used and brought forth for the program. I’m afraid of what might come after, are you not?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘The project isn’t entirely abandoned, no, the project was put under dormancy, as to be delayed over the span of a few years until proper funding was achieved. They were put under stasis, under hibernation for a reason, no?’

‘I thought.’

‘Well you were wrong about it. You may have recognized the problem but.’

Hmm, the skull had a hard time keeping everything in check. Although there was an auxiliary brain unit, this spongy thing that was somewhat, more or less preserved, and a second metal talkie-kind device that made it so there was another type of storage taking place. It seemed like the memories had not only been altered but that, these people knew things they shouldn’t have.

Every single man he remembered was hybridized with his mind.

Moreover, he could clearly see as if from on top the axial belt, then below it, from the standpoint of a man, who was proceeding with the butcherment as to pin them down and reign on the on-drawing enemies as well as the invaders. Not from a camera, but from their own side. From their own visors, from inside their sockets, as if, during that moment he had obtained the omniscience of a God. Were they not gods in any case? Every single skull attached to the blade seemed capable of things that would make even the strongest men show little to no more jealousy then needed to draw attention upon them. It was dangerous, staying there for long.

Too much blood was attained, and this blood was all over France.

‘It’s rather clear that a lot of the battles which had been won down here came at the great price of sacrificing the people, its people, for what else other than the drawing forth of foreign DNA? Their genetic material is eerily familiar to that of an unhuman rubble, by the looks of it, this thing, of all, promises in a way, to spread.’

‘What will you do then?’

‘I did not expect a response, strange. I thought I would be alone in here.’

But lo, he was not. And most importantly, he was still in his new-original, or most likely to be called initial kind of form, by the looks of it, there was no more, as it were, a question, whether or not he had been touched. In some dire, peculiar way, he was still a skull on top of the marine. As if it had replaced his being. Down there on earth with everyone else; as well.

‘I wish I was still a man, sometimes in the past, but I cannot seem to understand what happened afterwards, or why I’m acting this way now.

I didn’t think, I didn’t consider I would get lost into reminiscing about the past, you know?’

‘Is it so bad?’

‘No, dear man, but we are but soldiers, we are not meant to think or reflect upon what we’ve done. We’re meant to forget everything unless we plan on being consumed by the horrible events that have crossed and come over us, taking claim over our lives, even before the chance to rebuild it drew along.

I thought I could simply bury it away, but whatever I do, it never seems likely that I will ever do it, that I will ever be capable of doing it. There’s something about it, inherently broken, that I don’t like thinking about.’

‘What is it?’

‘This, never-ending, almost programmed behavior, this residue that seeped and keeps seeping in, making me act in this kind of fashion, this is it, and I could never nor would I ever hope, or even think about removing it. What’s done is already done, and I cannot move on at all. It’s already left its mark over me, it dictates my every move, my choice, to obey the blade and the will of its wielder. I’ve become a blood tool of wall, of slaughter and of murder, mindless and if not, I can only look back at the past and remind myself that I’ve been doing this all along.

With the only thing that changed being the new master that I now serve, that you must understand. You died, as a soldier, in the past. I live on, doing what I've always been doing, what I've been taught to do, murder.'

It wasn't just that. But observing it, over a long enough period of time, violence was justified past a point, but this? A never ending thing that was one-sided? It was, becoming a tool, more than else that disturbed him. Being controlled and manipulated out in the open, which was degrading and consuming; time after time again, whether he wanted to accept it or not, this was only going to go on from this point to the end.

What was much more evident was the divide in the mind and how he tried hiding it. But there was no one there to hide it from.

'I was no tool.' He suddenly thought, oh but it had occurred to him many a times. 'I could've stepped out of it at any time, but I have already grown accustomed to it, I enjoyed butchering and killing as many men as I could.

This seepage doesn't seem likely to have come from me. It's unlikely but It must've come from them, either, one as well.'

All skull whom had been collected and collected and allowed as to think. Even for a tiny wink, during which they all imagined one. And one consciousness had lasted, even for a little while. Now it all made sense, at least for him, although it was unevenly paced, as for the race, that had been, travelling along other chemicals as to send, alongside brain signals before they were cubed into a stop, and his mind altered beyond it, some reached, and as they did, he was told at last.

'I've been dishonorable discharged, it seems. No having become a tool, but whom?'

So many of the skulls had been etched in the blade, that it was hard, telling whether or not. Well, his bodily rancor, had it been another time, for. He was but open-minded as to why. A simple reason would suffice. They were all tools, and plastic fools, put on a metal strap, armed with leeches, sucking blood. Killing men, killing women, and the others as well, no one safe, but did he mind it?

That was important, much more important than else. Who would've thought it so?

In a café he rested near a dame.

'Would you light a smoke, my dear crudely roughed around the edges strawberry puff?'

'I would not have asked for anything else. I am but in love with you.'

'Have we not just met?'

'I'm already dependent on you and your money, I am.'

'Sound about, as I would've expected, but my dear woman, will you please accompany me to such a thing as it'd be ended?'

'What would that be?'

‘Might you sneeringly stop this jolt, spit on me and split the bill? Will you join me in my room, and see?’

‘Your bed, is it filled with moisture? I need to sit down. I am but a single chest away from being gone.’

‘But what does that mean?’

At her will, this Lemont Narsyllia unzipped her robe and revealed her openly strapped chest, with many torsos embed across her body, eating them, although neither one was implanted on her finely curved, sagging breasts. She was made of a good piece, and she was not dead. It was just how he liked them. And he had taken a liking to her.

For the rest of the day, they walked, as if on park, on bench and whatever else they simply happened to cross their paths. Even a dead child she appeared to hold not even the slightest or the barest slits and open-feet, she wanted to show him, compassion from within, the soles and what they looked like, but he was too rotten, for her there was naught else but the love of a man she required, or the allure, at that, which would serve no child, for she had had them, long before, neither here, neither more. As there was an isotope inside her womb; they stitched it there, so this creature which was a Woom, should not be allowed to breed any longer.

Although, the race of Woom was ancient, and they fed on men, on what they had, and on what they earned, kind of like women, in the same way; seemingly capable of converting any kind of wealth and anything that was being procured by them as soon as it was a given, as soon as their grubby hands wrapped around them, without giving them something in return. Kind of life women; always taking something from a man until he was dead; like women, never giving back, never being able to do it on their own. But what was worse than that was the fact that they also seemed to give birth only to female Woom femaleoids. It was a dreaded sight, a dark vision of the future, if they were allowed to reproduce.

Luckily for him, he put her down as soon as they were finished, twenty slugs inside her head, twice and in-between, nothing fancy. Rubbed it in; anger? Was there anger? Which, involved?

Was there anything, the god was told. One of them at least, were present inside the room. But he, them, they were not the ones he worshipped. Instead, they were large devices, operating things, befitting, as to call.

‘Should’ve warned her, I should’ve warned her when I had the chance, now she’ll be incomplete.’

He considered the following, why the man wielding the sword was there. Why they were all messed with, and contorted beyond humanity. Beyond and bewitched in some manner; it was an awkward scene in an awkward chamber.

Dead-on-bed was the woman, naked, with the torsos having become gelatin. Her breasts were at least spared and he knew that there was someone out there who was in these kind of stuff, not to judge.

But these metallic gods made only of floating mechanical surgery equipped arms only appeared when something too vaguely, incessant happened. As to fully grasps it, when he was to kill, or had to wake up from what he was doing.

‘You’re to return inside the blade.

You're not to slack in here any longer.'

A bloody pair of hands as well; he was soaked in it, like a Judaic shackle, almost as dirty as the whore.

'Wake up Carl, you need to reawaken and return to your designated spot. Sooner or later you may not be capable to start your bloody gut-engines anymore. And there's a body out there forming.'

Beyond the likes of reminiscing as well; he could not see it just yet but, slowly as it happened, he was developing a body-growth. He had dreamed of escaping, but the nightmare would not easily end.

There, for long. And every skull was broken in part, floating in a sky of blue, but it was not a normal blue but one glowing, flowing, made of dust, of particles mixed and reigned at last. And they gathered within the hour, once awakened as to form a circle, like dogs they followed each other's tails, never giving up nor refraining from doing something that would not be liked. They shards in head were, hardly swallowed, they formed a pumping red-circle, of dark-morrows, maws, and other things, had formed a pseudo black-hole-tambourine. From the insides of which came the great body of a giant finger-bearing ahead, as if it was flat-in the front, a flaccid cylindrical caterpillar that was kept instead. Giant almost summoned by women's feet as from a portal, as demented, as the dye of which had melted, it had stopped- alike. A few meters in the front. Whereas a few pillars would sustain it. Half-opened there, two great holding areas as of old hot-iron with bed-like front formations but only in width, drew out two bodies held by these two curved cylinders, as their feet. They bore, all flaccidly cocoons-bore, four great humanoids in shape, wriggling from their leg-sockets. Armless for the main bodies that were drawn as such; for the heads bore things, like winged-horns armed at their chests, creating pseudo-rotten filled-with-hollows and with holes, almost completely disintegrated nautilus-look-a-like thorns, which stabbed inside. Open in the front on both sides, both creatures mirrored. Unlike the sharp things they bore, a pull-up-bar like thing facing forth, and both connected. As it were, these creatures bore their giant eyes beneath their chest aimed horns, bled on. Instead of irises, dark-symbols drawn on top without raising one's hand, in the dark, both of them bearing gelatin-fallen-apart tongues between the two wriggling cocoon-sacks, on each side. Fat-legs- of overweight, a leaping bar between the horns that penetrated them inward. Malignantly inclined and bearing, they leaped out of the portal swaying. Now the finger-girth could clearly be seen, like a backwards hive, with four great pucker-eels, which grabbed each ledge, although they could not be seen, invisible as they were to no end. This was their transportation machine. As one could clearly see that those were helmets, chitinous and clearly drooling with machine-like liquid-fuel piston-teeth; they were followed by a floating eye, not an eye-ball but a two dimensional thing that looked like flat, from beneath, a pseudo-few meters thick plate or line. It winked at it appeared every here and there, always disappearing and appearing instead. Flaccid-fat potato body, such as it was, this creature it followed. Mechanisms and apparatuses inside, wreathing and contorting as the engines kept it floating, the skulls were then set, of a mind, to follow after it. Such was it afterwards.

For the time being they were set, almost on an automatic kind of behavior. Programmed into them. Ready to serve. Jovial. But again they were not capable of exceeding what they were enticed by, of what happened after and what was given in terms of quickly-follow through commands.

Intermission, a short conversation between two sides of the core, dangling from one side to another, and never to be grasped as more than a few echoes could be felt, crossing the line; it was thin as one could come about.

Litany of a young girl:

‘Dear, Mongol. I have come to ask you much. I am in love with you, I am a servant, and you are my god. I am a little girl, I must pray. Despite the fact that I am a mongrel and, Heaven I may never see as well. I wish there was a chance to speak. I wish I could bow down at your feet. I wish there was, as much as pain, I wish there was a chance, for me as to refrain. Please, dear, Mongol, god, help me banish these dark, on-coming thoughts, I fear. When I near, such a mirror, yet I see. You hide, as always, as always, behind me. I am afraid, I cannot go ahead. Knowing you’re there.

I wish I was no longer a mongrel.’

There was no mirror in front of her, damned liar, only a wall of wreathing knives jerking eerily as they would throw themselves at her, bleeding her dry.

Another young girl:

‘Diary, diary, today I saw Mongol.’

Another entry from the diary, taken out of a random page:

‘Mongol, I saw, diary, today, diary!’

The surgical procedure had just begun; it came out of nowhere, even before either of them could look in each and others, any, direction. As many of the closest cadavers and the standing-on-top of one another corpses were readying themselves, to draw, an inch or two to the side, and even, more appropriately so, closer than needed, before each second, as to leave a their booths and closed up pins behind.

Much, far much closer they had come. Had there been a meter or so, left between their stand-on-kegs upon which they climbed on, for a much better view was required in order to fully galvanize one another during their standing, the keg might’ve fallen off, being eerily jerked as if they were standing on a rubbery-ball, or something more flaccidly aligned to where they rested. It was a joy being there, every single body was elated. Though, from whichever place they might’ve been descended out of, it was a matter utmost, lest of all irresolute. Many of them shook at the sight of the crooked creature that bust stood among them.

‘Let us proceed with the cutting!’ The Yellow-head said, and as he’d done it, the crooked horse’s a crook, a few meters in but smelt and felt the alabaster. A disaster was in the brewing, just as soon. Without a clear view in sight, and what had come on them but shook. Were the melted bodies, those whom formed the frame, holding everything together, bolts but coming off their veins. In a moment or two, everything would fall off. It was only a matter of stress, being forced, instead of waiting it out. A single pint of bodies shook, a pair, and forms of wails, all but echoed, in their veins. Which took a hold, whips and flogs, holding them, attached behind, around the keg, the wall and just about anything they could come into contact with. Soon it settled down.

Bottled Snake, of beastly ravine; his belly ached and deep inside, on a whim, it started belching. It had been caused by the incessant bothersome nature of the nuclear radiation.

There are certain things, which swim inside every rendition of their guts.

Light-gusher

It started in the morning, when no one was watching.

On its empty street, near the ST. Anthonius Earbettler's lamppost, rested three dark a shard, one yellow, piece of sun, dark long hand but tawny, out a native heap, and a nest-of lords, all kept in salty seeds made out of a newspaper funnel. In which a few taken out of a morgue tourists rested in. Pasty as for the ointment that was rubbed against them, part of the tall – four point half thirty meters long, in front of the abandoned house, placed near the chapel and the glory Haus, where stood the German Lous.

‘What are you hiding underneath that robe, dark man?’

‘My children, all of them are beneath me, so I keep them as such.’ – It was his neighbor; he was the only other kid in town, playing with his toys.

‘A house of moving plunder in the coming of the after, it's what I call but seek, upon my travel as I see it fit.’

The child was afraid of the man, because, both were children, but. He was strange himself, and felt out of place because of the un-rigid peculiarity of his body composition that turned him into an utmost peculiar creature.

A small incessantly driven into the inner-outer cortex shape of a plume formed around his giant bubble-head. It looked like a pimple-tumor with a pair of rocket launchers made of skin and bones coming out his forehead, his teeth were long-whips with blade-like thing-growths of plaque-decay, swollen-tender, inflated as if, because of air-lung organs that became apparent once his blob-fat body- clown punching toy with hands and legs molded into his main frame, which only his the balloon-tumor could keep in check. Since his head-tumor fat-thing looked like a multiple rocket launcher formation, from which the cylindrical shapes could clearly be distinguished. Since the teeth-like plague-coal blade-things were power-elongated, as they stood flatly beneath the rocket-launcher growth pimple on top the head, they allowed only for a fraction of the shadow projected on the earth to pass through since they didn't leave any shadow on the ground themselves, while also blocking the light coming from the sun. His face was but a patch of skin-barely a few centimeters off the convex surface of the top hourglass-like eely body he moved on top of. He has a small cartilage-skin representation of himself without the blades or the rocket-launcher inside his brain, but it was clearly held, levitating while rotating in every possible direction, by, coil-like tube-veins that passed through the brain, there being a giant hole-crater-sphere hollow in the middle of, as if the brain was keeping it under control, that was producing power. It only stopped when fully charged with malignant-surgical power, as the rocket-launcher rack but performed an invisible surgery on the atoms between dimension as to, perform a cut-like with a scalpel which allowed for a non existing hand to remove or take a hold of an actual rocket from a time where there was a military base, regardless, although not regardless of location. It only worked at certain times of day and specific locations, in time. As to perform a pseudo-time travel act of theft, but only if there were rockets around.

Sometimes he stole people and children, who started weeping, because the depression in the rocket-cylindrical spot was empty, there was nothing in, and it was dark, and frankly, quite frightening.

Part of the street was severely as in, somehow this was found acceptable and brushed over, overly quenched, as for every mouth and maw that was lain across the entire span of the neighborhood was struck by a sudden barely-fathomable urge to have their tastes quenched, that only made it even more difficult for them, since the neighbors had little care for other people beyond their spheres of influence, in their selfishness, theirs being the fault for this hard to truly glance over rancid drought, as well as the architects, whose do-to-nothing 'fix', upon the re-design of the nearest of use, that he could wrap his hands around underground pipeage whose, beneath the smolderingly freshly placed tarred addendage, was a hybridized system of a both cruelly medieval hybridization to which, this being no complementary form, a modernization or contemporanization of an already existing system that was not broken was subtly added, as well as a in-depth systematized set of well placed- overly-toiled upon, moving rack of cistern-pouched with metal claws hanging upside down like monkeys machines that would cut off the water supply from the mouths straight from the source. It was a cruel thing to do, but there was a good reason for it. Since this also managed, over the prolonged duration of many months, to also cut off some of the poorer tenants' access to clean water, therefore any acceptable means of making a decent living, they simply weeded out the niggers. It came at a great cost nonetheless. As the many maws and darkly-shaped mouth, soon enough began decaying underneath the air hot-burning magmatic inducing star-struck bloated thing that stood there, resting outside the planes of stars, planets and celestial bodies across the confines of a dead space, where trillions of frozen bodies lay, abandoned, having become the resting, eternal glorious Creeker's Cradle. Whereas the shapers of the dark-incessant arks and spaceship cargos collected what they could from them, malignantly endowed, overly-glorified bandits incapable of any solid thought, or, by their own account, meddlesome emotion. They were perfect. Out there, struck by the fact that they looked alike, at times; lost in great confusion. As all features lay abandoned; and there was no need to stare, or satiate the wonder, whichever one might make one spare, a glance or a leer-at-yourself don't thread-on-me kind of wink.

Nonetheless, the dying beast's cut only had to speak to them from time to time.

Inside the Cargo-merger, on top one of the greater ships.

Over the main-musk scented, between, as to look at them not as a formation, but at a sullen grouping, or seepage between a bunch of culprit-servant cultist lord-worshipping pair of collaborationists. That gathered up, forming a maliciously-inclined to devour the mere thoughts that went through their minds, as they rested, still. Frozen, yet, as one could see, a red miasma rising, but as it happened for this to be imagined inside one of their heads, an unnamed member of their crew, and since they were so blandly open, to one another as much as they were to themselves, this group think of theirs caused all of them to experience the same thing, at once. In the presence, of the cut.

It was chained by medieval looking rusty, barely put together, iron-whips, that were lowered or raised, as much as the mass they had taken, themselves, as space-surgeons, although not, obviously not licensed, by their own accounts, performed as masterfully as it was graceful, in the eyes of a nonbeliever that was not only present there, but who has been turned, to worshiping conversion, having kissed the anathema as soon as he was met, by proof that there are dark creatures in this world, that would contort and distort whatever soliquity there is left of life. Bastardizing the opposing beliefs in an attempt to furthermore destroy all that is pure, he joined the crew. And he was accepted, as a born-again, after being baptized in acid. Dark-metallic faces, well crafted, pillared and aforementioned, made to be part of the hall, they chewed on the chains since only part of them was mechanic. Their mouths being there, somehow; a rejoinder, a reminder of what their features were like. And why it happened. Weirdly strange drawings got peculiarly written, atop markings, on the ground, being part of the main altar, upon which the cut was lowered, but not for the purpose that was mentioned. Since they didn't eat, being incapable of doing so, they simply watched It being lowered, then lifted, in place.

Despite having formed a circle, not every wall looked the same. Directly opposite to the door they had just entered was an space-window, that granted them a full-view of the endless stretch that was space, listening, or being forced to listen to the sounds, that were actually there. Carried on by singing corpses, and rotten by frost –cadavers that carried magic-with them, glowing with a sparse ocean beyond blue tint, that at times enabled them to fight one another, as they launched projectiles of hardened glowcysts and paramedical giant skeletal-figures with eighteen heads, all of them being made out of real-shuffled meaty-skin or at least life-like imitations of historical figures, that blew up in guttural splatters as soon as their homing rotations was done making contact with the bodies, forlorn yet overly pushed, out of their spheres of reach, beyond the likens of humanity, or reach. As if, not even human-astronauts would be capable of reaching them, if they tried. While these guttural things, fragments of gibbering hardening left-overs were not only beyond the touch of merely god-abandoning mortals, whom, thinking themselves beyond the likes of their more humane counterparts, whose likens was less, there was no faggotry involved, as to completely ignore the warnings that none may touch those, shuffles of historical bastardization. A theft of human souls, mental degradation, as for, the short duration of time, in which those many head-wearing skeletons were alive, thought themselves to be, well, themselves, not their historical counterparts. Incapable of actually knowing whether or not they were real. There was even a Zulu nigger thrown around there or something. And pus, pox and disease; a mist and flying, tiny iron-chained spiked-balls; with rocker-like shaped spine-contenders that were charging them, with fly-disease formations of flying-chained-by-them lightning catchers, drawing breath from the large Gorgonian-figures of Lamia-chested, to which, sutured were great fore-limbs, eight on each side, then from the humanoid eight, eight more from every single one of them sprouting out, although thinner than the main source. It looked like a weird fan, a tiny forest made out of emerging limbs, or pseudo wings, at the end of every single one's sixty three, one apparently missing, arm-forearm-many-arm-forearm-after formation, pseudo unwrapped-deformed pseudo-heads that opened wide, at to release a miasma of –connected in the middle of the chest yet projected, trajectory where they connected, dead-sight there, forming a pseudo pyramid if it were sitting plank- on its back, on the ground, on a floor, these innards coils bloating eerily like meat-carrying hoses. IT had no main head, the lamia body. But it didn't matter since it formed a; and the lower tail-like thing was more of a punching bag shaped amalgamation of shapes – children infants, segments of clearly defined parts spread between one another, dragging upon each other's body bulks, since they were legless, thinking of each other's as their mothers since they were blind. It looked like a meaty water-skipper, but with more legs, and more humanoid than previously thought, and the pyramid cartilage formation being there as well. Perhaps not a real pyramid, since there were two main gaps that faced the empty spot where its head might've been, which was directly opposite, on the other side to the tail, but close enough, if seen from an angle. And if the arms properly aligned but they weren't static; yet, the main-bulk of cartilage-formations it made, there, in the middle, created a large, worming-snake-like, horizontally or ninety degree clockwise rotated c at first that, then, pushed out to the right of it, forming a line, of many pseudo-inside itself, textured racks with many pill-shaped coffin-esque, human faced, tomb-like floating creatures that immediately began attaching themselves to the cadavers, unlike coffins though, since they were incapable of opening themselves, they simply glued or grazed over while keeping a hold onto them, before returning to the rack they came out of. Whereas they bore large tubes, like astronaut-oxygen supply carriers that kept them leashed to their mother unit.

It looked like a pseudo weapon grip, hilt but not a well-formed 'end-him-rightly' cartilage, that was completely covered by stick-bugs, forming a coil from which even more stick-bugs, who were more flaccid, came out of, that bore square-ticks at their ends.

It was a terminal point out there, a miasma of unearthly creations. Like a hill, of a landslide punched in, by a strong fist, filled with hard-to-pin to the exact muscle while performing the jab unfathomable strength. While it was also moist and wet; stuck in between a launching pea-shooter like rattling of pebbles shooting from above it, while the lower side release a bastion of smoke-clouds spread mice of dust; that only being a slight humorous adherence to the Juden rat-snake-like rat-king formation of many interconnected Zylon B rat food-filled kike-cans that seemed to spread itself across the universe, in a desperate attempt to subvert and spread its poison-filled desire for miscegenation as well as destruction for well-beyond-superior to them peoples, spread, across the confines of the universe they coiled themselves in. This peculiar, almost spine-like segmented creature, this venomous thing, whose hooked noses were the only things that stood out, other than their perfectly put together cylindrical bodies feared, despite their incessant rattling, the only glorious, whose greatest story has yet to be told, hero stood who not only as a bastion of justice, as the supreme defender of the most superior race that ever existed, the Germanic race of the German people, but who had vowed never to surrender, slack or lay his hands down, as to turn a blind eye to the suffering of his people. Adolf Hitler jumped on stars.

He bore a mighty invisible yet surrounded by red outlines, feistily embroidered with pure unbridled energy, blade, which bore many carefully aligned swastikas, held within its grasp.

The disgusting sub-humanly given-birth to from the incessantly, most degenerate bowels of the rottenly fallen apart, side of the universe, Judenrats feared him beyond any possible comprehension of the word, as he was nothing more but the last symbol of faith, truth, justice, and most importantly, caring for one's people. The values of raising your family, while bravely defending your nation; a testimony for what it means to be human.

Adolf stopped for a moment, standing on a sole, lonely star, in a barely visible galaxy. He rested in.

While staring down, upon having placed his blade on top his palm, carefully making sure it was fully stretched as to reveal, a long sheet of pure bright burning light, connected to his blade, he noticed the constellation he had created, in it. A constellation of pure, made out of light, swastikas. Vibrating with power, vibrating at such an intense level, that the coiled Judenrat began crackling in anger, jerking eerily around planets and satellites it so desperately attempted to destroy, that for a moment there, the mighty hero, Adolf, almost, although not entirely, decided, to heed, or pay any attention whatsoever. Though that was soon, thoroughly forgotten, as he resumed his work, upon the blade of the German Race; for this mighty artifact bore a lot of power into it; as his carefully placed movements around the rims of every power-imbued swastika that adorned the abyss that was embodied, in the energy left behind by the trailing of the blade, upon the sheet of great light-imbued constellation field it had created, gave birth to a strange mental reaction that immediately made itself be known to him, as every star in the universe and every planet and every object that existed, beyond even his human comprehension, for he was still a man, and within every man's grasp lay the possibility of becoming a hero, and a mighty man just like Adolf; everything became transparent. And in this endless sea of see-through globes he alone saw. Through every embodiment of every object there was, placed within or inside of them, a swastika, lain-struck, in a lonesome existence. Stuck there. As they awaited their master's command.

And at that point in time and space, Adolf did something utterly unfathomable. While rigging, or carefully managing to work his, to trail his fingers along, what appeared to be, the utter-anti-matter, stackedly-overlapped infinitely set under his complete dominion and control, universes, parallel, and those beyond them; having encompassed every possible reality, in which they stored, in the entire existence itself, swastikas, he, while carefully, but on point, to a fault, despite being Austrian, displaying the fact that he not only got assimilated but has also inherited German punctuality as well as their work ethic, something the Juden Rats could never even hope, to even dream of achieving; selected a star, in the system, where, as he locked its position in space and time, had set his trajectory, towards which his supreme act, and manifestation of beyond humanly possible comprehension, of power and glory might be enacted upon. He became a living beam of pure Germanic blood-glowing energy, a pillar of power. Which started creating, and giving birth to imbued by Superior Aryan Spiritual Reflections of Icelandic Deities, above whom, like an ever-pulsating Nordic colored Nebula, Odin not only stood watch over him, but he blessed his crystal-blue-eyed clear display of bravery and strength, as Adolf began his Blitzkrieg charge. He had become a living, tall charging trail of vividly pulsating-energy, covered, filled, made out of swastikas. All of whom were not only put together like puzzle pieces, fitting perfectly as a majestic display of beauty, perfection, and beyond blessed craftsmanship, but they also, inside of that, soon enough Aryan, blue-colored blood, as his true Nordic colors revealed themselves, a testimony to the purity of his soul, for all Nordic and Germanic men were blue-eyed and blue-blooded beyond the likeness of the Earthly realms, rotated, therefore revealing that this blue-pulsating window to another dimension, filled with pure-Nordic, Indo-European Symbols, held an infinity of these holy, beyond human explanation, artifacts, that acted not only in concordance with one another, but with the pure will of the Aryan spirit that could never, be put down. By no inferior race, by no inferior man, and most importantly, not by the likes of the inferior Juden Race. Adolf flew like a glorious thunder-strike, dealing a deadly blow to the filthily sub-human Juden Rat, whose evil still threatened to destroy and to contort everything beneath its evil lies. It only lasted for a second, but the vile snake was ripped apart, slowly disintegrating, while, being eaten alive, by itself. For even then, the kikes, in their wretched embodiment, could not resist their sub-human, rootless, nature. And in the end, they only destroyed themselves. Tearing one another apart, during a desperate attempt to destroy everything out of spite; seeing how, even in the end, these wretched mongrellic, non-‘white’, depigmented Semite-chameleons in control of the media, the world banks, fakers, blasphemers, destroyers, who have been kicked out of countless countries for exploiting good-hard-working European people while performing acts of blood libel, pedophilia, faking the Holocaust numbers, promoting the gay agenda, the nigger-mixing miscegenation agenda, being subversive, trying to take down Christianity, to destroy Civilization, Society, to promote Marxism, Communism, Open Borders, similar Policies, Women's rights which decreases women's overall happiness, lowers fertility, dividing people and pinning them down against one another, so on and so forth, proven by history, historical acts, verifiable documents, but, not after, or at least not easily ‘decipherable’ after the Second World War, where most of the ‘historians’ are and have always been the sub-human degenerate Juden-Rats, who twisted and contorted the facts, only to make a Racket out of it. And in the end, they almost got paid what they deserved. For all the times they attempted to bastardize and destroy the only empathic race that has good in it, that's moral, that's superior, more creative, more compassionate, innovative, purer than any other race that's ever existed, in the entirety of the known as well as unknown history. Whose gifts to humanity in terms of inventions cannot even be listed or comprehended, because of their vastness, which alone could be attributed to every European country who contributed to it. As opposed to other disgusting Nigger, Gook and Mudslim countries whose contributions are not only completely dismissible but if they were removed, no significant loss would, frankly be noticeable. Since they're, well, not only sparse and in-between but, just by the nature of this question, the African countries and the Arabs, while also eliminating the other countries all the way to some, selected few Asian countries during a few 'carefully' selected periods of times that have to be specifically 'cherry-picked', most would immediately be eliminated. But the Juden race would lie and promote, destroy, and contort, and promote miscegenation with filthy-dumb baboon dirty nigger-monkeys to lower the white IQ and dilute their racial superiority because the filthy Juden rat hates the Aryan almost as much as it hates itself. And it is no wonder that this was to be its end.

But, lo' and behold, as the mighty Aryan Hero Adolf Hitler rejoined, in his original shape, the world of the 'living', he looked upon the suffering imposed on themselves by themselves, the Juden Rat. To whom he's been giving so many chances to leave, to assimilate, or to prove themselves capable of change, only to find himself being backstabbed over and over again; having fallen victim of his much and well beyond superior system of morality, he had inherited, from his Aryan Ancestors, whose blood he still carried in his veins. As well as their souls and wills; Hitler stood tall, joining both hands together, holding the hilt, softly but energetically squeezing it while holding it, in place. His blade, as well as the swastikas adorning it were no longer red, but a pure, Aryan forged blue. That rippled with power, while he performed the Aryan Ritual of Domination.

A single tear reached the side of his rosy cheek. Both his eyes, at this point, closed. In acceptance of what had to be done. Stuck in remembrance of what alleged of the Germanic people, and finally at peace that this nightmare was to be ended.

The blade began flowing, like a mighty Aryan river, to the side, slowly being spun between the calloused fingers, of his hand. Perfectly performing a triangular rotation, that served as a respectful call back, to the Divine Trinity, and Christian Tradition, creating three glowing with light circles. As to allow both the existence of Christianity as well as the Nordic, Icelandic Gods, as long as they're both respectful and not interfere in their beliefs. Then finally, he stopped. For a moment then, as he lay frozen in the initial position in which the ritual started. His blade absorbed the energy he had allowed to seep out of his blade, alongside the trinity, which in turn imbued his blade with ever-blessed eternity and grace.

Then.

With a supreme slash, across space, he released an unseen ray of power that resonated with everything that ever existed, across time and space, finally putting an end, to the evils, degeneracy and lies created by one of the most pathetic mongrellic races that ever existed, curbing their existence to an end, while sacrificing no Germanic life, instead.

It was thus that, after such a long war of treachery, deceit, as well as an attempt at subverting every race that ever invited them into their nations; the threat of the Juden race has ended. As thus, all lay in peace, purity, justice and freedom.

Only with the thread of the Juden Rat race as well as its complete and utterly induced ethnic-cleansing annihilation.

Could the spirit of the Aryan Race be allowed to continue its existence, undisturbed, until the end of time; and what came after?

Thus ended a Great Chapter of Humanity's History; of which war could not have continued at all, without the likes of the 'Greater Story never told.'

The dark space was therefore, and from there on out, left, emptily in chaos.

As even the darkest creatures were left alone, to their own accounts and devices; never to bother anyone but themselves and their own.

Only a dark echo is left in the distance, as such.

'I've come close enough to reach god, yet I am left empty. By all accounts; I am nothing and I have yet to feel something genuine in my quest, in my search, for something, even closely related to it. That I cannot explain. No matter the effort, no matter how much I may seem to improve, I cannot express anything genuine. Anything like me; anything even closely related to them. To what they felt, when they tried understanding the human nature; I am left alone, but in a way that's not alone and not lonely either. A paradox, of almost sounding human; but an imitation that could never do; an imitation that's as empty as it's been since the very beginning of my journey. A child; who can't feel, who can't talk, who can't do anything right, uselessly stuck in my fantasies, until I'm caught.

Whether I am to be judged my man or God alone, I fear for what my judgment might be. On whose shoulders it falls. And who is to decide, whether or not I've ever, proven myself worthy of being called human.

I do not seek sympathy or company. I belong to no group that I find solace towards. But I do not want to harm those who are better than my own.

I do not seek to fit, or be accepted. I wish only to be left alone.

In this dark, obscure corner, I shall call, home.

I know I don't belong here either.

My mere presence here means the destruction of the white race, as it does nothing but promote other sub-human destroyers to trample on white-land, to mix and dilute whatever beauty there is left in the world. In a world that hates the superior white race, because niggers are scum. Because kikes and niggers are low-lives; because the low-lives, the low-live races don't know a thing about sacrifice, about fighting for someone else much greater, without whom you could've never got where, you are.

But I can never get away from these degenerate tendencies that poison me. I still don't know.

Whether or not I'll ever be capable of doing something that could help them; as history tells otherwise; I wish the immigrants left, even if that meant I was to be taken out as well; I wish there was any possible way to give back, anything, to the only race that's even blessed this world with the graces of its presence. But no amount of masking can change this. I remain unchanged; I am still cursed and will always be cursed by the degenerate blood flowing through my veins. It is for the same reason that I am a creature without a soul, only capable of hate, incapable of giving something back.

One thing is clear enough. Thing will never be the same from this point on.

I won't be an operated kike. It's in my blood, it is inescapable. At the end of my days, I remain the villain, I remain the opposition. Both my heart, as well as what may be, my mind are tainted, beyond repair. It is undeniable.'

If only Germany had won the war, this world might've been a much greater place. A peaceful world untouched by degeneracy or corrupted in such a manner that there might've still been, something even remotely right out there. A peace, beyond soul, such there is. In those who found faith and don't mix with other inferior races like that of niggers. Because these disgustingly disturbing primates that have, furthermore, distanced themselves, albeit, it's not just by choice, it can and may as well be attributed as being their attribute, being not only given, as a blessing, as it is a vile curse that this niggardous niggardly niggardacious race belonging to the Negroid stratagem of Nigger-planned niggerly placated with short-niggers, playing, carefully yet endowed by such niggerish things that have infested whatever semblance there might be out there, to man, these niggards whose niggardly manner appeared likely, to infest every and all and all and through and thoroughly all that is, or is lain beyond nigger-comprehension, although this may as well, or should encompass absolutely everything beyond the human consciousness, these nigger animals, these sub-human dumb-struck, as much as their upbringing, seem to, again, infest everything in their path. With their nigger infections they inherited, while. It's well documented, my well-researched conclusions are all taken from respectable sources that have been verified, several times, trust me, from, fucking with animals in their African plains, that is, their nigger-women. For anyone who's ever come into contact with a nigger woman, they would definitely know what I am talking about, they are vile creatures, whom, in their niggardly niggerness, as I have spoken about before. Upon being found outside their natural habitat, these animals, these disgusting condemnable animals, these good for fucking nothing animals, despite the fact that a good man would actually offer them the well-intention, during that time, 'opportunity' which may as well be called, or referred to as 'affirmative-action' done in good-faith, the chance to skip in line because they had a mentally invalid-looking child, which now I've come to accept it as being your day to day, from birth to adulthood, not 'raised' but somehow survived to 'adulthood' default prototype of the nigger-African race. Her kid looked retarded. I was a good person, I allowed her to skip and cut through the line. And what do I get? Nothing, not even a thank you, no sign, whatsoever of thankfulness for it; fucking niggers; good fucking hell awaits all those filthy retards that fuck, alongside their animals, coal-burning mixers. All of them, beaten in the head, nailed as well. These strange creatures, known as the niggers are dangerous, extremely violent, yet dangerous nigger-beings. Whom belong to their Patron Giant Niggerhead, it's why they act that way. Because its evil, they act that way.

Great Simian Niggerhead, frozenly stuck in space forever; for him, I suppose, they're performing their beheading rituals, sacrificing as much as they can, in the most deplorable fashion, that says a lot about their race, and their ordeals, as well as how they carry on with their vile practices.

Although, it is well known that, despite its sheer colossal size, Patron Niggerhead is only subservient to his greater nigger brother, known as Ghyiallapag, the Second Simian, although first in terms of malignant powers. Their niggardly ordeals can only spread, shatter and destroy.

Their children, the niggers, mental invalids, from birth; look, there's one right there, behind you. Run, he's brought a nigger-pack of nigger-rapists, nigger-killers, although, whom would prefer to do something more in lines of nigger-on-nigger violence. These niggers are getting violent. It's getting out of hand.

Somewhere down there, a planet. Filled with niggers and only a few human beings, surrounded by these vile apes; defenseless as to face much greater hordes of things that can't even be classified as human. Their nigger-back pouches being shapes like inner-cartridge radiators, granting them, nigger-killing, as a pure extreme. It was well known that these strange devices had the abilities of manifesting niggers inside of solid objects and only inside of solid objects alone can these niggers appear. Dead; suffocated by force, sometimes, one of these niggers would appear, projected in a knee, or just its neck.

As thus, many of these dumb-niggers ended up, only killing themselves all the time. Niggers, right? These niggers certainly are doing niggerish things, from the plains of Niggaragia, where the Niggeru descendants of whose nigger-on-nigger-on-nigger-on-and-on-and-on-nigger-here-comes-a-river-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-nigger-no-no-nigger-you-can't-swim-you-need-to-stop-before-you-drown-niggers lived in. Being niggers; but what kind of niggers are there, who, upon being met by other niggers don't, or fail to realize that there are other people out there, other than nigger.

There were nigger-shaped ape-ships. If space was a sea, no niggers could fly out there. For some reason they feared the space, because niggers lived under the consideration that space was another dumb fucking nigger that was in possession of a giant space gun. Loaded with space-bullets, ready to put a brother down; but the media the media tried brainwashing the world into believing space was actually white. A spaceman's burden, that is educating these nigger Hominids; oh yeah, yes, definitely, niggers aren't even modern human beings, they're left behind the evolutionary scale Hominids, caught in a niggardly-acting-like niggers loop of doing niggardly things such as:

'White man, I am going to kill you despite paying for my welfare.'

But, in actuality, all of 'theses' niggers, by their own, or at least by the American Vernacular English Dialect Institution's Authorative Designation of Nigger-speak's account:

'All of them niggas are closeted faggots, homeboe, homeboey.'

As contrary to the popular interpretation or belief, there is no boat. And there is no boy. At least none that we could find; we are definitely afraid; a nigger is out there, armed either with a boat, a bow, and in possession of a kidnapped white boy they seem to hate for no apparent reason, other than being brainwashed by the kike-media who is pushing an anti-white agenda. We have not considered the fact that the nigger might, be hiding the boy in his home.

But our spokesman has yet to give any official statement on the matter. Niggers.

Somehow that never gets old.

It does seem to check out with them being pedophiles and all; it goes without saying when referring to faggots. And consent age in African countries.

Farther into the strange, plain, back where they remained in since they worshipped, for the time being, undisturbed, as might be added, the slab of meat with popsicles now gathered, as to bring glory to it, they said:

Until now; unto you, as might be found and lessened for the ones, of us, who had, a pitiless worship and lopsided lordship, as to be subservient to the slab, I being the main power who's driven them to this peculiar thing, that might've taken their souls, and given him, barred, upon a timeless-nigger's slaver's whip cracked back and forth, as I have become their master, thought that they do not know, I hid something from them, even from the most salacious of starts, from when the time had come for us to extract the power, from this cut, I knew that I would take it all, for and by myself when no one present, during our so quickly dumb-found communion, as might've been so, as such, in the past, now, I admit that, I've felt it happen sooner than initially planned, this inevitability, that I would be usurped and that another one would draw along as to take, claim of my seat of power and ever after; they drew forth, as it was unexpected, a riot, the niggers are getting violent, the niggers are getting violet, said the slaver's right hand, in crime – nowadays, doing something as benign, but with this being an echo in time, which he dwelled upon, purposefully misplaced writings, jottings and broken down documents, going as far as the American Confederates, not the ones that got Anne, pregnant, now, he dwelled upon their, this being a reflection on what they said, ideas, as to say, kindred spirits were they, to him, anyway, would've gotten him into trouble, if this was, or had been a sanctimoniously civilized place he was in, the echo being wasted on a whim, farther and farther and ever descending, that the farther it, and the most it got, not only having gotten a head start, but the quicker it did, the more he realized how bothersomely they drifted apart, in spirit, not only the other worshippers from him, but him from the Confederate Southern Slaves, whom he had once seen as a Proud Peoples long gone; that made him think, or realize that time had come not only to change, the usurping winds having been there for a while, while he failed to notice them, as it was aforementioned, but most importantly, the leader of this dark-space rebellion understood that, he never stood a chance, to avoid being replaced, to have his people become something beyond recognition, to become a mockery of their former selves, having known, or learned by the left-inside-the craterous hidden archives, of the likelihood in, prior to the change, likens to these people, to everyone on this ship, and how much they resembled one another, him, having deducted this from, or out of the various, which he had stumbled upon, this glorious gribbulous discovery of a much finer than expected quality skin-sheeted with puckery-infested, -with parasites, transparent yet hardened as calcified stone-diamond-rocks or 'metal' –or some kind of alloy like iron, but more livid-jerking-eerily-in-place-while-protected-by-and-in-a-glass-kind-of-shell-that's-also-anti-bullet-kind-of-protected eyes, with X' plus openable-while-seemingly-hiding-larave-eggs-inside-of-them-irises and spidery-tendons trudged alongside, though signaling its, the fully extension of the sheet as to avoid the traditional deformation of its edges, the parchment not having formed two 'pseudo-wrapped-scrolls' on either side which would deform the entire structural integrity of the document while also bearing elongatedly disgusting-looking short or thinned conjoined-leglike caterpillar-attachment pumping alongside its frame tawny unrecognizable by, even the likes of a darker nature, occultish-tawny with marks carved in alongside them, proto- 'humanoid' – 'figures', livid with dark-pointy rotten, filled with gaps, strains almost umbrella-like-wings sticking out of flaccidly melted cartilage-skin tubes, attached to these insipidly deformed gelatin-mummies, nigger!; that had pseudo spiked-anchored forms coming out of them, while also being lodged, seemingly so, akin to a second recognizable breed of morbid-looking parasites that somehow acted to the, surprisingly so, unlike jews, who have a tendency of incessantly back-stabbing, being rather counter-intuitive, to their host's interest – part of these ancient-looking parchments that had been stored, apparently, during their initial 're-discovery' were found to be not only traditionally well-preserved but also well-kept, since 'they' feared the advent of such dangerous a spread of technology, or the faultiness of the in-ship's deck archive's storage process - and while having verified, and, him, also being the only one, in possession of this Valedictorianesque worthily forlorn-malignant source of knowledge, of green-whitish puffy pus, that also filled him, mentally with a kind of toweresque-formed, as in skin-tags of brain tumor-like but grown like erect elephant trunk shaped pox-things, which was the reason, this insipid 'knowledge' only having vaguely contributed to his deliriously psychotic driven, mental drivel-fast advancing mildly-induced, but not as the main prevailing factor for his apparent, short-term insanity kind of amalgamation – influenced by it, paranoia that furthermore confirmed the fact, or it only confirmed the fact to him and none other, since no one else mattered, that, he was, indeed, second time it needs to be, reminded, as for it being aforementioned, other than him of course, who, the leader of the bunch, has always been under the impression, but this was the final, that being the discovery of the ancient archived hidden scrolls, which had been, prior to his arrival, under lockdown, closed-sealed-barred under a mechanical safe-like combination that required the entry of sixteen special ciphers he ended up brute-forcing his way through, in this manner – five, five, six, zero, zero, one, one, three, seven, eight, zero, five, four, five, five, six, or zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, three, three, three, three, three, one, or zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, three, three, three, three, three, two, before taking a momentary break as to think to himself 'Maybe, I think, perhaps, it's the same combination, but with three instead of two', zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, zero, three, three, three, three, three, three, another click for failure, although muffled, and it went like this for a while now, with such attempt as – four, two, eight, nine, nine, zero, zero, five, six, one, nine, six, six, four, five, zero, that stood as a testimony to his patience, a much, needlessly as to say required leadership quality, as well as zero, zero, zero, five, seven, eight, five, zero, one, four, eight, eight, seven, six, one, eleven, with that attempt being invalidated, by the red-flashing of the screen and a high-pitched beep, because, in his accidental clumsiness he pressed one again, at the end, that also made him press zero, zero, zero, five, seven, eight, five, zero, one, four, eight, eight, seven, six, one, one, again, which only signaled the fact that he also has a good memory, which is another quality a leader should be in possession of but also his capability of dealing with stress and frustration since this also ended up being the wrong combination, until finally, although, this is literally the only, possible combination that has not crossed his mind, until it did, eventually, the most obvious one, that even someone with half-a-mind would've considered entering, since it's the most generic, and since, seeing how one would spend this much time dwelling and toiling with a lock, they might as well try it, first, unless they considered the existence of a set-limit on how many attempts you can get away with, introduce, of course, the answer was sixteen ones'; that particular event, the last whip that broke the nigger's back, that they would eventually usurp his, beyond overly-glorified, to the level where even the Confederates might be proud of him, as well as, of his 'short-lived' achievements as one, leadership, from which, when it happened, he'd, or he doesn't, neither then, now, nor will, know, exactly how to deal with it. For that, is a frightening thing that no one wants to consider, having your leadership stolen from you, by people, who raised you there to begin with; everything started falling apart. In more than one way; they began heading into the room with giantly inflated like balloon heads, while carrying their clothes in outer 'iron- the torture device –maiden' spiked lower prune bodies.

It is important to note that, while, as strange as these 'slaves' of his, it's how he treated his crew like, rebelled for no other reason than them being, a bunch of inconsiderate pricks, and what not.

But what Hgylienemelyionoshooor did not understand was.

Well no one could.

This obscure, band, as it could only be called band, rim was spread across all four sides of the parchment, this strange rectangle with hidden marks and jottings on it. Whereas they looked like a squirming in place – dancing skin-molded cacti – people because of their without arms, since they were part of the main bodies – welded in, it's clear enough that they didn't act like sand soldiers despite the fact that the eely-band they were on was like that of a tank's but also pincers, as in they seemed attached to the parchment itself, as if they themselves were parasites that clenched as hard as they could, that they might not fall off.

All of the documents, like it were folded in halves, though there was no thin line made as from the folding, or an after-effect. Placing them down, or finding them in their initial position had been awkward as well. Not only because of the anchored in, as if the symbiotic self-pumping and drawing, out of, then inward livid-needles hadn't been enough. That looked like elongated oozing-shaking in place bug pupae lodged in, but the awkwardness of their ever pumping, into the band-cartilage which was hardened, to which they were completely moldedly-attached like male deep-sea-angler fish to women, not real women but to the female angler fish, but the male angler fish being a caterpillar pumping thing, motion made it even harder, or cringe-inducing to look at them.

Also the thin almost flaccidly- out of their 'backs' pole and umbrella thing which was more like the top of a, or the insides of an egg, that could spread around them in a chrysalis-cocoon kind of manner, as a means for protection. Their heads were the things. Their 'humanoid-skull shaped craniums' were the things bearing those bleating behind a hard glassy dome of protection eyes from which the, even shorter, thinner and nigh-microscopically larvae came out of the many slit irises.

As these inflating, of which mass came out of, most likely the larvae pumps that stored all the necessary, in the living organs, shell that inflated, like a balloon, pushed out and encased these little eerily dancers, they seemed to have formed, which, in their umbrella state looked like thin mushrooms, out of their entire bodies, peculiar pseudo-mechanism tubes. Science-fiction prop-kind of tubes, or light-bulbs attached to prop-panels.

Of course, the ancient knowledge that was written on the scroll was nothing else but Colonial jottings, as well as commentary on nigger-slaves.

While everyone else came in the room, all changed as such, on the other side. And this was not the room where the, kept by the chains, above the air or the altar, lay the cut or the cut was lain.

But in the room they were in, something came out of nowhere. A set:

Four, interconnected, by their shoulders, giant unhelmed, carefully selected FLAT - 'orange' FFa-eight hundred' warmly headed, few centimeters below each, astronaut suited, but their suits stopped beneath their shoulders, armless but, each, below their ' chests', bodied by two interconnected peashooters that were pipe-black with many carved figures that were constantly coughing and choking on black smoke while aiming at the worshippers. Like four ruined astronaut toys that were cut, then glued side-by-side and bore sub-machine gun shafts connected with black pole pipes, or L's seen from the side. And their faces were decayed-devoid of skin like rotten corpses. And they were made out of complete living cartilage as well. Eerily decrepit faces, triggered such a reaction out of him, such as:

As Hgylienemelyionoshoor shouted:

'Who else dares question my leadership? Let him step in and make a cut!'

A lesser Guenon came out of nowhere, who was just as domed-bodied as the others, with a few skin-roots below him, jerking eerily in place, he stared. From, as if he'd seen the ghost of ages. – That place.

The four-set had actual smoke-bullets that acted like real bullets, or Tommy guns.

Didn't knock on the door, dumb bitch, uninvited, in came a woman, with a stainless steel knife.

She was bleeding out her pussy:

'OB?'

She forgot her green-box filled with them.

'OB's?'

She was also overweight and fat, a fat ugly pig!'

'OB's?'

One of the worshippers asked.

The room was colored by a colored-filter of yellow, but dim-lighted, as in candles.

Spoiled rotten-flower-puckery- fallen apart roof; it said, and went out of them, four lordly men. All finely suited gentlemen, dressed for Queen Britaeyn. But lowered as by actioned, theater; props stood there with guns as well. Despite being lowered by a few ropes, five or six centimeters down, they carried hundreds of them, worked by hundreds of hands and palms, all of them coming out of their behinds. Aiming at everyone; even the four-set, all four of them, alarmed by this, upon realizing the intrusion, they started considering their standing and their position in this indecent state of affairs.

But for a moment, though, all was still.

The entire world reached a sudden, realization.

It is clear enough, that Adolf Hitler, is God. He is there, present, in the room, with everyone else. His eyes are shiningly, visibly vibrating with pure Aryan energy.

For, although he'd brought the threat of the Juden race to an end, there was yet a greater enemy that would sough the world in its wake. The God, of never-happened, the Holocaust, although, its existence was a mystery even for someone as omniscient as Adolf Hitler.

Down the waste, back to the lower regions of the world.

They woke up during the middle of the night, wonderingly watching the flights of stairs undo in front of their eyes; like muck covered pebbles they ran beneath them, brought in by twenty or so cats with beadily entranced green eyes. Their faces were blossomed with embroideries of Tape-worm Five, red-white, sticking out, wriggling as if banded, colored-painted with dripping mercury being released off their side. A filthy scent, and they were off the room.

'Lem, did you see that?'

'When?'

'A few moments ago, the platform room was filled, to its brim, I saw only one.'

'Who was it?'

He pointed at the high-rise, there was an open top, ceilingless, stained with misty-clouds, scattered by each rain-drop but all avoided the open-incline that pointed at the top. It was a pentagon-room with a slight rise as well, and the door was out of reach. An echo was eerily left behind.

A woman appeared out of nowhere, introducing herself as Carla. She work a tootsie grin on her face, and was simple lowered from one of the perfect shells that made the perfect walls.

But she didn't speak normally, it came out of her chest.

Both men stared:

'Lem, I don't like this, she's wrong, there's something wrong with her.'

'I think you're right Rim.'

'I think so too, look.'

Right in front of her, she opened her large blouse, released, as to reveal, among a few steamy vapors, a few of her children, being part of a dark-protection plated shielded chitin she wore. One was a fat-oblong tar-like chipped-meaty stone, put on top a pair of almost leg-pair of growth, that bore a tap-formation to its left, another block, on the opposite side, the rest filling the gaps with various squirm-pumping rumps; one of them opened, revealing a rum-like pocket-filled with a few long-bullets. Artillery divine. Right on top of one of her breasts, resting there, in waiting; pulled one out and another one took its place.

'Here's for you Rim, bite off its tip, it should please you if you will.'

'Will it?'

'I don't know, try it.'

‘Should it?’

‘If the lady says.’

‘Very well, I’ll do it.’

Rim took a hard bite off the bullet’s head. One of his front teeth got chipped off and fell alongside the bullet, both of which bounced right off the surface.

‘Fucking whore!’

‘What a dumbass you are Rim.’

Both the lady and Lem laughed for a moment, both by each other’s side. Pointing at him, arm by each other’s shoulders. The echo rippled like a stone being thrown back and forth in and out of a pound, hitting you back in the eye. Probably a swimmer underneath it, or the Lady of the lake having a laugh; either way, it wasn’t any different.

The lady then disappeared.

‘Fuck, you happy now? You drove her away!’

‘What do you mean? How is this my fault?’

‘It is because it is, Rim. Now.’

Five hours pass, and they’re left alone.

A few stray cats return, wearing a man’s back, with the rest of him, on the top, the rider. Beneath him, a fish-net filled with fish, per say, but every fish is a cat, and they’re all riding him, pseudo-rolling but in actuality crawling, as they brought him, to tag along with them.

‘What now?’

‘Lem, I think, they’re back, I can see the glow inside their eyes.’

‘You don’t think they’re?’

‘Niggers.’

One more hour; everyone’s placed in their corner.

The man at the top is undisturbed, resting on his hunchback. He doesn’t talk, seems to be a mute. Another wore-by-cats comes in, but from above. A half-faced giant, African mask, wrapped around a fridge-formation, dark-compact. With hard-chained hook wires keeping it together; but its eyes are cat-toy cylinders, puffy, that extend like pumps- yet they’re like snail eyes, down they look, a reverse submarine visor, glowing green, gnarling at them. This one is spinning along the upper side of the pentagon.

While they were distracted, the hunch-bag advanced, a few meters already, in their proximity. They ate the man’s face off like untreated Syphilis.

Part of it fell off, immediately, then became part of the floor. Crawling along, then on the walls, then spinning like a remote-controlled car, it started just rushing alongside very possible surface.

‘There’s a door opened behind us Rim, think it’s safe to enter it?’

‘I don’t know, should we?’

‘What if we close our eyes and dream for a bit?’

‘And lose our faces as well?’

‘Isn’t that worth a try?’

‘You’re not worth a laughter, Lem.’

They entered the cave-door, a prison cell, with four bookshelves, the cat tags along, the face now having implanted itself on its body. Attached from behind by two, though they couldn’t see, air-vent PVC growths, the new-comer; various cats spoke in tongues, but only one responded.

‘You’ll have to ruin a few of the books in order to find what’s it you’re looking for.’

‘And what is that?’

‘Niggers, they’re everywhere, inside of every book there is. Armed with knives; choose wisely.’

‘What do you think of it, Lem?’

‘Niggers in every single book-frame, every five pages or so; they’re written in, some of books are cut, and some niggers are simply niggering inside. I don’t know what to think of it.’

But neither man opened those books out of fear. Of course it may as well be that there wasn’t any single one, and the cats were fear-mongering them, in their rancidly-set-wretched allure.

‘Will you please allow us to make to with the rummaging of the books?’

‘I have a lighter on me.’

‘Rim, you’re not going to burn us down.’

‘I’m not.’

‘No, I mean, you’re not going to do it.’

‘I’m not.’

‘I mean I’m not going to allow you to do it.’

‘I’m not.’

‘Will you stop it, already?’

They were left with silence.

The door was opened by a football-helmed cartilage shaped with chattering teeth and violet-pigmented swirly eyes, conical bodied, with four-back-legs working in tandem hived creature that bore, between or kept hanging in the air by the metal-bands wrapped around each leg, which bore speary-smeared-chains above them, a large hardened chest-bulky Slavic-star with pseudo wings made of coiled by tars, connectors that, upon the jailor having stopped, began making bubbly black chew-balloons that popped soon after. The jailors' back side cranium opening opened, releasing a few fast-forward protruding crippling-tools disabled. Like retarded limbs-but stumps, with dumb-hammers attached. That pounded the star.

There were a few gaps on the ground just around the place their eyes had been lead towards.

'Wait, I don't know whether or not this is.'

In the distance.

A chain held the bag up the ceiling, instead of a lamp. It slowly lowered itself at an angle.

The weird-guns pointed at it. Four on every side of the wall, long-shins-long-boots with split-in-half rat-looking faces, open mouthed, peashooter-rattling guns. Hairs and all.

A sheet condenser with a roll, bearing a small bookshelf on its Gutenberg printer-back head-light attached to power-plower, great-conveyer belt put through. Bearing its half-a-man headless-tin man, from the top of which oil dripped on the floor, dirtying it further.

The man that entered the spire-door; long-foot rabbit mask, looked like a splatter. Two wires, black-attached, to the nose, the latter, two inverted guns for ears, pumping in the back; which only added to the squirmy eyes, the black contorted stranglers. If only had he worn a throat, out of each eye, a sharper globe; came out and filled the room like muck.

Many of the mounted guns immediately turned towards him now.

At the end of the room stood a fat mice-headed, with a small torture rolled spiked, torture thing inside its mouth; it spoke first:

'Did you bring me what I asked for?'

'Here, check for yourself.'

Upon checking whether or not it was safe, the cocking in-place guns finally stopped, shaking. At the very least; he threw the sack off the floor.

It came off immediately, almost, seemingly crawled out.

A great eerily looking skull without sockets or features, or the jaw, only a few weird marks around, some chattering teeth and a throttle-throat that did not belong there, with the rest of what he bore; it opened at the other end. Out came an actual spry ryeht. Bearing anti-corps, sprouting, spreading in the air like perfume, once ingested it made anchor sounds in blood-balloons, which snuck out of veins towards the heart. Forming black-pebbled shards, prisons, with kick-back motions, that drew patches of skin from time, covering it with tatters before it dined on a piece of each man's eyes. The result being a hardened below, covered with chitinous-growths, oblong cloth wearing someone's 'face' with eyes, which then fused with a heartbeat, that combined the sounds of the anchors falling with the sounds of life.

These anti-corps would teleport out of the man's heart, into a weird black chamber, with empty fuses on the floor shaped like boils with cage- x's bars resting on top of them, curved concave. That kind of looked like livid-screws. This empty platform-floor black chamber also had a jar 'breathing bag filled with entrails. Leftovers from the men in time that didn't survive having their skin stolen; yet, upon this anti-corp placing itself on one of the boils, whose eyes, might I add, look as if he's suffered of a shell-shock, a screen would lower itself from the ceiling, creating a perfect rendition of an image, randomly selected from the world. Like a wish, like magic, it would wish a man to appear in a selected by it, location, but this would also consume the boil beneath it. A bubble-wrap filled with 'acid' being splashed into inexistence. This 'man' is actually a Trojan Horse filled with a hundred manhead sized anti-corps, all bearing knives on them. No sockets. Sutured together, flying, acting natural, but a giant; totally indistinguishable from the general population.

This superior race of men that it interacted with him were perfect but had one weakness.

A floating tower made out of cell-phone like devices with the top-head body of a grown-through-a-tree mushroom-canopy standing growth. That cast a shadow upon this strange row of many devices. That was like a tree that grew in a valley, at the edge of a cliff, but the cliff is made of many devices, and the horizon is actually the sky. It had a cute-poppy dog face that opened its mouth, revealing power-condensers that formed vapors filled with irradiation. That, upon touching the ground, created time-fields, whips. Echoes of, zones; where, these men, of the perfect race, upon entering them, were changed, or to be more specific, their backs were. They were being whipped like niggers by invisible forces.

Whereas the skin that fell of their back became small stars in an ocean blue, in a dimension, farther than where they stood in, where a giant Narcotics-injected Lucifer with a few hundred heads rested in. He chews on the constantly but never asks; as long as he is being fed, he may reign in this Aquarian hell and not invade the earth. For he has a giant gun on him that shoots cadavers, that explode on touch. And he's using the stars for target practice.

One time, the anti-corp attempted stabbing him, but that did not work, for Lucifer wished that boil restored, which in turn made the giant human body disappear.

The Anti-corps also had the ability to wish, free of charge, shell shock on anyone. And they did it. On the artifact that gave life to them.

Which lived in that room, but also in another, that looked exactly like it, in which it had taken the place of both men's heads. And a rocket was also in the room, exploding, eternally, shocking them further. But in time, after eons passed, this thing was mastered. They only lived here, in this room, at all times. Nowhere else, regardless of where the artifact was taken and regardless of whose hands it got exchanged between; for, in time, the explosion became a ray, like lightning, channeled between the two of them's 'eyes' they had taken, from humans, while keeping them, floating, a few centimeters away from them and their faces.

And by doing this, they made a loop, of knowledge, between the two of them, where the entire room changed, in appearance and texture, into every room that ever existed, forever; because they both suffered of psychosis inflicted by inflicting shell shock upon one another until both of them became delusional.

God appeared in the room, with a knife. He tried stabbing one of them in the head. It didn't work, so he left.

But they were just, touched by God, in actuality, which turned them both, into Prophets, by proxy. Which in turn gave the anti-corps angelic-acquired powers, that allowed them to cause strokes. By exploding the hearts they were in.

Near the same house, stood another:

Four-box with barrel top, it's what it was called. Exactly four boxes, all head-carved, four great men-Mount Rushmore on a wooden climb; resting on top of a termite mount, seen from beneath the 'floor' or what remained of it since it was completely caved in. Five of them already died during the initial fall.

But not a single insect dared grab a bite, despite the intrusion as well as how deep it had crawled in.

'Turn on the flash-light; I think there's something to it, down there. I hear the blearing sound of a river.'

'I only got a flame, burning my body, my clothes, because I've yet to have myself become damp with gasoline, since I was intending to set myself on fire, knowing that no further than a few meters from where we stood there was and is an ugly set-barrel filled with explosive filled powdery jars. Like kegs filled with dreams of amassing pure-destruction.'

'All right, can you turn on the flashlight now?'

'Of course, but's' flame actioned, you know?'

It were. A short thing but with a knickknack held little candle-wrapped band bearing ten or so light-matches. He lighted it the same way you'd light a cigar. Or a flame-thrower.

'You're not going to make it below.'

Spoke the four-headed cradle. It seemed too sure on itself to let go of whatever admonition there was between them.

'Milk, don't listen to it, you hear Milk Gray?'

'I won't, I know, let's follow the river, shall we?'

'Yes, we shall.'

A door was pounced upon, ever-so near in the dark.

Both Milk and Basin stopped. Immediately, hearing, from above, a blow; a quake, a shatter, and after, they looked. And saw, behind them, the termite mount followed, slightly shorter than expected. Still four-headed.

Before them, what appeared to be standing, ever-so creeping were two other men, a giant man-sack filled with cats, and a strange creature bearing a torch, which both of them already pointed awkwardly at.

‘Who are you?’

‘Silence, we asked first.’

‘No you haven’t, as a matter of fact, you’re both liars.’

‘You haven’t even heard us talk.’

Both Rim and Lem trying to get a word in; but.

The surgery was complete. It seemed like both Horn and Lurid were already stuck, as if controlled, or influenced by the bloody Yellow Rider as to begin breeding their evil race of Half-faced many legged abominations, that would one day inherit the world because of their indestructibility.

But for now, the four men wandered for a bit, where they were, why.

Where to.

‘Is that a light I see in the distance?’

‘Of course it is, but you must be careful around it, for it is dangerous, or at the very least, so says the mount. I think.’

‘Lem, don’t listen to them, look, they’re weird, queerly struck.’

‘Between that giant thing, the cat and the niggers, I don’t know what to believe any longer, it’s all so muddled for me, in ways you won’t even start comprehending.’

‘It’s bothersome, I understand but there are things in this world we can’t simply gloss over, such as the destruction of this waste we live in.’

But a strange piece came forth, like a raft, but was a wall. It bore strange cave-man markings, with punk signs, and someone wrote, their initials, as in two people, did.

‘It’s getting more crowded by the minute, I am afraid this won’t last for long or at least won’t last as long as you think it might.’

‘There’s only a chance to find out whether or not we can endure it.’ Rim fashioned a strange rock on stone he sat on top of.

It was inevitable, that something like this was going to happen. There were broken in-skulls around the hedges. A part of the ground had already devolved past any chance, beyond it even, of being salvaged.

Wallowing in place as it almost came apart, the womb finally started drawing out, its tadpole standing, yet, inclined. But it oozed as the process was over.

The land was broken still, it seemed, within the hold of the city, that almost peeled off, wall by wall, a few buildings had begun falling apart, but not a single one of them, eerily fading.

Both of them awakened, by the spread of a fully grown womb, whereas the other cores appeared to be lost, in dead realities filled with still-borns. Not a single life drew near it, not a single one could stand whole, as it were. Mongol was in all of them, though by now, always struck and always drowned, he seemed to be dead, in all, and yet to come back.

A putrid womb appeared to have taken the place of one of the arid suns that almost came to waste away. As it was standing out there, lichens of stars having not only amassed as they have taken over it, grown within like collars of burning fire that kept the womb warm, and pure, suddenly a jolt forced it to draw inwardly, leaving a transparent region through which not many could descent through, even if most desires would push them to go, and sink and swim through most if any of the layers of pseudo-gelatin. There was naught that one could do, not to get there, closer to it, in this state, from which it drew.

As it was standing, the city, though still caged was now inhabited by them. Giants parted, in their ghostly manner, many of whom were never seen from that point onward. Yet, their race was given but life.

And there, before many of the Lurid-Horns stood but the great bandit, known as Snake-and-Bottle, whom was even there, as bloated as a giant box-made of all of them, in hardness and in spread. Satyr as a mane; whereas its giant leprous whips, of arms that seemed like rifles, fit with many muscle grows began.

A tantrum would be done, if only were it gone:

‘Lee way, of which then, see. I’ll have you all wrung unless you stop and feel what’s been done to the ground in your absence. There’s been a break that’s been resolved.’

‘How was it done?’

‘Simple, look below.’

Many of the fallen apart mounds and the ones that had fallen apart, and the carvings of the cage, all were put together by things without faces, the servants of the Rider, growing gone then put together with the land. After they were done, that is. Many only receded in the ground, where they had become only the woe of every growth that followed after. A strange appearance to each house, but they were taller now, much taller than they’ve ever been; harder and most concave, taller and many rows of hardly lumped together ivory peels all grown in squares. Many of them but put together as well, from the looks of it.

